In regard to the conveyance, I would only say that it does appear from the tithe map of 1840 that the suggestion made by Mr. Nield—to the effect that the purchaser of Summerhill in 1846 might well have been content to have relied on the means of egress which lay to the west of the house Summerhill, and therefore would not need the use of the lane in question—in my opinion is not one which can legitimately be accepted when one sees from this plan that the road or way which leads from Thingwall Lane to Summerhill itself, was included in the conveyance; and I should imagine the obvious inference is that the purchaser of the house would assume that he was to be entitled to use, and would require to use, Thingwall Lane itself. That conveyance in itself amply justifies the result at which the justices arrived, or at the lowest (and this is all that we are concerned with) was material on which they could properly reach their finding.

I accordingly agree that the decision of the justices should be restored, and this appeal allowed.

Appeal allowed.
Leave to appeal to House of Lords refused.

*REILLY v. ORANGE.

[Plaint No. K. 260.]

Easement—Prescription—Period of user until action—No possibility of interruption for a year—Right of way—Contiguous plots of land—Agreement—Grant of conditional user by defendant of plaintiff's entrance drive—Action by plaintiff to terminate user—User for period of over 19 years—Prescription Act, 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), ss. 2, 4.

To establish an easement under the Prescription Act, 1832, a claimant must show that he has enjoyed a user for the full period of twenty years without interruption, and such period is by section 2 of the Act [1] to be deemed to be the period next before the commencement of some suit or action wherein the claim or matter to which such period may relate shall have been brought into question. The commencement of such a suit or action is not an interruption within the meaning of section 4 of the Act,[1] but is the event marking the date down to which the requisite period of user must be shown.

Where, therefore, the defendant, owner of a plot of land, had had uninterrupted user of a driveway over a contiguous plot belonging to the plaintiff for over 19 years, when the plaintiff claimed a declaration that the defendant's right to use it had been determined:—

Held, that the defendant could not establish a right of way notwithstanding that, at the commencement of the action, there could no longer be an interruption acquiesced in for one year before the completion of the full period of 20 years.

Flight v. Thomas (1841) 8 Cl. & Fin. 231 distinguished.

APPEAL from Deputy Judge Coplestone-Boughey, sitting at Birkenhead County Court.

The plaintiff, Ernest Reilly, and the defendant, John Orange, in October, 1932, and June, 1933, respectively, became by conveyance the owners of contiguous plots of land on the west side

[1] Prescription Act, 1832, s. 2: "... That no claim which may be "lawfully made at the common law, "by custom, prescription, or grant, to "any way or other easement, ... "when such way or other matter as "herein last before mentioned shall "have been actually enjoyed by any "person claiming right thereto without interruption for the full period "of twenty years, shall be defeated "or destroyed by showing only that "such way or other matter was first "enjoyed at any time prior to such "period of twenty years, but nevertheless such claim may be defeated "in any other way by which the same "is now liable to be defeated."

S. 4: "... That each of the "respective periods of years hereinbefore mentioned shall be deemed "and taken to be the period next "before some suit or action wherein "the claim or matter to which such "period may relate shall have been "or shall be brought into question, "and that no act or other matter "shall be deemed to be an interruption, within the meaning of this "statute, unless the same shall have "been or shall be submitted to or "acquiesced in for one year after the "party interrupted shall have had or "shall have notice thereof, and of the "person making or authorizing the "same to be made."

of Thurstaston Road, Thurstaston, Chester. The two plots, of which the northern one was the plaintiff's, had formerly been in the common ownership of one person, and the only building erected on either of them was a commercial garage situate on the plaintiff's plot. The conveyances had apparently been drawn, and the plans upon them prepared, without the precaution of first viewing the property. In the result the conveyances were effected on the footing that the plots were two rectangular plots and provision was made for access from Thurstaston Road to the western parts of the two plots by showing on the plans a central strip, running from east to west, of 9 ft. in width, 4 ft. 6 ins. of which width was to be contributed by each plot. The conveyances contained appropriate provisions for the use by the two parties of this 9 ft. way as a means of access to and from the more western parts of their plots. The part of the defendant's plot which, according to the conveyances, should have provided the site of the eastern portion of the 9 ft. road, was on a level lower than the plaintiff's property, and on a level lower than Thurstaston Road, and it would have been a quite impracticable proposition to attempt to make up the 9 ft. roadway as contemplated by the conveyances.

In these circumstances in 1934 the parties, being then on friendly terms, agreed to exchange certain parts of their properties, the defendant being granted permission to use a driveway made by the plaintiff on his own land as a means of access to the western part of his (the defendant's) property, and in particular to a bungalow and garage which he had erected on his plot. In 1940 the plaintiff sold the Heatherland Garage and the eastern portion of his property, but he retained the strip of land which was the site of the means of access above referred to. Subsequently the parties fell out, the plaintiff complaining that the defendant was using the drive for the purposes of his business, whereas the agreement, the plaintiff asserted, only provided for access for domestic purposes. In December, 1953, the plaintiff by his solicitors gave notice to the defendant determining any right of the defendant to use the way over the plaintiff's property and by proceedings in the county court he claimed a declaration that the defendant's right to use the drive had been determined; an injunction to restrain the defendant by himself, his servants or agents from using the drive; and damages for trespass. The defendant counterclaimed for a declaration that he was entitled to a right of way over the plaintiff's land. His case was that as part of the agreement of 1934 he was to have in perpetuity a right of way for all purposes over the plaintiff's land, in the nature of an easement annexed to his (the defendant's) plot.

The deputy judge gave judgment for the plaintiff and dismissed the counterclaim. He accepted the plaintiff's evidence that under the agreement the user by the defendant of the drive was only to continue until the defendant had created a new means

SINGLETON L.J. I will ask Jenkins L.J. to deliver the first judgment.

JENKINS L.J. stated the facts and continued: The matter came before Deputy Judge Coplestone-Boughey at Birkenhead. He gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff and dismissed the defendant's counterclaim. He made a declaration that the defendant's right to use the plaintiff's drive had terminated, and he awarded the plaintiff £12 damages for the various acts of trespass and so forth complained of. In the reasons for his judgment, the deputy judge said: "The only conflict of fact is "about the agreement. I am satisfied that both parties are doing "their best to recollect what was agreed." With that preface he said that he preferred the plaintiff's evidence to that of the defendant. His finding, based on the plaintiff's evidence, was that the plaintiff granted the defendant permission to use the drive for access to his premises for domestic purposes, but only until such time as the defendant should construct a separate means of access to his premises over his own land. The defendant's evidence had been to the effect that as part of the agreement of 1934 he (the defendant) was to have in perpetuity a right of way for all purposes over the plaintiff's land, in the nature of an easement annexed to the defendant's plot.

Mr. Blease, for the defendant, very properly admits that for the purpose of this appeal he must accept the deputy judge's finding as to the nature and terms of the agreement, but he says that notwithstanding this he is entitled to succeed. He says that on two grounds: (1) that he has had 20 years' uninterrupted enjoyment of the right claimed, as required by the Prescription Act, 1832; (2) that although the right he claims had its origin in the agreement of 1934, and although that agreement, as found by the deputy judge, would only give him a right to use the drive for domestic purposes, and only until such time as he made a drive of his own, that permission did not prevent the 20 years' user on which he relies from establishing his right under the Prescription Act, 1832. The second of those points can only arise if Mr. Blease is entitled to succeed on the first.

The evidence as to the date of the agreement under which the defendant used the drive seems to have been somewhat indefinite. The defendant appears to have thought that the agreement was made in September, 1934. The plaintiff could give no nearer date than that it was in May, June or July. The action was commenced, taking the date of the particulars of claim as the date of commencement, on July 1, 1954. So, on the evidence, the defendant failed to prove 20 years' user down to the date of the commencement of the action, because to do that it was necessary for him to prove that the agreement was made not later than July 1, 1934. But Mr. Blease seeks to surmount that difficulty by an argument on the Prescription Act, 1832, which makes it necessary to refer to the two sections of that Act which are material for the present purpose. [His Lordship read sections 2 and 4 of the Act and continued:]

Mr. Blease's argument on this part of the case is of this nature: He says that what must be shown is 20 years' uninterrupted user, and that, according to section 4, no act or matter counts as an interruption unless the same shall have been or shall be submitted to or acquiesced in for one year. It follows, says Mr. Blease, that inasmuch as in this case over 19 years' user down to the commencement of the action is proved, the defendant's right is made good inasmuch as there could be no interruption acquiesced in for one year between the date of the commencement of the action and the completion of the full period of 20 years.

In support of that proposition he referred us to the well-known case of Flight v. Thomas.[1] In that case: "A. had the free "access of light and air through a window of his house for nineteen "years and 330 days, and B. then raised a wall which obstructed "the light, and the obstruction was submitted to only for 35 days, "when A. brought an action to remove it." It was held: "that "the right of action was complete; that the twenty years' enjoy-"ment was to be reckoned from the commencement of the "enjoyment to the time of bringing the action; and that an "interruption of the enjoyment, in whatever period of the twenty "years it may happen, cannot be deemed an interruption within "the meaning of the Act, unless it is acquiesced in for a whole "year."

Mr. Blease seeks to apply that to the present case in this way: he says that the commencement of the action constituted an interruption, and that, inasmuch as the action was not commenced until after the alleged easement had been enjoyed for more than 19 years, the interruption so constituted could not last for the required period of one year, so that his title was complete at the time of action brought. In my view that argument cannot prevail. What the Prescription Act requires, as appears from the combined effect of section 2 and section 4, is the full period of 20 years, being "the period next before "some suit or action wherein the claim or matter to which such "period may relate shall have been or shall be brought into "question." The commencement of the suit or action in my view is clearly not an interruption within the meaning of section 4, but is the event marking the date down to which the requisite period of user must be shown. What must be shown is a full 20 years reckoned down to the date of action brought. That must be an uninterrupted period, but in considering whether it is an uninterrupted period or not, interruptions not acquiesced in for at least a year are not to be counted as interruptions.

Accordingly, in my view Mr. Blease's first argument must fail, unless it can be said that the present action was not a suit or action wherein the claim or matter to which the period relates has been brought into question. Mr. Blease suggested that the present action was not such a suit or action. I cannot agree. Substantially the whole subject-matter of the action, as set out in the particulars of claim, concerned the use by the defendant of the plaintiff's drive and the question whether the defendant was entitled to continue the use of it or not. In my view, therefore, this was a suit or action wherein the claim or matter to which the relevant period related was brought into question; and it follows, to my mind, that inasmuch as that action was commenced before the full period of 20 years' user had been completed, the defendant's claim based on prescription must fail.

The view I have formed on that first point makes it unnecessary for me to express any view on the second point, that is to say, Mr. Blease's submission to the effect that if 20 years' user could be made out the fact that such user was referable in its origin to the agreement of 1934 would not prevent it from establishing a prescriptive right. That, on the authorities (and Mr. Blease referred us to some of them) seems to me to be a matter of some difficulty. Mr. Blease has pointed to various observations which appear to afford some support for his view, but on the other hand it would, to my mind, be surprising if in a case such as this a matter which was intended to be a purely personal arrangement of a temporary character between two neighbours as, for example, an arrangement that one can use a way on the other's land until he has a way of his own, should produce, contrary to the intention of either of them, a prescriptive right of way for all time, not merely personal to the party for whose convenience the agreement was made, but, also, enuring for the benefit of anyone for the time being occupying what would then be the dominant tenement.

Be that as it may, the permission given was in fact revoked and the action was brought before the necessary period of 20 years' user had been completed. Accordingly, even if Mr. Blease were right in his submission that an agreement or licence such as this does not affect the running of time, the defendant could not succeed, because the necessary period of user has not been made out. For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

A company of timber importers, merchants and saw millers appealed against a direction that its business premises should be transferred to Part I of the valuation list on the ground that it was not an industrial hereditament, but was a retail shop or "premises of a similar character where retail trade or business . . . "is carried on" within the proviso to section 3 (1) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, as expanded by section 3 (4):—

Held, (1) that the test to be applied in determining whether a hereditament came within the expanded definition of retail shop was twofold: first, the hereditament must be a retail shop or premises of a similar character and, secondly, it must be shown that retail trade or business or transactions of a similar character were carried on there.

(2) That in applying that test the words used in the definition must be given their ordinary every-day meaning.

APPEAL by case stated from decision of Mr. Erskine Simes Q.C., sitting as the Lands Tribunal.

The appellant company, who were timber importers, merchants and saw millers, carried on business in a hereditament situated in Roper Road, Canterbury, which was included in Part II of the valuation list for the county borough of Canterbury, being assessed therein at £436 gross value and £360 rateable value. On March 20, 1953, I. J. Osmond, the valuation officer for the Canterbury valuation area, made a proposal that the hereditament should be transferred to Part I of that list, on the ground that it was not occupied and used as an industrial hereditament within section 3 of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928.[1] The company, who were owner occupiers, served a notice of objection, and the valuation officer appealed to the local valuation court. On November 26, 1953, the local valuation court for East Kent and Canterbury gave directions that the hereditament should be transferred to Part I of the list and therein be assessed at the same figure. The company appealed to the Lands Tribunal and on December 1, 1954, Mr. Erskine Simes Q.C. confirmed the decision of the local valuation court.

The company appealed.

The following facts proved or admitted before the Lands Tribunal were set out in paragraph 8 of the case stated: "(a) The "appellants are timber importers and merchants and saw "millers. (b) The hereditament is registered as a factory

[1] Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, s. 3: "(1) In this "Act the expression 'industrial here-"'ditament' means a hereditament "... occupied and used ... as a "factory or workshop: Provided that "the expression industrial heredita-"ment does not include a here-"ditament occupied and used as a "factory or workshop if it is primarily "occupied and used for the following "purposes or for any combination of "purposes, that is to say: ... "(b) the purposes of a retail shop; "(c) the purposes of distributive whole-"sale business. ... (4) ... 'Retail "'shop' includes any premises of a "similar character where retail trade "or business (including repair work) "is carried on."

" under the Factory and Workshop Acts. (c) Upon the here" ditament the appellants employ a manager, a clerk, five saw" mill operatives, eight general labourers, one of whom is " employed in the saw mill, and one lorry driver. (d) The " appellants import timber and on the hereditament cut and " process about 77 per cent. of it to meet the needs of the " individual customer, the remainder being sold without pro" cessing. (e) The customers of the appellants are as to about
" 92 per cent. builders and as to about eight per cent. merchants
" or factories. The appellants occasionally sell small quantities " of timber to members of the public and dispose of the sawdust
" to butchers. They neither seek nor welcome small customers " and the sales to such customers, and of the sawdust, may be " regarded as negligible. (f) Before incorporating the timber
" purchased from the appellants into a building, the builder has " to do work on the timber to cut and fit it for its place in the " building. (g) There is no window display or show of timber
" to attract prospective purchasers. (h) When in March, 1951,
" the appellants were first granted an import licence after the " war they inserted an advertisement in each of two local papers
" circulating in the district, and these advertisements appeared
" every fortnight until December, 1953."

A copy of the advertisement was attached to the case. Having given the name of the company, which was described as " timber importers and saw millers," and the address, the advertisement continued: " Large stocks of Swedish and Finnish " redwood, imported direct from the Baltic to Ramsgate under " private import licence. Enquiries and inspection invited." The case continued: " At the time when these advertisements first " appeared licences to purchase softwood, which represents over " 93 per cent. of all timber sold by the appellants, could only be " obtained by builders. (i) It is the invariable practice for a " builder to inspect timber at the hereditament before giving an " order unless he knows that he can order a particular brand " of which he has had previous experience. (j) The words " ' Enquiries and inspection invited ' in the advertisements men-" tioned in paragraph (h) referred to such practice. (k) The " usual practice of a builder desiring to purchase timber from " the appellants is to take out from the architect's drawings " details of the timber he requires, to take those details to the " office of the appellants on the hereditament and there obtain " the prices quoted by the appellant company for the timber " required. Not infrequently a verbal order is given which is " subsequently confirmed in writing. If a branded timber can " be obtained the above procedure might take place by telephone " and, in the case of a repeat order, e.g., where a number of " identical houses are being erected, a written order only is " employed. (l) All orders, whether verbal, telephonic or written, " are given at or are sent to the office of the appellant on the " hereditament and the clerk there employed has the duty of " receiving such orders and attending to any person calling at " the office. (m) There is no counter in the office but there is " a sliding window between the office and the passage to which " a visitor gains admission, through which customers can and do " communicate with the clerk referred to in the last preceding " subparagraph. . . . (n) Some of the timber is collected by " purchasers in their own lorries, and the remainder delivered " by the appellant company in their own lorry. In a typical " month 1,736 cubic feet of timber were collected by customers " and 7,263 cubic feet delivered by the appellants. (o) The " hereditament is not a ' retail shop ' in the ordinary meaning of " the words."

The plan attached to the case showed that the hereditament, which covered a considerable area, had a frontage to Roper Road of over 200 ft. and a depth of over 200 ft. A number of buildings was erected on the site, which consisted of several separate sections, the largest of which was where the saw-milling took place. In other parts the timber received by the company was stacked and photographs exhibited to the case showed that in some parts the timber stacks were roofed. A small part of the hereditament near the frontage to Roper Road consisted of the office referred to in paragraph 8 (1).

EVERSHED M.R. The question raised in this appeal as formulated in the special case was " whether the hereditament is within " the meaning of ' premises of a similar character where retail " ' trade or business . . . is carried on ' in section 3 (4) " of the so-called " De-rating " Act, 1928 [the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928]. That question was answered by the Lands Tribunal affirmatively.

At first sight it would appear, applying ordinary standards of common sense and language, that the opposite answer should have been given; for we are here concerned with a hereditament (and there is no question of any division in any material respect between its component parts) which is "occupied" by the company for their business of timber importers and merchants and saw-millers. [His Lordship referred to the plan and photographs of the hereditament as summarized above and continued:]

This considerable area would not appear naturally to fall within the description of a "retail shop," or even of "premises of a "similar character" to a retail shop. But Mr. Browne reminded us that it is unsafe in rating cases to assume that these matters are governed exclusively by the standards of common sense. Further, the phrase "retail shop" in the Act of 1928 is expanded by the definition in section 3 (4) to include "any premises of a "similar character where retail trade or business (including repair "work) is carried on." Nevertheless, I have no less sanction for having some regard to common sense than the speech of Lord Dunedin in Turpin v. Middlesbrough Assessment Committee,[1] one of the series of cases of which the first is Sedgwick v. Watney, Combe, Reid & Co. Ld.[2] Lord Dunedin said[3]: "The matter "seems to me simply a question of attributing an every day "meaning to the words used in the definition."

[His Lordship read the facts recited in the case stated, commenting that having regard to the figures the sales to the public not only might be but must be regarded as negligible. He continued:] Attributing every day meanings to the words used in the statute which I have already mentioned, it would be difficult I should have thought to say that this hereditament was in the least like a "retail shop," even when regard is had to the expansion afforded by the definition. But there has been a number of cases in which consideration has been given to these words; and the Lands Tribunal felt that the effect of those decisions was, contrary to what at any rate would appear to me to be the prima facie conclusion proper to be drawn, that here the conditions of the paragraph were satisfied; in other words, that this hereditament was being used for the purposes of a retail shop, that is, that these were premises of a similar character to a retail shop where retail trade or business was being carried on.

I agree with Mr. Browne that the words in section 3 (1) are "used for . . . the purposes of a retail shop," which no doubt give a somewhat wider effect to the relevant words than if the language had more simply been to the effect that the premises were primarily a retail shop. But before I consider some of the cases and the inferences which ought properly to be drawn therefrom in the present case, I cite and proceed to apply hereafter what Greene L.J. said in Ritz Cleaners Ld. v. West Middlesex Assessment Committee[4]: "Under section 3 of the Act, read in "conjunction with the definition section, a hereditament is not "an industrial hereditament if it is 'primarily occupied and used "'for . . . the purposes of a retail shop including premises of " ' a similar character where retail trade or business (including " ' repair work) is carried on.' Now the premises must be ' of " ' a similar character ' to a retail shop and this similarity must " exist not only with regard to ' retail ' character (which is already " provided for in the words ' retail trade or business ') but also " with regard to ' shop ' character. It is not sufficient that retail " business is carried on upon the premises if the premises are not " a shop or similar to a shop. Now the essential element in a " shop is that people can shop in it ": and then the Lord Justice considered the kind of case in which the operations were not such as would have made it a shop. Greene L.J. was, after all, doing what Lord Dunedin had said should be done—attributing an everyday meaning to the words used. It is, therefore, necessary first of all to see whether, on the facts as here found, this hereditament is a " shop," or has a character " similar to " that of a shop; and I hope I shall not be thought to be speaking too much in the language of assertion if I say again that to my mind it seems quite plain that this hereditament is not, by any ordinary standard or use of language, and notwithstanding anything that has been said in the cases, either a " shop " or a hereditament having a " character similar to " that of a shop.

If the matter were res integra I should be disposed to leave the matter there; but, most properly, Mr. Harvey and Mr. Browne have drawn our attention to other parts of the speech made by Lord Dunedin in the series of cases from which I have already taken one extract; and it is said that according to the authority of those cases the word " shop " really means no more and no less than this: a place where in fact transactions of purchase and sale by retail are carried on; and that here such transactions are in truth carried on.

The series of cases included two which were concerned with garages. In one [Turpin's case [5]] the premises were those of a garage of the character which must bring to the mind of everyone a fairly clear picture. There is an area or space on which repairs to motor-cars are carried on; there are petrol pumps whereat motorists are invited to call and buy petrol; and there are also exhibited for sale and sold all kinds of small accessories; but, as was pointed out, the main activity at the premises then in question (on which the main part of the argument turned) was related to the repair work. I think I may properly say (though all summaries, no doubt, are dangerous without some qualification) that, since the effect of the definition was to include the doing of repairs as part of retail trading for the purposes of the section, therefore a repair shop was a " retail shop," and this garage, being a repair shop, was held to be within the definition.

The case of the other garage [Kaye v. Eyre Bros. Ld. [6]] was perhaps stronger, because the activities conducted thereon were more confined to those of repair, and the sales, whether of petrol or other accessories, were very much smaller. But Lord Dunedin used this language in Turpin's case [7]: "Nor do I agree with the "view that has prevailed as to the effect of the words 'of a "'similar character.' For myself I am unable to state what are "the physical features the existence of which is essential to or "distinctive of a retail shop. I am familiar with many physical "features which are frequently and even commonly found in "retail shops, such as counters and shop windows; but I am "equally familiar with retail shops where no such features exist. "In my opinion it is not possible to say that the words 'of a "'similar character,' even if they include, are limited to, physical "features of the premises. They must, as I read them, include "also similarity of character in other respects. The character of "the premises must be similar to the character of a retail shop. "Now if we compare the hereditament here in question with a "retail shop, do we find any common characteristics? My Lords, "I think we do; for they are both buildings to which the public "can resort for the purpose of having particular wants supplied "and services rendered therein. Moreover, once you include "repair work in the words 'retail trade or business,' it can be "truthfully said that there is a similarity between the type of "business carried on in this building and the type of business "carried on in a retail shop."

Before I comment upon that extract I will refer to one other passage in a later case in the series, Finn v. Kerslake,[8] which related to a wholly different type of business, namely, that of a bakery. The question mainly debated in that case was whether the fact that the greater part of the hereditament was occupied for the purpose of making bread which was later sold in the smaller or (more strictly) "shop" part, qualified the result that primarily the premises were being used for the purposes of a shop, the bakery being, so to speak, merely the supplying end of the shop premises. In the course of the case it was said by Lord Dunedin [9]: "In the present case, the hereditament is all occupied "and used for the one trade or business—namely, a retail trade "or business in bread and confectionery, for it cannot be doubted "that the sale to hotels, clubs, restaurants, etc., is typical retail "trade." That last phrase must be taken in conjunction with the facts as set out in the report of the case in the court below, from which it appears that about half the sales from this bakery were, in the words of the case, "sold to hotels, clubs, etc., for "re-sale." I know not, of course, what discussion upon it took place, and I hope that I shall not be thought in any sense disrespectful of Lord Dunedin if I say that I should not have thought, without very considerable assistance, that selling bread to hotels for re-sale to hotel customers was "typical retail trade." However, Lord Dunedin so stated, in a speech with which all other members of the House concurred. It is, therefore, proper and necessary that faithful acceptance should be given to Lord Dunedin's opinion. But, as in every other case, the judgments of the judges are to be read in relation to the facts of the cases which they are deciding, and in saying so much in connexion with these cases I am doing no more than Lord Thankerton himself did in the House of Lords in 1932 in Toogood & Sons Ld. v. Green.[10] In any event, we are, fortunately, not concerned here with the sale of articles of foodstuffs to hotels and restaurants. Naturally, however, Mr. Browne has relied upon that case to show that the word "shop" must, in its context, not be given a restricted meaning, confined to the sort of premises that are commonly seen in an ordinary shopping street.

I think that Mr. Harvey was well entitled to observe at the beginning of his submission that the court is, in this case and in other like cases, concerned to interpret the words of an Act of Parliament rather than to interpret the words of other judgments in other cases, and it is to be noted that Parliament has not thought fit to define what it meant by "shop," or indeed what it meant by "retail trade or business." As regards "retail shop," therefore, I should assume that no very special or unusual significance was intended by Parliament in using an ordinary English word, and I revert again to what Greene L.J. said,[11] that, as a foundation for any application of the words to particular facts in particular cases, one may safely start by bearing in mind that the essential characteristic of a shop is that people can shop in it, and no one, I think, would really feel very much difficulty in comprehending that phrase.

But, paying respect to the language that I have already read from Lord Dunedin's opinion, it is clear that the matter is not to be determined by mere regard to the physical characteristics or appearance of the premises, nor, of course, to their size. Perhaps the most significant pointer in most cases (and, I will assume, in this case) was that to which Lord Dunedin made express reference and which I can put in the form of a question: Is it a place where the public resort for the purpose of having their particular wants supplied? Lord Dunedin said "can "resort." It was pointed out (I refer again to Toogood's case[12]) that the vital thing is not whether they do resort in fact but whether they really are invited to come; and that inevitably involves some understanding of what one means by the words "the public." It is at this stage that a link, but also (in my view) a distinction, is, or may be, observed between the first part of the requirement of the expanded definition. "'Retail shop' "includes any premises of a similar character," and the second part, "where retail trade or business . . . is carried on"; for it has been the argument of the Crown here that these sales of timber to builders, which represent 92 per cent. of the whole, represent retail trade. As I earlier indicated, it was put very plainly that, according to the Crown's case, where there is retail trade or business being carried on there, prima facie, one has a shop. I am not prepared to accept that: to put it another way, I should regard such a proposition as an oversimplification. If Parliament had wished to say simply that premises ceased to be an industrial hereditament if they were primarily used and occupied for the purposes of conducting retail trade or business, they would have said so. But a double requirement is postulated: there must be a "retail shop," or something like it, and "retail trade or "business" must be "carried on" at the "retail shop."

I will come back in a moment to consider (to the extent to which I feel it proper to do so) the nature of these sales to builders, but to my mind the vital facts found in this case include (and I put it in the forefront among them) the statement which may be extracted from the facts set out in the case, that to any appreciable extent members of the public (as ordinarily understood) are not invited, are not encouraged, to come to these premises, and do not in fact resort to them, except to a negligible extent. I am not thereby saying that builders are not "members "of the public"; no doubt they are; but when Lord Dunedin spoke, in the case I have cited, of members of the public resorting or being invited to resort to a place, he meant to refer, I think, to what one might call the ordinary man in the street—that all and sundry were invited to come. And that, as it seems to me, is significantly not the fact in this case. To that most significant fact may, I think, be added also the other circumstances—the character of the premises; the absence of any sort of display or show of timber to attract prospective purchasers; the characteristics and numbers of the persons employed (a manager, a clerk, saw-mill operatives, general labourers and a lorry driver), and indeed the whole general lay-out and appearance of the place and the nature of the business done; and it will be recalled that that business is conducted substantially at the suit of builders who come and make orders, after inspection, for the purposes of themselves incorporating what they buy in the houses which they are in turn building for others. Whether or not for any purpose these builders can be fairly said to be participating in retail sales, no one, I should have thought, could by any proper use of language say of them, when engaged in these activities, that they were "shopping." In my judgment, therefore, I am in no way being disloyal to anything that fell from Lord Dunedin or departing from his opinion if I say that in my judgment, on the facts which I have mentioned in this case, this hereditament is neither a "retail shop" nor is it a place having "a similar character" thereto.

In opening the case for the Crown, Mr. Harvey placed great emphasis on the distinction between the 92 per cent. of sales to builders and the eight per cent. of sales to the merchants or factories; and he seemed to indicate a possible threat on behalf of the valuation officer that if the court were to hold that the sales to the builders were not retail sales then they must be wholesale operations, and that the victory which the company might gain in the present case would be of a somewhat Pyrrhic character, since the valuation officer would then seek to remove the company from the privileged list on the ground that it was using the hereditament primarily for the purposes of a distributive wholesale business. Again I venture to think that the argument of Mr. Harvey involved an oversimplification, for it took broadly this form: there is, said he, a vital and essential distinction in the Act between manufacturing on the one hand and selling on the other; these two activities must be regarded as mutually exclusive, and if you are selling then you must be selling either wholesale or retail; if you show you are not selling retail, then you must be selling wholesale. I do not think that that is a fair interpretation of the section, and, if the matter had been regarded as susceptible of so simple and short an antithesis, I should have supposed that the Act would have taken a very different form. In any case, as regards wholesale business the words in section 3 (1) (c) are not merely "wholesale" but "distributive wholesale business." I do not say anything about what those words may mean. It may be, as I have said, that for some purposes selling timber to builders for the purposes of being used in building houses can be properly regarded as a retail sale, though I cannot regard as other than fanciful in the extreme the analogy that Mr. Harvey sought to draw between a builder who requires timber of a certain length (so that a foot or two is cut off at the end) and a lady who goes into a draper's shop and orders a few yards of ribbon. But, whether the sales to builders can be for any purposes regarded as "retail" sales or not (and upon that I express no concluded view), and whether builders can be fairly regarded (as I assume for most purposes that they can) as "members of the public," still, for the reasons which I have already tried to state, I do not think that the nature of the operations carried out in the present case, and the invitation for business which the company extended, can fairly be said to involve a "resorting" to its premises by "the public," or an invitation to the public so to resort.

The tribunal, in deciding the present case, followed, and almost inevitably followed—and I say "almost" advisedly—the previous decision of W. S. Shuttleworth (Slough) Ld. v. Lane.[13] The President of the tribunal [Sir William Fitzgerald] used this language in his judgment[14]: "Generally speaking I should say "a wholesale business is a sale in bulk to a person who will sell "the same commodity in retail to several other persons. A sale "in retail is where the purchase is conditioned to the needs of "the individual customer." I do not desire to add attempted definitions of my own to what may already be found in the books; but I am bound to say, with all respect, that I am not satisfied that either of those simple sentences, though they may be useful in particular contexts, should be regarded as exhaustively correct and generally applicable. The first sentence does not indeed seem entirely easy to reconcile with what Lord Dunedin said about the sale of the cakes and buns by the baker to the hotel buyers; but in any case I should have thought that to say that "a sale in retail is where the purchase is conditioned to the needs "of the individual customer" might be an oversimplification of the matter. The President proceeded to hold in that case that the premises (which were also those of timber merchants) were a shop; but upon that matter he relied on one feature in the case which is not to be found in the present case. Thus, it is stated in the headnote: "There was no counter on the premises, but "there was a raised platform where building material was dis-"played for prospective customers to examine"; and that point did undoubtedly influence the President in reaching his conclusion. "Many cases emphasize," he said,[15] "the difficulty of "stating with precision what physical factors constitute a retail "shop. The fact that premises possess a counter does not "necessarily constitute them a retail shop, nor would the absence "of a counter debar them from being considered a retail shop. ". . . I consider the fact that the goods were displayed obviously "to entice customers to come in and purchase them, enables me "to answer this question," that is, whether it is a shop, "in the "affirmative." As I have said, it is expressly found in the present case that there was no similar display to entice or attract prospective customers.

We were also invited to consider and to follow Revenue Officer for Surrey v. Gridley Miskin & Co. Ld.[16] That was a case of timber merchants and in all material respects it may be regarded as parallel, on its facts, with the present case. The Divisional Court, consisting of Lord Hewart C.J., Avory J. and Humphreys J., decided (adversely to the company, Gridley Miskin & Co. Ld.) that the hereditament was not an industrial hereditament. But it does not appear to me that they based their decision on the view that the hereditament there in question was, within the language of section 3 (1) (b) as expanded by the definition in subsection (4), a "retail shop." The contentions for the revenue officer were more generally expressed, as I understand the report, in that it was said that those premises were being used within the terms of paragraph (f) of the subsection, for "other purposes, whether or not similar to any of the fore-"going, which are not those of a factory or workshop." I think that that view follows also from the way in which Mr. Pearson, for the revenue officer, put the argument. He said[17]: "So long

DOLTON BOURNES & DOLTON LD. v. OSMOND.
Evershed M.R.

" as both the primary and the ancillary purposes can be found " upon the hereditament in question, it is unnecessary to fall " back upon tests such as area. This is a timber merchants' " business, and incidentally minor adaptations are carried out for " customers "; and response is found to that argument in this paragraph from the judgment of Lord Hewart C.J.[18]: " I think, " therefore, the true view is that this was a mercantile or com- " mercial undertaking, as distinguished from an industrial " undertaking, and that the sawing and planing which took place " were processes ancillary to the primary business of timber " merchants." At any rate, if the decision of the Divisional Court in that case meant, and was intended to mean, that the hereditament there in question was a " retail shop " within the meaning of the section, I venture to think that it was wrong.

We have been referred to other cases, but I have, I hope, sufficiently referred to such of them as I find it necessary to mention in giving the reasons for my conclusions. I think, for the reasons which I have tried to state, that this hereditament is not being used for the purpose of a " retail shop " within the meaning of the proviso to section 3 (1); and since it seems on the facts quite clear that, unless it is taken out by the proviso, it is within section 3 (1) as an " industrial hereditament," I think that this appeal should be allowed.

JENKINS L.J. I agree, and have very little to add. The question is whether the company's hereditament in Roper Road, Canterbury, is, within the meaning of the proviso to subsection (1) of section 3 of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, " primarily occupied and used for . . . (b) the purposes of a " retail shop." In considering that question regard must be had to the definition of " retail shop " in subsection (4) of the same section, which gives to that expression a somewhat more extended meaning than it would otherwise bear. The definition is in these terms: " ' Retail shop ' includes any premises of a similar " character where retail trade or business (including repair work) " is carried on." The question, therefore, is whether the hereditament is primarily used for the purposes of a retail shop or for the purposes of any premises of a similar character where retail trade or business is carried on.

These words, relatively simple and ordinary words as they are, have been the subject of much judicial discussion, and various attempts have been made to arrive at definitions or expositions of their meaning; but I hope I will not be disrespectful to the learned authors of various observations upon the meaning of this language if I say that to my mind the most helpful observation, in all the wealth of authority to which our attention has been directed, appears in the speech of Lord Dunedin in Turpin v. Middlesbrough Assessment Committee,[19] in the passage to which my Lord has already referred, where he said: "My Lords, the "matter seems to me simply a question of attributing an every- "day meaning to the words used in the definition." One must, therefore, consider the facts and apply an everyday meaning to the words used in the definition, and see whether that everyday meaning, applied to those facts, results in the conclusion that the hereditament is being "primarily occupied and used for the pur- "poses of a retail shop," including in that expression what is included by the definition clause.

[His Lordship described the hereditament and continued:] It is said, as I understand it, that the presence of the small office produces the surprising result that this hereditament is being primarily used for the purposes of premises of a character similar to a retail shop where retail trade is carried on; and the question is whether that, in all the circumstances of the case, is right.

It is not in dispute, and the Lands Tribunal found, that the case did not come within the unexpanded language of section 3 (1) (b). Thus the premises are not being used for the purposes of a retail shop. But it is said that the purposes for which they are used have a sufficient affinity with those of a retail shop to bring the case within the proviso as extended by the definition clause. Now the primary object of the company's use and occupation of this timber-yard is to sell timber: that this is the company's primary object I apprehend admits of no doubt. The use to which the hereditament is put seems to be the storage of stocks of timber, its treatment to suit the needs of customers, and its sale and delivery or despatch to customers. That last operation is "carried on" on the premises in the sense that customers call at the office, state their demands, if so minded inspect the timber available, and place their orders. That, I gather, is the way in which some of the business is done. Alternatively, business may be done over the telephone and confirmed in writing. Timber that has been sold is delivered or despatched to purchasers, sometimes in their own lorries but more frequently in those of the company. So far one reaches the position that sales are effected on these premises and that customers come to these premises to give orders and to inspect the stocks available. But it does not necessarily follow from that that a "retail trade" is being here carried on; and in order to form a view on that question it is necessary to bear in mind these findings of fact in the case. [His Lordship read paragraphs 8 (d), (e), (f) and (g) of the stated case and continued:]

As my Lord has already pointed out, Lord Dunedin, in Turpin's case [20] came to the conclusion that the distinctive characteristic of a "retail shop" was that it should be a building to which the public can resort for the purpose of having particular wants supplied and services rendered therein, and attached little importance to the absence of physical features commonly found in a typical retail shop. I have already said that the company's customers do resort to the hereditament in this case, and I think the question really resolves itself into this: Are the customers so resorting members of the general public who choose to come in and who are invited to come in or welcomed if they come by the company for the purpose of making purchases of such quantities of timber, great or small, as they may think fit? If the timber were in the position of the stock-in-trade of a retail shop, that is what would happen. The general public, including casual passers-by, would come in and be welcomed and make purchases, great or small, according to their needs; but, as will have been seen from the extracts I have read from the facts found, the customers are not members of the general public in this case: they are a limited class, and, with exceptions so small as to be negligible, they consist entirely of trade customers, that is to say builders and merchants and factories, who purchase timber in substantial quantities for the purposes of their respective trades or businesses. So far from inviting, the company is averse to, small orders such as have to be met in the ordinary course of retail trade.

Accordingly, giving the words "retail shop" and "retail "trade" what I understand to be their ordinary significance as ordinary words, I come to the conclusion that, while it is clear that timber is sold by the company on these premises, they are not of such a character, and the company is not carrying out sales of timber in such way or to such customers, as to make it possible to hold that the hereditament is being used "for the purposes "of a retail shop or premises of a similar character where retail "trade or business is carried on," and, accordingly, I agree with my Lord that this appeal should be allowed.

ROMER L.J. I also agree, and I would only say that it appears to me that the most cogent element which makes it impossible to regard these premises as being "of a similar "character to a retail shop" is that the company does not deal, and does not want to deal, with the public as a whole, but substantially confines the invitations to resort to the premises for commercial purposes to a small section of the public, namely, builders. The potential customers do not, in those circumstances, constitute the "people" to whom Greene L.J. referred in Ritz Cleaners Ld. v. West Middlesex Assessment Committee,[21] or "the public" to whom Lord Dunedin referred in the Sedgwick case,[22] but constitute merely a small section, and a specialized section, of the public as a whole. There are other reasons as well, to which my brethren have referred. I think for myself that that is the most important. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Injunction—Nuisance—Trees—Continuing nuisance from roots of trees on adjoining land—Injunction granted.

An injunction will lie to restrain a continuing nuisance to property caused by encroachment by the roots of trees growing on the land of another person.

Dicta in Butler v. Standard Telephones and Cables Ltd. [1940] 1 K.B. 399; 56 T.L.R. 273; [1940] 1 All E.R. 121 and Middleton v. Humphries (1913) 47 Ir.L.T. 160 applied.

ACTION.

The plaintiff and the defendants were respectively the owners of adjoining leasehold properties. The defendants' property lay to the south of the plaintiff's property; it stood in three-quarters of an acre of land and was bounded on the north by the plaintiff's property.

The plaintiff claimed that the roots of trees growing on the defendants' land had encroached on his land and had undermined the foundations of his house, and had so withdrawn the moisture underneath the foundations that the clay soil had shrunk and caused considerable damage to his property by settlement. The plaintiff claimed damages and an injunction to restrain the defendants from allowing the continuance of a nuisance and a trespass by the abstraction of water from the plaintiff's land caused by the encroachment of the roots of the trees growing on the defendants' property. (The second defendant, who was a joint holder of the lease with the first defendant, was added at the trial by amendment.)

The defendants did not dispute the fact of the settlement, but contended that this was caused by water in the soil rather than the extraction of water from it; and that the soil, being boulder clay which was on a considerable slope, was particularly prone to bring about settlements, and that many of the houses in the immediate neighbourhood had suffered in this way.

McCombe v. Read.

The plaintiff's and the defendants' houses were built in about 1912 and 1904 respectively. On the defendants' land there was an old black Italian poplar tree, planted before either house was built, and adjoining the boundary between the properties there was a row of Lombardy poplars planted at the time when the plaintiff's house was built. The distance of the trees from the plaintiff's house was from 9 to 25 feet.

In 1949 cracks appeared in the walls and ceilings of the plaintiff's house. A builder who was called in suspected from experience that tree roots were the cause of the trouble, and on making excavations found the ground very dry and poplar roots running under the foundations. Underpinning was carried out at a cost of £678 which was claimed as damages in the action. In 1952 and 1953, after the issue of the writ, further settlements occurred, and the specifications for the further necessary work, which had not been carried out at the date of the trial, amounted to £1,032.

A surveyor and forestry expert called for the plaintiff expressed the opinion that the subsidence was due to the abstraction of water from the clay soil by the poplar roots, which spread very widely and would grow under any barrier which might be put in the soil. Witnesses called for the defence stated that the district, owing to the subsoil of boulder clay, was particularly liable to subsidence, and that a number of neighbouring houses had been so damaged.

Cur. adv. vult

May 9. Harman J. reading his judgment after stating the facts: In this state of the evidence, does the plaintiff prove his case? In my judgment he does. I have on the one hand evidence of two persons; one an experienced builder and the other a man who has made a special study of the subject, and both of whom made a careful examination of the locus in quo, that the cause of the subsidence of the plaintiff's house is the exhaustion of water from the boulder clay by the roots of the trees growing on the defendant's property. On the other hand, I have testimony from persons with wide local experience who assert that owing to local conditions houses are very prone to subsidence in this immediate area. In addition, one of them advanced the opinion that, though the trees might have contributed, the soil (that is to say, the nature of it, I suppose) was the main cause of the trouble. It is to be observed that neither of these people had examined the plaintiff's property and that the first defendant, though given an opportunity to do so, did not by himself or any of his advisers take advantage of the opening up of the ground and he has no one but himself to blame that the evidence about the state of things immediately round and under the plaintiff's house is all one side.

In my judgment, I must prefer the evidence for the plaintiff. This house had apparently not proved unstable for thirty-five years and it would, in my judgment, be fanciful to reject as a cause of the trouble the impact of the roots of these poplars. This, after all, is a well-known source of trouble where houses are built on a clay soil. Accordingly, in my judgment, the plaintiff proves his case. To what remedy is he entitled?

It is very old law that if my neighbour's trees encroach on my ground, either by overhanging boughs or by undermining roots, I may cut the boughs or the roots so far as they are on my side of the boundary. In Lemmon v. Webb [1] it was pointed out in the Court of Appeal that this kind of encroachment is not a trespass which may ripen into a right in the course of time, but is a nuisance which raises a cause of action only on proof of damage. Moreover, the case decides that the nuisance may be abated without notice.

Following on this, a Divisional Court in Smith v. Giddy,[2] granted a new trial where a county court judge had held that the only remedy of an adjoining landowner was to lop the trees and that an action on the case would not lie. It is clear, therefore. that an action for damages will lie in these circumstances, but there appears to be no English decision where an injunction has been granted.

In a recent case, Butler v. Standard Telephones and Cables Ld.,[3] the plaintiffs claimed damages for the abstraction of water from under their houses by the roots of poplar trees and were held entitled to them. It is, however, noticeable that in that action the plaintiffs claimed an injunction but apparently abandoned that part of the claim at the trial. Lewis J., however, in his judgment mentioned with approval the Irish case of Middleton v. Humphries,[4] where the Chancery judge in Ireland apparently had no doubt that an injunction could be granted.

In my opinion this must be right. If an action on the case will lie, then the remedy of injunction must be available if the nuisance be a continuing one, as is clearly the case here. It could not be right to throw upon the plaintiff the burden of watching for further subterranean encroachment. In my judgment, however, the plaintiff is not entitled to an unqualified injunction, for he has no remedy unless a nuisance be caused. The injunction will therefore be to restrain the defendants from allowing the roots from any tree on their property so to encroach on the plaintiff's land as to cause a nuisance.

McCombe v. Read.

Harman J.

There remains the question of damages. The defendants were willing to submit, if wrong in law, to judgment for the amount claimed as special damage, namely, £678 1s. 0d. The plaintiff, however, seeks to recover damage discovered on the 1952 and 1953 inspections and, which has occurred since the issue of the writ. If this be new damage he cannot do that, but if it be continuing damage from the same nuisance then he can recover the damage accruing up to the date of judgment.

On the evidence I am of opinion that the damage is all one. It is true that the builder in 1950 dug a trench round the house five feet deep and cut off the ends of the roots which he found, but the exhaustion of water from the clay soil underlying the house would continue as the evidence shows and the further subsidence would result from that. There is, however, a doubt introduced by the evidence of Mr. Reeves who, with his wide local experience, suggested that the underpinning done in 1950 was the wrong treatment and that this may have caused or at least contributed to the further settlement.

I am, therefore, not in a position to say that the defendants must be liable for the whole aggregate damage and I put the plaintiff to his election either to have judgment now for the sum specified in his claim or to take an inquiry as to damage which in this Division, I suppose, will be referred to the official referee. On that inquiry it will be open to the defendants to suggest that at any rate part of the damage was caused by ill-judged operations in 1950. I do not find that that was so, but am of opinion that it is a consideration still open to the defendants to put forward.

There will be an injunction to restrain the defendants by themselves, their servants or agents from causing or permitting the roots of trees growing on their property to encroach on the property of the plaintiff so as to cause a nuisance to the plaintiff's property.

[After discussion Harman J. ordered an inquiry as against the first defendant only as to the whole of the damage caused by the nuisance, the costs of which were reserved.]

Judgment for the plaintiff; injunction granted against both defendants; inquiry as to damage ordered against the first defendant.

SUMMONS.

The plaintiffs sued the defendant for money owing under a contract whereby the plaintiffs had agreed to build a house for the defendant. By his defence the defendant pleaded, inter alia, that the house built by the plaintiffs was defective in some 27 particulars. The action was referred to an official referee, and on October 8, 1954, pursuant to R.S.C., Ord. 37A,[1] and with the consent of the parties, the official referee made an order appointing a court expert in the cause, "to inquire and report "upon the questions set out in the schedule hereto . . . and to "report to the court by marking upon the schedule his answers "to the questions set out in the 8th, 9th and 10th columns of "the schedule." The schedule was a "Scott" schedule. It contained the 27 items referred to in the defence, and the defendant's comments thereon, and the 8th, 9th and 10th columns were headed respectively "Defects in the Work," "Cost of "Remedying Defects," and "Observations." The court expert visited the house and wrote remarks in the 8th, 9th and 10th columns of the schedule. He also appended to the end of the schedule two paragraphs which began "I am of opinion that "defendant has generally been given a very inferior job, and "that the mental anxiety and perturbation consequent thereon "are not of his own making."

The paragraphs also contained a reference to a letter written by the court expert to the clerk to the official referee. In that letter the court expert repeated the statement that the defendant had received poor work generally, and further stated certain criticisms concerning the architectural services which the defendant had received under the contract. The completed schedule and the letter were received by the clerk to the official referee on Sale of Goods—F.O.B.—Construction of contract—Goods "afloat per "S.S. Morton Bay due London approximately 8th June"—Whether mere identification of ship and goods or condition of contract.

A contract for the sale of 5,064 cases of Australian peaches provided, inter alia: "Price—1s. 7¾d. per lb. ex Chambers Cold "Store, London; 28 days free rent from date of arrival. . . . Ship- "ment and destination—afloat per S.S. Morton Bay due London "approximately 8th June." At the date of the contract the ship was advertised as due to arrive in London on June 19, 1954. She in fact reported in London on June 21, 1954, and the buyers refused to accept delivery:—

Held, that the words "due London approximately 8th June" formed a condition of the contract in that they were part of the description of the goods and not, as contended by the sellers, merely words identifying the ship and the voyage on which the goods were being imported. Accordingly, the buyers were entitled to reject the goods.

SPECIAL CASE by an umpire.

On June 1, 1954, Howard Ross & Co. Ld. agreed to buy from MacPherson Train & Co. Ld. 5,064 cases of Australian quick frozen sliced peaches in syrup. "Price—1s. 7¾d. per lb., ex "Chambers Cold Store, London; 28 days' free rent from day of

[Reported by G. D. BLACK, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

" arrival . . . Shipment and destination—afloat per S.S. Morton " Bay due London approximately 8th June . . . Delivery—to be " effected to buyers as follows: 1,250 cases immediately on " arrival. Balance in equal quantities in intervals of seven days."

In a published itinerary the owners of the ship stated on March 3, 1954, that the due date of arrival of the ship in London was June 8, 1954, but by May 31, 1954, the day before the contract, the ship had fallen behind schedule and in the published itinerary of that date the ship was stated due in London on June 19. The ship was reported in London on June 21, 13 days late from her due date as stated in the contract. Subsequent delivery of the goods was refused by the buyers.

The matter was referred to arbitration and the umpire stated a special case.

Miss Dorothy Knight Dix for the sellers.
Frederick Hallis for the buyers.

McNair J. stated the facts, and continued: The matter was referred to arbitration, and the umpire was asked apparently by both parties to state his award in the form of a special case for the decision of the court. It is not very clear what are the precise questions of law which are submitted, but from paragraph 8 and paragraph 10 it is clear that both the buyers and the sellers request that the award should be so stated as to raise the question of law whether on the true construction of the contract the buyers were entitled to reject the goods tendered.

One of the contentions put forward by the buyers in support of their case was: " 9 (a): that it was a condition of the contract " that the goods were afloat per S.S. Morton Bay due approxi- " mately 8th June." On the other hand, the sellers on that point contended, in paragraph 6 (a), " that the goods sold were, under " the express terms of the contract, described as ' afloat per S.S. " ' Morton Bay due approximately 8th June ': these words " identified the ship and the voyage on which the goods were " being imported and the 8th June was not, and was not intended " to be, a delivery date."

The first question which arises on this award is whether or not this court takes the view that the words " due London approxi- " mately 8th June " were merely words which, as the sellers contend, identified the ship and the voyage on which the goods were being imported, or whether, as the buyers contend, they formed a condition of the contract in the sense that they were in effect part of the description of the goods. It seems to me that it is plain that they must be taken as part of the description of the goods as soon as it is admitted, as it was properly admitted, that the words " afloat per S.S. Morton Bay " are part of the description of the goods. Once it is admitted, as it must be admitted, that if the goods had not been shipped by the Morton Bay but by some other ship a fundamental term of the contract would be thereby broken, it follows necessarily that the whole of that phrase is also part of a description of the goods. There is good commercial sense in that, inasmuch as a description of the goods as being "afloat per S.S. Morton Bay due "approximately 8th June" does give the buyers, not an absolute guarantee of arrival on June 8, but at least some indication of the date on which they may be expected to be in London.

MACPHERSON TRAIN & CO. LD. v. HOWARD ROSS & CO. LD.

Another form of description which has come before the court in other well-known cases is a description of the goods as being shipped or to be shipped on a certain ship "expected ready to "load on" a certain date. There is no doubt at all that in a contract containing such a phrase those words "expected ready "to load" are part of the description and are not merely an identification of the voyage upon which the ship was. I feel no difficulty in holding that the words "due London approximately "8th June" made it a condition of the contract that the goods should be shipped on a ship of which it could truly be said at the date of the contract that she was due to arrive on approximately June 8, 1954; and having regard to the umpire's finding that on the published itinerary dated May 31, 1954, that is the day before the contract, the ship was stated to be due in London on June 19, it is also clear that that condition was broken, with the result that the buyers, when they had tendered to them goods which did not correspond with that description, were entitled to reject.

Award in favour of buyers upheld.

Sale of Goods—C.I.F.—Cancelling clause—Prevention of shipment by specified clause—Whether seller must prove impossibility of purchasing goods afloat—Prohibition of export—Extension "by two "months."

Commercial Court—Practice—Declaratory judgment—Value of.

The seller under a c.i.f. contract can perform his contract either by shipping himself or by his agents goods in accordance with the contract during the contract period or by purchasing goods afloat which have been shipped during the contract period.

[Reported by JAMES ROCHFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Generally a seller cannot claim the protection of a clause which provides for cancellation of the contract if shipment is prevented by a specific cause unless he proves both that he was himself so prevented from shipping and that it was impossible for him to fulfil the contract by buying appropriate goods afloat which had been shipped during the contract period.

A written contract dated November 27, 1950, for the sale of 100 tons Egyptian washed cottonseed oil to be shipped during the months of December, 1950/January, 1951, from Alexandria, at a price of £146 10s. per ton c.i.f. Rotterdam contained this clause:

"Should the shipment be delayed by . . . prohibition of "export . . . the time of shipment shall be extended by two "months. Should the delay exceed two months, buyers shall have "the option of cancelling the contract forthwith or accepting the "goods for shipment as soon as possible. . . . The option to be declared as soon as shippers announce their inability to ship . . ."

The sellers had previously purchased 200 tons of that commodity from sellers in Egypt who held a valid but withdrawable export licence from the Egyptian Government.

On December 12, 1950, the export of all cottonseed oil was prohibited by the Egyptian Government. On January 3, 1951, the licence granted to the original sellers was renewed. On February 17 the export of cottonseed oil was again prohibited and the prohibition continued until the end of April. On February 22 the sellers notified the buyers of this; the buyers claimed that the sellers were in default:—

Held, that in their contract the parties had in terms and designedly provided protection for the sellers where shipping of the goods by the sellers was delayed, and that the sellers had no need to prove that they were unable to purchase goods afloat which were unaffected by the prohibition; and that, on a true construction of the contract, the sellers were not in default.

Special case stated by the Appeals Committee of the London Oil and Tallow Trades Association.

The contract between the parties was made on Form 5*a* of the London Oil and Tallow Trades Association, which is the appropriate form for contracts for oriental oils c.i.f. terms continental, dated November 27, 1950. By that contract Fairclough Dodd & Jones Ld. (the sellers) sold to J. H. Vantol Ld. (the buyers), according to the rules of the London Oil and Tallow Trades Association, "100 tons Egyptian washed cotton-"seel oil f.f.a. . . . good merchantable quality, packed in sound "drums. To be shipped during the months of December 1950/ "January 1951 from Alexandria," at a price of £146 10s. per ton c.i.f. Rotterdam. The contract contained, inter alia, the following clauses. Clause 2: "Particulars of shipment, with date of "bill or bills of lading, marks and numbers of drums (if any) to "be duly declared by the original seller in writing with due "dispatch, but not later than 42 days from the date of the bill "of lading." Clause 11: "A. In the event of war, hostilities "or blockade preventing shipment this contract or any unfulfilled "part thereof shall be cancelled. If required sellers must pro-"duce proof to justify cancellation. B. Should the shipment be " delayed by fire, strikes, lockouts, prohibition of exports, riots, " or revolution, or any other cause comprehended in the term " force majeure other than war, hostilities, blockade, the time of " shipment shall be extended by two months. Should the delay " exceed two months, buyers shall have the option of cancelling " the contract forthwith or accepting the goods for shipment as " soon as possible, but should the shipment not be possible within " eight months from the date of shipment originally stipulated, " contract to be void. The option to be declared as soon as " shippers announce their inability to ship within the extended " period of two months, a reasonable time being allowed for " passing on such announcements. Should buyers fail to " exercise their option in due time, contract to be void. If " required sellers must produce proof to justify their claim for " cancellation or extension."

On September 27, 1950, the Egyptian Salt & Soda Co. Ld. obtained a licence from the Egyptian authorities to export at least 200 tons of cottonseed oil. That licence was valid until December 26, 1950, but was subject to a term that it might be withdrawn at any time. On November 10, the sellers first purchased 200 tons of the commodity in question from the Egyptian Salt and Soda Co. Ld., the contract providing for 100 tons to be shipped during December and 100 tons during December/January. The terms were that the shipment was to be f.o.b. Alexandria and that freight was to be provided by the buyer for shipment to Rotterdam. On the same day they entered into an agreement to sell 100 tons to the Irish Oil & Cake Mills Ld. c.i.f. Rotterdam to be ready for shipment the first half of December and to be shipped by the first available steamer. Seventeen days later on November 27, they agreed to sell 100 tons of cottonseed oil to the buyers to be shipped December/January c.i.f. Rotterdam. On December 12 the Egyptian Government imposed a ban on export of cottonseed oil which applied even in the case of parties who had existing licences, and on December 14 the Egyptian Salt & Soda Co. Ld. notified the sellers that they were unable presently to ship. The Egyptian Salt & Soda Co. Ld. had previously made arrangements to ship these 200 tons which they had sold to the sellers and had booked space on board the S.S. Mentor, the booking stating that the Mentor was due to load on December 20. On January 3, as a result of persuasion and pressure brought to bear by the Egyptian Salt & Soda Co. upon the Egyptian authorities, their licence was renewed for a period of three months. The award further found that goods of the contract description and quality were available for shipment between January 4 and January 31.

The Egyptian Salt and Soda Co. Ld. were minded to ship the first 100 tons by the end of January and the balance during February, and on January 30 in pursuance of that intention they shipped 100 tons under their contract with the sellers, who appropriated that 100 tons to their first contract with the Irish Oil & Cake Mills. On February 17, however, the ban was reimposed by the Egyptian authorities and that ban remained in force until the end of April, 1951. Thus from January 3 until February 17 the ban was off but was then reimposed. On February 22 the sellers notified the buyers of this reimposition of the ban and the buyers claimed that the sellers were in default. The award also stated that there was no evidence given by the sellers that goods of the contract quality and description could not have been obtained afloat.

In those circumstances, the buyers' contentions, as expressed in the award, were (inter alia) as follows: "The imposition of "the ban on the export of cottonseed oil on December 12, 1950, "did not of itself bring into operation the provisions of the force "majeure clause entitling the sellers to an extension of two "months. To bring the said clause into operation the ban must "cause such delay as to prevent shipment at any time during the "contract period. The sellers could have shipped the goods "between January 4 and January 31. They did in fact (on their "own admission) ship goods of the contract description and of the "required quantity during that period to Irish Oil & Cake Mills "Ld. The decision of the sellers to allocate the last mentioned "goods to Irish Oil & Cake Mills Ld., and not to the buyers "was an arbitrary one."

The sellers contended, inter alia, as follows: (1) Since the sellers had made all arrangements to ship the goods by S.S. Mentor due to load on December 20, shipment was delayed (within the meaning of clause 11B of the contract) by the prohibition on export imposed by the Egyptian Government on December 12, 1950. Consequently the sellers obtained (by virtue of that clause) an extension of two months, that is to say, the shipping period was extended until the end of March. (2) Whether it is held that the sellers' time for shipment was extended for the month of February by agreement on January 4 —that referred to an issue in the arbitration which was decided against the sellers—or was extended until the end of March by virtue of clause 11B, the sellers' time for shipment had not expired when the second ban came into operation, on February 17, 1951. Consequently the sellers were not in default. (3) There was no obligation on the sellers to buy goods afloat as contended by the buyers. The question of whether or not the sellers could have bought goods afloat is immaterial since their time for shipment had been extended.

The appeals committee of the London Oil and Tallow Trades Association affirmed the decision of the original umpire and made an award in favour of the sellers subject to the decision of the court on the question of law whether on the facts found and on the true construction of the contract between the parties the sellers were in default.

J. H. VANTOL LD. v. FAIRCLOUGH DODD & JONES LD.

A. A. Mocatta Q.C. and John Donaldson, for the buyers, cited Ross T. Smyth & Co. Ld. (Liverpool) v. W. N. Lindsay Ld. (Leith) [1] and Samuel Sanday & Co. v. Cox, McEuen & Co. [2]

T. G. Roche Q.C. and A. J. Bateson, for the sellers, were not called upon.

McNAIR J. stated the facts and continued: The real issue which I have to determine on the argument of this special case is whether the sellers, on the facts found by the appeals committee, are entitled to the protection of paragraph B of clause 11.

It is well settled law that normally in the case of a c.i.f. contract that contract can be performed by the seller in one of two ways: either (1) by shipping himself or by his agents contract goods during the period stipulated for shipment by the contract and tendering the appropriate bills of lading; or (2) he can purchase goods afloat which have been so shipped. Generally, a seller cannot claim the protection of the clause which provides that the contract shall be cancelled if shipment is prevented by certain specific clauses unless he proves both (a) that he was himself so prevented from shipping and (b) that it was impossible for him to fulfil the contract by buying goods afloat which had been shipped during the contract period.

In those circumstances, in the argument before me Mr. Mocatta in substance took the following two points; first, that as a matter of construction the expression "should shipment be "delayed" in paragraph B of clause 11 means "should ship- "ment be delayed during the whole of that part of the contract "period which remains after the cause of delay has come into "force," while conceding that in a case of delay caused by prohibition of export the delay might continue for some time after the prohibition had been removed; secondly, that in any event the seller, in order to obtain the protection of that clause, must prove that there was no possibility of purchasing goods afloat which had been shipped before the prohibition came into effect.

In support of the first contention it was argued that the contrary construction would lead to the result that if, for example, the prohibition of export only operated for the first week of December, that being the period contemplated for shipment by the seller, the seller would be entitled to an extension of two months, i.e., on the conditions of this contract, an extension down to the end of March, which it was said was wholly unreasonable. I am by no means satisfied that such a result would be unreasonable as I can well imagine that the parties familiar with the trade who drew up this contract—which it is to be remembered may provide for a period of shipment extending over many months—may have taken the view that such an extension would afford a reasonable time to make alternative arrangements. In any event, even on the buyers' construction, the prohibition only operating for the final week of the contract period would produce very much the same anomaly. Furthermore, it has always to be borne in mind that this clause 11 works both ways. It does not always work in favour of the seller because it imposes on the seller the obligation to effect delivery during the two months which follow the contract period, which may be very onerous upon him if during that time the market has risen substantially.

It was further argued in support of the first contention that the second sentence of the clause, which starts with the words "should the delay exceed two months," points clearly to the conclusion that the clause contemplates a delay which initially continues throughout the remaining part of the contract period. I am unable to accept that submission since it is clear that on either of the suggested constructions the particular phrase "should the delay exceed two months" cannot be given effect to according to its literal and grammatical meaning, but it must be regarded as an expression meaning "if the cause of "delay continues to operate during the two months by which "the period of shipment has been extended." In my judgment, as a matter of construction, there is no justification for reading into the first sentence of this paragraph the words "during that "part of the contract period which remains after the cause of "delay has come into force." So to read it would, in my opinion, be, in effect, to read the word "delayed" as if it were "prevented" and thus to disregard the marked contrast between the use of the phrase "preventing shipment" in the immediately preceding sentence and the phrase "shipment being delayed" in the paragraph in question.

As to the second contention, viz., that the sellers have to show that they could not buy goods afloat, it seems to me that the use of the phrase "the shipment" coupled with the later phrase "as "soon as the shippers announce their inability to ship" in the last sentence of this paragraph points clearly to the conclusion that in this particular contract the parties are in terms and designedly providing protection for the seller in a case where the first method of performing his c.i.f. obligation (namely, shipping by himself or by his agents) is delayed. In my judgment this clause will not work in any business sense if it were held that the seller, in addition to proving that the contemplated shipment was delayed, had further to prove that he was unable to purchase goods afloat which were unaffected by the prohibition.

I have reached the same conclusion about the effect of the clause as was reached by the two trade bodies of arbitration by whom this matter has been considered and the result is that, in my judgment, on the facts found and on the true construction of the contract, the sellers were not in default. Accordingly, the award takes effect with the consequences there stated.

McNair J.

I cannot, however, part with this case without making one comment. This matter arose out of events which took place in the months of December, 1950, and January/February, 1951, and it has taken until May, 1955, to reach this court. I have little doubt that if the parties had been minded to make use of the machinery of this court in January or February of 1951 the whole matter could have been disposed of in two or three months, and, indeed, it would have been quite possible, and it seems to me businesslike, since there was this dispute between the parties about the effect of that contract, to ask this court for a declaratory judgment, which could have been given with possibly a delay of a week or so even while the contract was still running.

Factory—Staircase—Hand-rails—"Condition of surface of steps"—"Special circumstances . . . specially liable to cause accidents"—Construction—Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 25 (2).

Section 25 (2) of the Factories Act, 1937, requires that a substantial hand-rail shall be provided on both sides of a staircase which "owing to the . . . condition of the surface of the steps or "other special circumstances, is specially liable to cause accidents."

A staircase in a factory had a hand-rail on one side and on the other a rail so close to the wall that it could not be gripped. The top sill of the staircase had a three-inch metal edge which had worn smooth and shiny. Near the staircase was a hatchway from which grease in containers was issued from time to time. The stairs were kept well cleaned, no grease had ever been seen on them, and no accident had occurred and no complaint been made of the condition of the stairs during fifteen years of use.

On August 12, 1953, a workman slipped on an isolated piece of grease on the top sill and broke his leg. In an action against his employers for negligence and breaches of statutory duties, the trial judge held that the employers were liable only for breach of their duty under subsection (2) of section 25 of the Act of 1937. On appeal by the employers:—

Held, that the employers had not been in breach of their duty under the subsection. The words "specially liable" meant "more "than usually liable," and "special circumstances" implied circumstances continually or frequently arising such as would render the staircase specially liable to cause accidents; and that there was nothing in the history or condition of this staircase to bring it within the purview of the subsection, and to require the permanent protection afforded by two hand-rails.

Appeal allowed.

Decision of Oliver J. reversed.

APPEAL from Oliver J.

The plaintiff, Frederick Thomas Harris, an electrician's mate, was employed by the defendants at premises to which the Factories Act, 1937, applied. On August 12, 1953, he had occasion to go to the stores which were on the first floor and reached by an iron staircase, each tread of which had indentations; but the very top sill of the stair, which was level with the first floor, had a three-inch smooth metal edge which was in fact part of the supporting girder. Beyond the metal edge was a concrete floor. The staircase had two hand-rails, one on the open side and the other on the side next to a corrugated iron wall, but so close to the wall that it could not be gripped.

As the plaintiff was going down the stairs, he slipped on a piece of grease lying on the top sill of the stair and broke his leg. He brought an action against his employers, claiming damages (a) for negligence at common law; (b) for breach of statutory duty under section 25 (1) [1] of the Factories Act, 1937; (c) for breach of statutory duty under section 25 (2) in that the staircase was specially liable to cause accidents because the top was slippery and oil and grease were carried down the staircase and were liable to fall on the steps and make them slippery, and yet no suitable and substantial hand-rail was provided and maintained on both sides; and (d) for breach of duty under section 26 (1) in failing to provide safe access to the plaintiff's work.

At the hearing before Oliver J. evidence was given that the staircase had been put up in 1938, and that there had never before been an accident of any kind on the staircase; that it was kept well cleaned by a special rota of men; that apart from the one piece of grease on the evening of the accident no grease had ever been seen on the stairs at any time, either before or after the accident; that, although there was an active safety and welfare committee operating in the factory, no complaint had ever been made about the condition of this staircase, and that while grease and oil were from time to time issued to workmen from the stores hatchway near the staircase, these were normally issued in 7 lb. or 14 lb. containers.

Oliver J. on March 15, 1955, giving judgment, said that he was satisfied that this was an extremely well run factory, and held that the employers had not been guilty of any negligence at common law. He held, too, that there had been no breach of section 25 (1) of the Act of 1937, since the staircase was of sound construction and properly maintained; and similarly, that there was no breach of section 26 (1); but taking into account the condition of extreme shinyness and polish of the top of the stair, in proximity to the hatchway from which grease was issued from time to time, the judge held that the staircase was one specially liable to cause accidents, and that, as a hand-rail tight against the wall was not a properly constructed hand-rail, the employers must be held liable for breach of the duty under subsection (2) of section 25. He awarded the plaintiff £520 4s. 7d., including £170 4s. 7d. special damages.

The employers appealed.

T. Michael Eastham for the employers.

E. Martin Jukes Q.C. and Malcolm Morris for the workman.

The following cases were referred to in the argument: Latimer v. A. E. C. Ld.[2]; Protheroe v. Railway Executive.[3]

DENNING L.J. stated the facts and continued: Section 25 (2) of the Factories Act, 1937, provides: "For every staircase in a "building or affording a means of exit from a building, a "substantial hand-rail shall be provided and maintained, which, "if the staircase has an open side shall be on that side, and, in "the case of a staircase having two open sides,"—that is not this case—"or in the case of a staircase which, owing to the "nature of the construction thereof or the condition of the "surface of the steps or other special circumstances, is specially "liable to cause accidents, such a hand-rail shall be provided and "maintained on both sides."

The judge said that the "condition of the surface" of the steps was faulty in that the top sill was shiny and highly polished owing to user; and that there were "special circumstances" in that there was a hatchway a couple of feet away from which grease was periodically issued. He held, therefore, that there ought to have been two hand-rails.

On reviewing the evidence, I find myself unable to agree with the judge's view. I do not think that he has given sufficient effect to the words of the subsection "specially liable." It is only when the condition of the surface of the steps or other special circumstances render it specially liable to cause accidents that two hand-rails must be provided.

I will take the two points in order. 1. The "condition of the "surface" of the stairs. I can well see that if the steps had become so slippery as to be a real danger, there ought to be two hand-rails; but the evidence falls far short of that. The cogent factor to my mind is that ever since 1938 until this accident in 1953, that is, 15 years, there has never been a single accident on these stairs at all, nor indeed on the 14 similar stairs in this factory; and, although there are safety committees of the men, there has never been any suggestion by anyone that there was anything in these steps making them specially liable to cause accidents. I take it that "specially liable" means more than usually liable, and I do not see how one can say that the condition of the steps is specially liable to cause accidents when no accident has happened for all these years.

2. "Special circumstances." The mere fact that there was a hatchway was not likely to cause danger. The grease was always issued in tins from which it was not likely to escape. This one piece of grease was the only piece of grease that had ever been known to be on the steps all the time that the staircase had been there. I cannot see that that is a special circumstance requiring a double hand-rail. "Special circumstances" must be something which is being continually repeated or so often repeated as to be specially liable to cause accidents, so that a permanent protection is necessary. That is not the case here.

On all the evidence in this case I come to a different conclusion from the judge. I cannot see any evidence that there was anything specially liable to cause accidents in this case, and therefore there was no statutory obligation to have a double hand-rail. I would allow the appeal.

BIRKETT L.J. The obligation on the employers, which the judge held had not been fulfilled by the employers, is that imposed by section 25 (2) to provide a hand-rail and maintain it on both sides in certain circumstances.

According to the section, the hand-rail may be necessary because of the construction of the staircase. Upon that the judge made a finding with regard to section 25 (1) (the exact wording of which is "All floors, steps, stairs, passages and gangways shall "be of sound construction and properly maintained") that the plaintiff had no cause of action, that is to say, that there was no fault to be found with the construction or with the maintenance.

The second matter under subsection (2) is "or the condition "of the surface of the steps." It was not argued before the judge that this particular strip of three inches, a very small thing indeed, which is actually on the floor leading down to the first step of the staircase, was not to be considered as part of the steps. It might possibly have been argued that the strip was part of the concrete floor and not the surface of the steps; but the point was not taken. For my own part, I think that section 25 (2), when it specifies "the condition of the surface "of the steps," is dealing with the staircase as a whole where there are highly polished wood treads or metal treads, or a surface which is in some way rather treacherous. But that particular matter was not argued, and it was taken that this was

HARRIS
v.
RUGBY PORTLAND CEMENT CO. LD.

to be regarded as a step, and this three inches of metal which the judge found was polished and shiny was a part of one of the steps.

The third matter under subsection (2) is "or other special "circumstances" making it "specially liable to cause accidents." It is on this third matter that the judge came to his conclusion.

Mr. Martin Jukes said that we were to consider three questions. First, did the judge direct himself properly when considering section 25 (2)? We do not really know how he directed himself, because he merely recited the section and then said: "Now, the question I have to decide is whether this is a "staircase which, while having only one open side, nevertheless, "owing to the condition of the surface of the steps or other "special circumstances, is specially liable to cause accidents." That, of course, is merely paraphrasing the wording of the section.

Then, Mr. Martin Jukes said, the second question is: are the answers which the judge gave justified by the evidence? and, thirdly, on those answers, was there a breach by the defendants? As I understand it, all that the judge has done is to say that this little three-inch strip made this staircase a staircase "specially "liable to cause accidents," because of the highly polished bar or threshold at the top; and all the controversy that went on about the presence or absence of grease, the proximity of the hatchway from which the grease was issued and so on, does not really seem to have very much bearing, except as a sort of supplementary factor in the "special circumstances."

I have felt in this case that when there is a staircase of this kind, one must have regard to its history. The plaintiff had been using it himself for four years, and others had been using it for very much longer—since 1938. [His Lordship referred to the evidence as to the plaintiff's use of the staircase over four years, and the fact that there had been no other accident and no complaint about the condition of the staircase, and continued:] In my view, it is tremendously difficult to say that a staircase is "specially liable to cause accidents" when one has testimony of that kind about this very staircase, used by the plaintiff himself for four years, and used by other people between forty and fifty times a day since 1938. If those facts are proved, it really strains language to say in the same breath: "Yes; never- "theless this staircase was 'specially liable to cause accidents.'"

Mr. Martin Jukes very bravely tried to meet that situation by citing a case in which he was concerned yesterday. No doubt cases come to the mind in which a state of affairs has gone on for a very long time without any accident at all, and then there is an accident; but, with great respect to Mr. Jukes, that is not the point which we have to determine. It is the construction of these words "special circumstances"—"specially liable to cause "accidents"; and if it is "specially liable to cause accidents," one would have thought that in 15 years or 4 years or 12 months, one would at least have had a complaint or something of that kind; but the history, uncontradicted, is that there was no complaint, despite the elaborate machinery provided in this very well-run factory for voicing complaints. There was no complaint to the chargehand, no suggestion that the staircase was in any way faulty. It was used continuously by the plaintiff and there was no accident in his four years. There was none to anybody in those four years, and, so far as the evidence went, none at any time since 1938.

The judge first of all found that there was no common law negligence here. The employers are under no liability at common law: they have performed their duty, that is to say, they have taken reasonable care for the safety of their employees.

So far as section 25 (1) is concerned, he said that the staircase was properly constructed and properly maintained, and concluded, " I find no fault there "; but on section 25 (2), where the wording is so remarkable—" special circumstances " making it " specially " liable to cause accidents "—in the face of the evidence I have recited, the judge found the defendants liable. I think he was wrong, and this appeal ought to be allowed.

ROMER L.J. I agree. After the very full discussion we have had about the evidence in this case, and the construction of section 25 (2) of the Factories Act, 1937, it really does not seem possible to say that this metal three-inch strip at the top of the stairs was " specially liable to cause accidents," and for my part I doubt whether it was liable to cause accidents at all. It certainly never has caused one since the stairs were built in 1938, and, indeed, it did not cause this accident. The plaintiff's accident came about by a conjunction of circumstances—slipping on the grease, as the judge found he had done, plus the presence of the strip; but it cannot be said that the strip alone caused this accident. Therefore, I am not myself satisfied that it could be said that it was liable to cause accidents; but a fortiori it seems to me it cannot be said that it was " specially liable to " cause accidents." Therefore, so far as the strip itself is concerned, in my opinion the plaintiff cannot bring the case within the subsection.

As to the alleged " special circumstances " with regard to the presence of grease, there is nothing I desire to add to what has already been said. It was merely a temporary incident which had never happened before and has never happened since, and I cannot believe that this mere lone instance of grease being found once can amount to a " special circumstance " within the purview of the subsection. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

PRACTICE NOTE.

Practice and Procedure—Jury, civil action—Disagreement of jury—Procedure for re-entry.

APPLICATION.

At the conclusion of the hearing of a slander action before a jury on May 13, 1955, the jury disagreed. There being some doubt as to the correct procedure for re-entry of the case for trial, Ormerod J. gave liberty to apply.

Percy Bloomfield for the plaintiff. In the Annual Practice (1955), at page 2862, there is a note halfway down the page dealing with court fees and stamps. The note reads: "It was "decided by the Treasury on question submitted by the Master "of the Crown Office, July, 1904, with regard to Fee 52 (Setting "down) in the annulled Fees Order, 1884, that a second fee was "not payable on re-entry of actions made remanet, adjourned, or "postponed from one assize to another, or sent down for trial on "circuit after entry in London, or vice versa, or on change of "venue from one town to another on the same circuit. But a "second fee was payable on re-entry of a case for new trial after "order for new trial, or after disagreement of jury." In those circumstances, it is submitted that the proper course here would be for the case to be set down again for re-hearing.

John Wilmers, for the defendant. I agree, but I think the court would have to give a direction under R.S.C., Ord. 36, r. 11, as to the time within which the setting down was to take place. Unless that is done the defendant cannot exercise the rights given to him under both Order 36, r. 11A and r. 12, namely, if the plaintiff makes default in setting down within the time stated in the order, to set down himself.

ORMEROD J. This is a case where an action was tried by a jury and the jury failed to agree. At the end of the hearing some doubt was raised by counsel on both sides as to the proper procedure to be adopted, as a disagreement by a jury in a civil action is a comparatively rare matter in these days.

The Rules of the Supreme Court appear to offer no assistance on the matter, but there has been some research in the Associates Office and it appears to be beyond doubt that the old practice was that the parties should be given leave to set down the case again, and, of course, the fee on setting down would have to be paid by the party setting down the action. That is borne out to some extent at least, by a note on page 2862 of the Annual Practice (1955), which is the part dealing with court fees and stamps. The note refers to a decision of the Treasury in July, 1904, when certain matters of this kind were submitted. It was established then that a second fee was payable on re-entry of a case for new trial after an order for new trial or after disagreement of a jury. That, of course, is not a statement of the practice, but it does reflect what the practice was at that time, and, in my view, that is the practice which should be followed.

Under the circumstances, I think it is essential, if the parties wish this action to be tried again, that the action should again be set down and a further fee paid. I therefore propose to order that the plaintiff be at liberty to set down the action within twenty-one days. Failing that, the defendant will have the right to do so.

Order accordingly.

Ejusdem Generis Rule—Statute.

The proviso to section 104 of the War Damage Act, 1943, excludes from the definition of "goods" in the Act "documents "owned for the purposes of a business."

Working drawings used in the process of manufacture are "documents" within the meaning of that proviso, and they are not, therefore, "goods" insurable against war damage under the business scheme within the meaning of section 84 (1) of the Act, and a claim for their loss is rightly excluded.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

The plaintiffs, J. H. Tucker & Co. Ld., manufacturers of electrical accessories and components, asked for a declaration that the Board of Trade were not entitled to exclude from payments made to them under the War Damage Acts, 1943,[1] under

[1] War Damage Act, 1943, s. 84: "(1) Subject to the provisions of "subsection (4) of this section, the "goods insurable under the business "scheme in relation to any person "carrying on business are all goods "situated in the United Kingdom— "(a) which are in his possession "(whether he owns them or not) and "are held or used by him wholly or the business scheme for the insurance of goods, the sum of £14,600, agreed value of some 15,000 working drawings owned by the plaintiffs, whose business premises were destroyed by enemy action on the night of November 21–22, 1940. Among the contents of the destroyed premises were some 50,000 drawings including the 15,000 working drawings which were the subject of the present claim.

The assessment of the plaintiffs' loss had been fixed at £133,687, which included a sum of £14,600 in respect of these working drawings. The plaintiffs' claim to that sum was resisted by the Board of Trade.

These working drawings included (a) tool design drawings required for the making or repairing of tools, (b) manufacturing drawings required for the process of manufacture of components, (c) inspection limit drawings required for gauging and viewing components. (d) assembly drawings required for assembling components and (e) outside suppliers' drawings. The evidence was that such drawings were essential parts of the process of manufacture, and that the manufacturing processes could not be initiated or carried through without them; and if the plaintiffs had wanted to sell their business undertaking a purchaser could only have been dealt with on the footing that these working drawings would be handed over with the rest of the apparatus connected with the making of the products supplied by the plaintiff company.

Neville Gray Q.C. and Eric Blain for the plaintiffs.
Denys Buckley for the Board of Trade.

VAISEY J. This summons raises a question of construction arising under the War Damage Act, 1943, which is not easy to answer, but it lies within a small compass, and depends on the combined effect of sections 84 (1) and 104 of the Act. It involves consideration of the problem of what are "documents" within the meaning of the last-mentioned section.

It is unnecessary for me to dwell at length on the width of the significance of the word "document"; etymologically, it means something which shows something or teaches something and is evidential or informative in its character. Having said that much, the context in which the word appears is naturally of the first and most cogent importance in determining what it means for the purposes under consideration.

"mainly for the purposes of that "business . . ."

S. 104: "In this Act, unless the "context otherwise requires, the ex- "pression 'goods' includes all cor- "poreal property neither falling "(whether generally or in relation to "any particular land) within the "meaning assigned to the expression "'land' by the last preceding sec- "tion, nor deemed for the purposes "of section 71 of this Act to form "part of a highway: Provided that "the said expression does not include "money, negotiable instruments, "securities for money, evidences of "title to any property or right or of "the discharge of any obligation, or "any documents owned for the pur- "poses of a business."

J. H. Tucker & Co. Ld. v. Board of Trade.

Vaisey J.

[His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] I do not doubt that the working drawings I am particularizing are "documents." The question is how, on the facts, section 104 of the Act has to be applied. I need not go into the machinery by which this loss was brought within the ambit of the War Damage Act, 1943, although it happened nearly three years before the Act came into existence; there is no dispute that the plaintiffs' loss comes within the War Damage Act, 1943. The question is whether these working drawings are property in respect of which a claim can validly be made under the Act.

[His Lordship read sections 84 (1) and 104 of the War Damage Act, 1943, and continued:] If the Act had stopped with the words "goods situated in the United Kingdom—(a) which "are in his possession (whether he owns them or not) and are "held or used by him wholly or mainly for the purposes of that "business" the answer would have been simple enough. These working drawings were undoubtedly goods "situated in the "United Kingdom" in the possession of the plaintiffs, and were held by them "for the purposes of their business."

But it is necessary to look at section 104, which is a definition section, the marginal heading of which is "definition of "'goods.'" It will be observed at once that the words in the proviso to section 104 are different from the words in section 84 ("goods . . . held or used . . . for the purposes of that business"), but whether they are different in meaning is another question.

The argument put forward on behalf of the plaintiffs is this: that these documents are not owned for business purposes in the same sense as account books or ledgers or anything of that kind, but that they form an integral part of the process of manufacturing, without the possession of which the company could not carry out its manufacturing business.

I must refer to the only judicial decision on this particular point, namely, Hill v. Regem,[1] a decision of Humphreys J. The headnote reads: "Account books, such as journals and "ledgers, used by an insurance broker in his business, are "'documents owned for the purposes of a business,' within the "meaning of the proviso to section 104 of the War Damage Act, "1943, and so excluded from insurance under the 'business "'scheme' operated by the Board of Trade by virtue of "section 83 of the Act." The report in the All England Reports is in a slightly different form from the Law Reports and has a final paragraph which does not appear in the report in the Law Reports.

I am attracted by the argument advanced on behalf of the plaintiffs that "documents owned for the purposes of a business," although they clearly include account books, ought not to include any which form a substantial and necessary part of the manufacturing activities of the company and are not merely what might

J. H. Tucker & Co. Ld. v. Board of Trade.

be called business documents. All the other items in the proviso seem to me to be very far removed from anything like a manufacturing process or the activities of a manufacturing business; and the argument from that is that "documents owned for the "purposes of a business" would primarily mean something of the same character as those other items, and that that is the justification for the decision in Hill v. Regem [2] as explained by Humphreys J.

The War Damage Act, 1943, which came into existence at the time of great disturbance was a remarkable piece of draftsmanship and, on the whole, has produced very few problems. I am inclined to think that to limit the meaning of the word "documents" on any of the considerations which I have mentioned is really not admissible according to any proper principle of construction. The words are "any documents "owned for the purposes of a business." These working drawings are clearly "documents": they were "owned" by the plaintiffs, and I think that they were "owned for the pur- "poses of their business," not in the same sense that account books and ledgers may be owned, but nevertheless for the purpose of carrying on their business.

Although there is much to be said for the contentions put forward for the plaintiffs, I think that the safer course is to say that "documents" means, according to its ordinary significance, written documents. It is easy to say that "documents" includes tombstones and other kinds of documentary objects, but in the ordinary sense in which the ordinary business man uses the word "documents" it means written documents: that is to say, documents which either record something or contain directions for the making of something, or are used for reference in the course of business.

It is pointed out on behalf of the Board of Trade that there are a good many reasons why documents should be excluded from the purview of the Act. They could without any great difficulty be re-duplicated, and indeed I am told that in this case the plaintiffs were in process of duplicating their documents when this catastrophe befell them in the early days of the war. The argument as to the extreme difficulty of valuing documents of this nature rather loses its weight when I know that the value attached to these particular documents has been agreed at £14,600. Although a value has been put on these particular documents for this particular purpose which somewhat limits the force of that point, one sees nevertheless some reason why documents are not the proper subject for compensation in the ordinary way. It would, in many cases, be difficult to value a chemist's book of prescriptions, an advertising agent's mail list, or an architect's drawings. So in this or in any comparable case, to value these documents for the purposes of this Act would be a

J. H. TUCKER & Co. LD. v. BOARD OF TRADE.

difficult problem which could hardly have been envisaged by those who drafted the Act.

The words are, after all, perfectly general. The proviso says (disregarding for one moment the ejusdem generis argument to which I have already referred) that there are to be excluded from the category of goods "any documents owned "for the purposes of a business." I think that "any documents "owned for the purposes of a business" mean, on the whole, written documents of any kind used or held or owned for any of the purposes of a business—it may, for instance, be for the purposes of keeping the accounts of a business, or for making up bills for estimating quantities. Such documents are, in my judgment, clearly within the proviso to section 104 and excluded from the operation of the Act under the decision of Humphreys J. It seems to me that "any documents owned for the purposes "of a business" must include, according to the ordinary use of language, working drawings. I cannot see where a line can be drawn between documents owned for the purposes of a business, and documents owned for the purpose of carrying on a business, or documents which are owned and used for both of such purposes. I find myself on safer ground in holding, as I feel bound to do, that "any documents owned for the purposes of a "business" include these particular working drawings which, in my judgment, were held by the plaintiffs for the purposes of their business. I shall declare that on the true construction of sections 84 and 104 of the Act the expression "goods" does not include the working drawings in respect of which a claim for £14,600 has been made by the applicants and not accepted by the Board of Trade.

CROOKALL v. VICKERS-ARMSTRONG LD.

The plaintiff, a moulding machinist employed by the defendant company at its steel foundry, was in the course of his employment from 1930 to 1951 engaged in work upon the foundry floor which involved the use of siliceous sand. The work carried out upon the foundry floor included, inter alia, processes known as "easing," "knocking-out" and the preliminary stages of "dressing," which processes involved a silicosis risk. This risk was not appreciated during the earlier part of the plaintiff's employment; but by about the year 1942 or 1943 the risk was beginning to be recognized. From about the year 1941 or 1942 the defendant company provided a sufficient number of masks for use by their workmen, but although the foundry manager spoke to the workmen from time to time about the wearing of masks very few of them did so. In March, 1951, the plaintiff was certified to be suffering from silicosis, which condition had commenced to develop in about 1939 and was the result of his having inhaled, throughout the period of his employment, fine particles of freshly fractured silica:—

Held, (1) that once an employer knows, or ought to know, that his workmen are exposed to a material risk of contracting a serious disease, and that the risk can be markedly diminished, if not eliminated, by the wearing of masks, he must take all reasonable steps, by clearly warning the workmen that they refrain at their own risk from wearing the masks and by encouragement and exhortation, to seek to persuade them to do so; and accordingly, from about the year 1942 or 1943, the defendant company, having failed to take such steps, was guilty of negligence at common law in failing to take due care for the safety of the plaintiff.

(2) That the words "all practicable measures . . . to protect "the persons employed against inhalation of the dust" in section 47 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, included the provision of masks and the taking of steps to induce the workmen to wear them; and, accordingly, the defendant company was also in breach of its duty under the subsection.

(3) That, the plaintiff's present condition having been brought about by his inhalation of silica particles over a period of time both preceding and running concurrently with that during which the defendant company was in breach of duty, the damages recoverable by the plaintiff should be measured by reference to the extent to which his condition had been aggravated during the period of the defendant company's breach of duty.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, who was employed as a moulding machinist by the defendant company at its steel foundry, contracted silicosis in the course of his employment and brought this action claiming damages therefor on the grounds of breach by the defendant company of its duty at common law to take reasonable precautions for his health and safety, and its duty under section 47 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937.[1] The allegations

Cur. adv. vult.

February 17. GLYN-JONES J. read the following judgment (delivered at Liverpool Assizes): For rather more than 20 years, ending in March, 1951, the plaintiff was employed as a moulding machinist at the defendant company's steel foundry at Barrow-in-Furness. On March 1, 1951, he was certified by the Pneumoconiosis Board to be suffering from silicosis; and it is common ground that he contracted that disease in the course of, and as a result of his employment. He claims by his statement of claim in this action that he contracted this disease because the defendant company was guilty of various breaches of its statutory duty under sections 4 and 47 of the Factories Act, 1937, and of its duty at common law as his employers, to take reasonable care for his health and safety. In the course of the trial Mr. Fenton Atkinson, for the plaintiff, abandoned all allegations that his client's condition had been caused by any negligence or breach of statutory duty, save such as might be based upon the defendant company's alleged failure to provide a suitable mask or respirator, and to take reasonable steps to induce him to wear it. Mr. Atkinson submitted that such failure, if established, constitutes a breach, as well of section 47 of the Act, as of the defendant company's duty at common law.

In the defendant company's foundry steel castings are made by the usual process of pouring molten steel into moulds of sand contained in steel moulding boxes or casting boxes. The processes involved, so far as they are relevant, are as follows. The moulding boxes, or casting boxes, are built up in segments, square or circular, clamped together, and having a top and bottom to complete the box. The moulding machine, at which the plaintiff worked, is a metal "table" which may be vibrated rapidly. The bottom of a moulding box and as many segments as are needed, depending upon the size and shape of the casting to be made, are assembled and built up on the table; and within the box so made is placed a pattern of the casting. Fresh sand, called facing sand, is applied moist to the surface of the pattern. A layer of damp sand is placed behind the facing sand, and the remainder of the space left between the sand-covered pattern and the side or sides of the box is packed with dry sand which has already been used before. When the mould is full, the table is set in motion and vibrates rapidly for a short time so as to shake the sand firmly down. Finally, the mould is covered by a layer of wet sand and the box closed. So far the process is carried out by the moulding machinists, of whom the plaintiff was one. The casting box containing sand and pattern is then taken to the moulders, who break out and remove the pattern and repair any damage done to the inner surface of the mould. Then the casting box with the mould within it, is taken to an oven and heated to dryness. When the box is removed from the oven the sand is baked hard, but within the mould and upon the box there is a quantity of coke breeze dust. The mould must be cleaned of this dust before the molten metal is poured into it. The dust was formerly blown out by the blast from a compressed-air pipe, but for some time now a suction pipe has been used in its place. After the cleaning of the mould and the placing therein of the core by the moulders, the box is closed and the metal poured.

Next comes a process known as "easing." When the metal has solidified but is still red hot the mould is opened, one or more segments of the box taken off, and some of the sand surrounding the casting is removed. The object of this process is to enable the casting to set and contract freely, thus avoiding the risk of cracking. At this stage the sand is hard and dry. It is hard work to move it, and hot work too, because of the heat of the casting. The segments are replaced and the metal left further to cool. From time to time the plaintiff took part in this process also. Next comes the "knocking-out" process in which the casting is lifted from the box, and at that stage there is still much hard dry sand sticking to it. As much as possible of this sand is removed in the knocking-out, but there still remains a quantity of sand as hard as stone, and burnt on to the casting so firmly that it can be removed only by the use of special tools or appliances such as pneumatic chisels. The removal of this burnt-on sand, and of any other removable matter, is the first step in the process of cleaning the casting. Finally, the rough surface of the metal is smoothed and finished to the dimensions required. The process of removing the very hard burnt-on sand and the metallic excrescences, with pneumatic chisels, and the final smoothing of the casting is known as "dressing" or "fettling."

By 1931 it was generally known that workmen engaged in dressing or fettling steel castings were exposed to the risk of contracting silicosis; and by the Various Industries (Silicosis)

Scheme, 1931,[1] it is provided that a workman in a foundry or metal works, engaged in the process of "freeing . . . steel "castings from adherent sand or other siliceous substances, "excepting work done upon the foundry floor,"[2] should be entitled to workmen's compensation if he contracted silicosis due to his employment. It was not then thought, apparently, that the processes described above—other than fettling or dressing—all of which are carried out upon the foundry floor, involved a risk of silicosis; but as methods of diagnosis improved after further study and research, it came in due course to be realized, and is now well known and has been for some time, that workmen engaged in work upon the foundry floor in such other processes may also contract silicosis, as the plaintiff has done.

[His Lordship referred to the fact that some of the processes caused considerable quantities of visible dust to rise into the air, stating that, so far as ventilation could dispose of that dust, it was no longer alleged that the defendant company was in breach of its duty so as to cause the plaintiff's silicosis; that visible particles of dust do not cause silicosis, which is caused by tiny particles of freshly fractured silica visible, if at all, only as motes in a beam of light, and continued:] The moulding sand used by the defendant company was siliceous sand. It came straight from a sand-pit without being subjected to any crushing or other process which could fracture the particles, and, as supplied to the foundry, contained no particles which could cause silicosis. But in the process of "easing," of "knocking-out," and of removing the burnt-on sand from the casting with pneumatic chisels, freshly fractured particles, small enough to cause silicosis if inhaled in sufficient quantity and over a long enough period of time, were and are produced; and these freshly fractured particles retain their noxious property for some time—a month or more.

All these processes were carried on within the foundry. At some time before the enactment of the Scheme of 1931, the whole of the process of fettling or dressing was also carried on within the foundry. By the time the plaintiff began to work in the foundry most of the fettling or dressing was being done in a separate room; but the preliminary work of removing some at least of the burnt-on sand with pneumatic chisels continued to be done within the foundry until about 1951 or 1952.

It is of some significance that by the Various Industries (Silicosis) Amendment Scheme, 1946, the Scheme of 1931 was amended by, inter alia, the deletion of the words "excepting "work done upon the foundry floor." Thus, as it seems to me, a workman in a steel foundry who, after 1946, could prove that he had contracted silicosis as a result of his employment in the process of easing, or knocking-out, as well as in the removal of burnt-on sand in the first stage of the dressing process, could recover workmen's compensation, notwithstanding that his work was done upon the factory floor; and it is obvious that, from that time at least, a reasonable employer ought to have known that these last-named processes involved the workmen in the foundry in the risk of contracting silicosis, and placed him therefore under a duty to take all proper steps to protect the workmen from that risk.

I am satisfied that the plaintiff's silicosis has been caused gradually by his having inhaled, throughout the period of his employment, fine particles of freshly fractured silica arising from all these processes. These particles are so light that they do not fall to the floor with the visible dust which settles. They remain floating in the air as it circulates within the foundry. It appears from the report of Adsett v. K. & L. Steelfounders & Engineers Ld.,[3] that the device of fitting a perforated grid in the floor of the foundry, with a down draught intended to suck the dust through the floor, was thought at one time to be a method of eliminating dust which might cause silicosis; but I doubt whether this method would dispose of the tiny noxious particles. I accept the evidence of Mr. Rogers, an engineer and former factory inspector, that, so far, at least, as the process of easing is concerned, the great heat of the casting would cause swift upward convection currents of air, which would render ineffective any attempt to suck these light particles through the floor.

Since the plaintiff did contract silicosis as the result of the cumulative effect upon his lungs of the silica particles he had inhaled over many years, it follows that any efforts which were made by the defendant company to improve the atmosphere had not succeeded in eliminating the risk.

As I see them, the questions which I must answer are: Ought the defendant company to have appreciated this risk? If so, when? And, once the risk had been appreciated, ought not greater efforts to have been made by the company to provide masks, and to see that the workmen, including the plaintiff, used them?

On the subject of masks my attention has been invited to the second report of the Committee on Dust in Steel Foundries, dated March 31, 1951, in which appears, in paragraph 50, the following sentence: "While we cannot say that we consider personal "protection to be the ideal method, we do think it has a vital "purpose, and we consider all parties should wear masks in an "attempt to make them more comfortable and more efficient." But workmen find it very uncomfortable to do heavy work wearing masks and are reluctant to wear them. The difficulty created by this reluctance was discussed in the judgment of Parker J. in Adsett's case,[4] and I approach the subject with full sympathy for the employers' difficulty. Mr. Williams, who was the defendant company's foundry manager from 1943 to 1953, and Mr. Marsh, who succeeded him, both said that, short of dismissing a man who did not wear his mask when told to do so, there was no way in which they could compel a man to wear one; and dismissal would "cause a riot" in the foundry. Nevertheless, there is a half-way house between, on the one hand, merely providing masks and leaving it to the men to decide whether or not they will wear them, and, on the other hand, proceeding to the length of dismissing a man caught working without a mask. Once the employer knows, or ought to know, that his work-people are exposed to a material risk of contracting a serious disease, and that the risk can be markedly diminished, if not eliminated, by the wearing of masks, he must take all reasonable steps, by clearly warning the men that they refrain at their own risk from wearing the masks and by encouragement and exhortation, to seek to persuade them to do so.

I have come to the conclusion that by about the years 1942/1943, the defendant company in the particular circumstances of this foundry should have appreciated that their workers on the foundry floor were exposed to a risk of silicosis. I base this conclusion largely on the fact that the first stages of the dressing process were carried on upon the foundry floor. From that time onward more effort should have been made than was made to make the masks freely available, and to induce the men to wear them. It follows that, in my opinion, the company was guilty in this respect of a breach of its duty at common law to take due care for the safety of its workmen.

Mr. Brabin, for the defendant company, desires to keep open the point that section 47 of the Act of 1937 is concerned only with measures such as the provision of adequate ventilation, etc., for eliminating harmful dust from the atmosphere in the foundry, and does not extend to the provision of masks, or other protection, for men working in an atmosphere from which the dust has not been eliminated. I am of opinion that the "practical "measures to protect persons employed against inhalation of "dust" include the provision of masks, and the taking of steps to induce the workmen to wear them. In my opinion, therefore, the defendant company has been guilty of a breach of section 47 of the Factories Act, 1937.

The facts on which I base this conclusion are as follows: Mr. Rogers, the defendant company's witness, to whose evidence I have already referred, told me that, by 1942, the risk that the processes carried out on the foundry floor, particularly easing and knocking-out, might cause silicosis was beginning to be recognized, and that he knew of no satisfactory method of protecting the men against that risk, other than the provision of masks. He said that if an employer knew of that risk he should attach the highest importance to seeing that the men wore masks, and he thought masks should have been made available from 1942 onwards. In view of Mr. Rogers's evidence that the risk arising from the processes of easing and knocking-out was only beginning to be recognized in 1942, I do not think I should have found the employer negligent in not then appreciating that the risk existed in the foundry; but when I add the fact that part of the dressing process was carried on there too, I think the combined risk should have been appreciated.

CROOKALL v. VICKERS-ARMSTRONG LD.

Mr. Williams, the foundry manager, said that masks were introduced to reduce the incidence of silicosis and other respiratory diseases, and that by the time the masks were introduced he appreciated that there was some risk of silicosis, not only to fettlers and dressers, but also to other workers. I think the time to which he refers was about 1941 or 1942; although, in fact, masks were introduced earlier. The original purpose was, I think, to protect the men from the clouds of visible dust, rather than against the specific risk of silicosis.

From October, 1940, there was a works committee of representatives of the workers and management which met frequently, and at these meetings the men's representatives often complained of conditions in the foundry, as appears from the extracts from the minutes of the committee which were tendered in evidence, and, at a meeting of December 4, 1942, specific reference was made by the men's representative to the risk of silicosis. It is true that the men were asking for protection against the visible dust clouds which they thought, mistakenly, caused silicosis; but their complaint clearly called the company's attention to the possibility of the risk.

Masks were first provided in small numbers shortly before the war. The plaintiff says that the men could draw them for use on dusty jobs, and would then return them to store where they might be reissued to other men. He says that he thought this undesirable and never asked for one. When Mr. Williams heard of men wearing one another's masks he stopped the practice, and thereafter there were plenty of masks; and certainly, I think, by 1941 or 1942 a sufficient number of masks was provided and kept in store, so that any man who asked for one could have had one.

This brings me to the question of what steps were taken to persuade and encourage the men to wear them, and it is on this question that I find that the plaintiff succeeds. I think that the attitude of the defendant company is in the observations of Sir Robert Beeman recorded in the minutes of December 4, 1942, and amounts to this: "We have provided the best masks we have "been able to obtain: what a pity the men don't use them!" There was a failure to press upon the men's representatives with earnestness and ardour the need for these masks, so as to try, at least, to secure their strong help in persuading the men to wear them, and to wear them, not merely for a few minutes in dusty conditions, but as much as possible. I draw the inference that after a somewhat half-hearted attempt to persuade the men to wear the masks, the attempt was given up as hopeless, with the result that, as Mr. Williams said, by the time he ceased to be foundry manager in 1953, and although he had from time to time spoken to men about wearing masks, very few men wore them.

I now come to the question of damages. I accept the medical evidence that the plaintiff is suffering from a moderate degree of pneumoconiosis which produces some shortness of breath on exertion, and renders him, if he should suffer from diseases like bronchitis or pneumonia, less able to resist them. I accept the evidence that the plaintiff was beginning to suffer from silicosis before the war, and that the progress of the disease was somewhat accelerated during the war—no doubt by black-out conditions. The progress of the disease is slow and insidious, and, no doubt, every particle of silica which the plaintiff has inhaled has played its part in bringing about his present state. If a man is once diagnosed, as a result of an X-ray examination, to be suffering from industrial silicosis, whether or not he feels any symptoms of disease, he ought not to continue to work on the process to which the silicosis is due; and it may be that an X-ray examination made much earlier than 1951 would have discovered that the plaintiff had begun to suffer from the complaint.

Mr. Atkinson puts his case simply. Since the plaintiff was prohibited in March, 1951, from working as a moulding machinist, he has had to take lower paid work. Up to the date of the trial his loss of wages amounts to £389 19s., and is continuing at the rate of £3 4s. 8d. a week. Mr. Atkinson says that, at the date when first the defendant company was in breach, the plaintiff was capable of doing the full work of a moulding machinist, and that it is the further progress of the disease since then which has caused him to suffer loss of earning capacity; and, therefore, that the defendant company must compensate him to the full, without taking into account the fact that he was already suffering (if he was so suffering) from incipient silicosis at the time of the first breach.

Mr. Brabin, on the other hand, argues that the breach, if any, by the defendant company, has not caused the whole of the plaintiff's damage but only a part; and that I must take into consideration the fact that, to the extent to which the plaintiff was already suffering from silicosis when the defendant company's breach began, the defendant company is not to blame for the whole of his present condition.

I test these contentions by a hypothetical case. The reason why the plaintiff ceased to be employed as a moulding machinist was not that his symptoms prevented him from working; it was that a routine examination was made (as in these days is often done) of all the men who consented to be examined. Assume that the defendants' breach took place a very short time before the X-ray examination revealed silicosis—say six months. The progress of the disease during those six months might have been almost imperceptible, and, had the examination taken place six months earlier, the same diagnosis would have been made; yet Mr. Atkinson's argument would presumably have been the same, and would bring about, in such a case, I think, a manifest injustice. So, also, if the plaintiff's employment had been shared between two employers, each of whom had been in breach. It would be unjust, I think, to make the first employer pay for damage done after the plaintiff left his employment, and equally unjust to make the second employer liable for damage done by the first. Under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, the liability to pay compensation was placed upon the second employer, with a right, in certain circumstances, to recover contribution from the first.

Crookall v. Vickers-Armstrong Ld.

Glyn-Jones J.

There are also other considerations. The wearing of a mask by the plaintiff—assuming that the defendant company had succeeded in persuading him to wear one—would have checked the progress of the disease, though probably would not have prevented some slight worsening. It could not have repaired the damage already done; and the extent to which his lungs were already affected would have tended, as he grew older, to shortness of breath, so as to make it more difficult for him to wear his mask. What I have to assess, I think, is the extent to which the defendants' breach has aggravated the plaintiff's condition, and to award damages for that. No arithmetical calculation of loss of earnings can help; I think that all I can do is to assess, as a lump sum, what I think is fair compensation for the part played by the defendants' breach in bringing about the plaintiff's present condition. This I assess at £750, to include special damage.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Cruelty—Deception before marriage—Association with another woman—Shock of subsequent discovery—Aggravation by husband's deliberate conduct and desertion.

If a man so deceives his wife before marriage that he must know that the revelation of the truth would be a serious shock to her, he is under a duty not to aggravate that shock; and if such aggravation is a natural and probable consequence of an act of his own volition, and injury to health results, he is guilty of cruelty.

A husband, who had represented to his wife before marriage that he was an orphan and a bachelor, and had treated her well during the three years they lived together, disappeared, leaving no clue as to his whereabouts. In the course of inquiries which the husband must have known the wife would make, she learned that he had been twice previously married and twice divorced, had had children by both marriages, and a child by another woman; and had been associating since the marriage with yet another woman of whom he was accepted as the fiancé:—

Held, that although deception before marriage, association with another woman, and desertion were not of themselves cruelty, the husband had in the circumstances of his disappearance been guilty of cruelty by reason of his deliberate acts, which had inevitably aggravated the shock to the wife of the discovery of the deception, and caused injury to her health.

WIFE'S PETITION for dissolution of marriage.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment. The parties met in 1949 when the wife was about twenty and the husband just over thirty. At the first lunch they had together he told her that all his family had been killed during the war, that he was an orphan, and that because he was in the Army he had not found time to get married. During the period after that first lunch the husband did not volunteer any further information as to his family background, but, when questions were asked, maintained in fact the story which he had previously told. They became engaged towards the end of 1949 and were married in July, 1950. The wedding was a white wedding and the best man was one John Dickson, a partner of the husband in his business as a theatrical photographer.

CARPENTER v. CARPENTER.

The husband and wife then settled down to live very happily for nearly three years. There was no evidence that during that period the question of the husband's status before marriage and his family was the subject of conversation, but it was equally clear that during that period the husband in no way went back on what he had originally told his wife.

It had been arranged between husband and wife that on June 11, 1953, they should set off on a holiday to Lucerne. On June 9, 1953, two days previously, he left the matrimonial home, apparently in the ordinary course of business, saying that he was going on business affairs to Bradford and would be back in good time for the two of them to start their holiday. Nothing more was seen or heard of him by the wife until October 8, 1953, and therefore during those months of June, July, August and September, 1953, he had simply disappeared leaving no message and no clue to his whereabouts.

As soon as the wife found he had not returned at the time promised she became extremely anxious. She set about making inquiries, and those inquiries included attempts to seek information from his business associate, John Dickson. In addition, she sought information from the police, with whom she registered her husband as missing. As a result of these and other inquiries the wife learned a number of facts which inevitably caused her great distress. She found out that the husband, who had declared himself never previously to have been married and who had caused himself to be entered upon the marriage certificate as a bachelor, had in fact been married twice before. The first marriage had taken place in Middlesex on September 6, 1939. By that marriage he had had two children, one born in February, 1941, and the other in June, 1942. That marriage had been dissolved on the ground of the husband's cruelty by a decree dated May 12, 1944. The second marriage took place on April 13, 1946, at Christ Church, Rawalpindi, India. By that marriage he had had one child, born in February, 1947. On April 21, 1950, that marriage had been dissolved on the ground of the husband's adultery in 1949 with one Elizabeth Clark. Another fact which came to light in the course of the investigations was that on August 21, 1950, just a month after the present marriage, one Elizabeth Clark obtained against a man, who, by inference from the facts as a whole, was this husband, an affiliation order at the magistrates' court at Greenwich in respect of a child born to her on October 8, 1949. Those facts also had not been disclosed to the wife.

In addition it was found that the husband had been associating with the intervener from November, 1952. He had proposed marriage to the intervener and become engaged to her in December, 1952, and had in May, 1953, induced her to go to St. Helier, Jersey, to arrange with the vicar of a church there for their wedding to take place. He had taken a lease of a flat, where they had associated as an engaged couple, and had been introduced into her home as her fiancé. In June, 1953, he had vanished from her life in the same way as he had vanished from that of the wife. All this time, from December, 1952, to June, 1953, he had at the same time been living very happily with his wife, who had not the slightest suspicion of what was going on as between the husband and the intervener.

It was also discovered that the husband's story as to being an orphan and as to the way in which his family had perished was untrue. The husband's father had been alive until a few years before the marriage and had not been killed during any form of war activities. The husband's mother was still alive and he also had alive a sister and a brother.

Of these discoveries relative to the husband, the first was made about a week after the husband's departure. As the other matters became known to the wife, the cumulative effect increased; her health deteriorated and she became listless, irritable, jumpy, developed a twitch in her hands, and other symptoms. She could not work at her own job and was given some five weeks' leave of absence; since then she had had to be put on to less responsible work. So great was the change wrought in her that on one occasion, not long after these series of discoveries, her sister barely recognized her in the street. Of the various discoveries the husband's deception as to his previous marriages had had the deepest effect.

On October 8, 1953, the husband came back to the extent of slipping a note under the door of the matrimonial home. By that and by some telephone communications and a subsequent note he made an ostensible approach to the wife to be received back, but she would have nothing to do with him, and on August 24, 1954, filed her petition for divorce.

Anthony Harmsworth for the wife.
The husband did not appear and was not represented.
Richard Ellis for the intervener.

The following cases were referred to in argument: Russell v. Russell [1]; Cox v. Cox [2]; Barker v. Barker [3]; Simpson v. Simpson.[4]

SACHS J. stated the facts substantially as set out above, found the injury to health clearly established, and continued: From the facts which I have mentioned certain matters become abundantly clear. First, of course, this man is shown to be a congenitally amoral philanderer and an accomplished and plausible liar. Secondly, he is shown to be a menace to the happiness of any young woman with whom he associates and has, indeed, ruined the happiness of five women so far. The third thing that is clear is that what he did to this wife in the present proceedings is something that caused her to suffer grievously and that everyone must have sympathy with her sufferings.

But those facts do not necessarily solve of themselves the question as to whether the husband has, to use the precise words of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 1 (1) (c), "since the "celebration of the marriage treated the petitioner with cruelty." I have had to bear in mind the passage in Lord Stowell's judgment in Evans v. Evans,[1] quoted by Karminski J. in Eastland v. Eastland,[2] that "'the Courts of Justice do not pretend to furnish "'cures for all the miseries of human life.'" Further, the courts must, of course, be careful not to substitute a different ground for divorce for those provided by the legislature. The Court of Appeal in recent cases—Westall v. Westall,[3] Cox v. Cox,[4] and Warburton v. Warburton[5]—has underlined the fact that the mere incidence of severe results to the wife, resulting from acts of the husband, does not of itself necessarily constitute cruelty.

In those circumstances, it seems right to examine the components of what in the aggregate is charged as cruelty. The first is the deception of the wife by the husband's fraudulent statements before the marriage. The second, the subsequent association with the intervener of the nature described but kept secret from the wife till June 14, 1953. The third, his desertion in June, 1953, by his complete disappearance. These must be regarded in conjunction with the fact that until June, 1953, he had, undoubtedly, treated his wife unexceptionably well.

Now pausing for a moment to consider each component on its own, it is obvious that pre-marriage fraud, whether it relates to sexual or to criminal or to other matters, will often, when revealed, inevitably result in pain and may thus impair the health of the spouse deceived. Assuming that the revelations be accidental or arranged in the way which a spouse hopes will be least hurtful to the wife, the realities of the case must be that the injury then flows from the pre-marriage deception. Thus the matter does not come within section 1 (1) (c) as being treatment "since the celebration of the marriage." So one finds that fraud before marriage cannot of itself (and I underline the words "of itself") be cruelty within the above section. Further, as regards the continuation of the deception after the marriage, one is faced with the fact that the more successful the continuance of the deception the less the chance of injury to the wife.

Next there is the association with the intervener. Since Cox v. Cox[6] it appears that the philanderer who associates with other women for his own gratification, but to an extent that does not include adultery, comes in one respect within the same class as the drunkard and the burglar. In each case, the association, the drunkenness and the crime, is not of itself, without other acts, cruelty unless the association, the drunkenness or the crime, is done with intention to injure the wife—and that is so although each of these things may cause grave distress and resultant ill-health to the wife. Here the clear inference to be drawn from the facts is that the association of the husband with the intervener was carried on by him for his own gratification and not with intent to injure his wife.

There is then the matter of desertion. The remedy for desertion is laid down by section 1 (1) (b) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950. Desertion, of course, often creates great distress and always does so if the wife was and remained in love with her husband. Here, again, Mr. Harmsworth conceded very properly that desertion was not of itself cruelty. Indeed, otherwise it would be only too easy to stultify the intention of the legislature that there must be three years' desertion in order that a petition for divorce may be properly grounded. I emphasize desertion " of " itself " lest I be construed as saying that the act which constitutes desertion could never become an ingredient in a charge of cruelty, as, for instance, where the desertion took place just when the deserted spouse was critically ill.

It is because no one of these three components of itself constitutes cruelty that the case caused me considerable concern. At one time I was much inclined to the view that this was a case in which the court could not be asked, by taking three components, each in effect equalling nought, and adding them one to another, to find that taken together they constituted cruelty. But Mr. Harmsworth, very properly, invited me to examine certain particular aspects of this particular case and especially he asked me to examine the matter on the footing that here was a case of deception followed by a suspicious association, followed by complete disappearance of the husband, followed by a shock that was gravely aggravated on the particular facts by the way in which the husband had conducted himself. I have already said deception before marriage cannot of itself be cruelty nor, if accident reveals it or if the husband makes a careful revelation in what he considers to be the best interests of the marriage, would one normally, at any rate, expect that to constitute cruelty. But if a man so deceives his wife before the marriage that he, as here, must know that the revelation of the truth would be a great and perhaps disastrous shock to her, then he must at least be under a duty, having himself created the situation, not to aggravate that shock. If his revelation, for instance, were by some unfeeling remark or some coarse jest that would be bound to create an aggravated shock, I do not think anyone would doubt that such conduct would constitute cruelty in the sense that it would be a cruel thing to do—using that word " cruel " in the way approved of by Lord Merriman P. in Simpson v. Simpson,[7] and by Hodson J. in Cackett (orse. Trice) v. Cackett,[8] that is to say, in its ordinary connotation and ordinary acceptation in the English language.

Here the husband did create by his deception a position in which he had at least a duty to use every effort to see that the ill consequences of that deception being discovered were not aggravated. By his deliberate acts he associated with and engaged himself to the intervener and then disappeared without a word of explanation with the inevitable result that both the wife and the intervener would make inquiries at his business address—where the latter had first got to know the husband. Both would, in the natural course of events, come into contact with John Dickson—who knew the second wife, knew the present wife, and would come to know the intervener and of her purported engagement. It was thus clear that his disappearance (and I think, in the circumstances, one could properly say his cruel disappearance) from his wife's life would assuredly result in the shock of the discovery of his previous deception being grievously aggravated to the maximum extent by the manner in which they would come to light. That inevitable result duly happened with the disastrous effects already mentioned, and to my mind that aggravation was clearly a natural and probable consequence of an act of the husband's own volition.

To paraphrase words which Karminski J. quoted in Cooper v. Cooper [9] with approval, it is not a question in such a case whether the husband had an intention of being cruel but whether his intentional acts amounted to cruelty. Thus to aggravate the shock was to my mind something which I think any right-minded jury could, and would, call cruel, and I so find it, and accordingly find cruelty proved.

[His Lordship then considered the evidence relating to adultery, held the charge not to have been proved, and dismissed the intervener from the suit.]

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Insanity—Care and treatment—"With-"out any interval"—Detention under temporary order—Discharge —Re-admission 12 days later as voluntary patient—Whether receiving treatment "without any interval"—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 25), s. 1 (1) (d), (2) (a), (d).
De minimis non curat lex. "Interval."

In 1953 a husband petitioned for divorce on the ground that his wife was incurably of unsound mind and had been continuously under care and treatment for a period of at least five years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition. The wife had been admitted to an institution in February, 1947, and had been detained in pursuance of an order within section 1 (2) (a) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, for six months. The order had then lapsed and she had been discharged and re-admitted 12 days later as a voluntary patient. She had thereafter remained under continuous care and treatment. The commissioner dismissed the petition and the husband appealed:—

Held, that the period between the discharge and re-admission on a voluntary basis could not, for the purposes of section 1 (2) (d) be regarded as negligible. The subsequent period of care and treatment on a voluntary basis did not, therefore, follow "without "any interval" the period during which the wife was detained pursuant to the order, and the appeal failed.

Quaere. Whether the priciple of de minimis non curat lex ought to be applied in construing the expression "any interval" in section 1 (2) (d).

APPEAL from Judge Rewcastle Q.C., sitting as a special commissioner at Leeds.

On September 18, 1937, Joseph Ulric Charlton was married to Annie Isabel Redston. On February 15, 1947, the wife was admitted as a private temporary patient to Holloway Sanatorium, Virginia Water, Surrey, on the application of the husband supported by a recommendation made under section 5 of the Mental Treatment Act, 1930, by two medical practitioners that she should be received into the sanatorium for a period not exceeding six months. A certificate by the visitors of licensed houses appointed by quarter sessions for the county of Surrey was given on February 28, 1947, stating that it was proper that she should continue to be detained as a private temporary patient. On August 14, 1947, at the expiry of the six months' period, the wife was discharged from the sanatorium as "recovered." She returned to her husband, but on August 26 she was re-admitted to the same sanatorium as a private voluntary patient and remained there continuously under care and treatment. On April 15, 1953, the husband presented a petition for divorce on the ground that the wife was incurably of unsound mind and had been continuously under care and treatment for a period of at least five years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition. The commissioner held that the temporary order followed by the visitors' certificate constituted a detention within section 1 (2) (a) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950,[1] but that when the wife left the sanatorium on August 14, 1947, the order had expired by effluxion of time. Consequently, he held that the treatment after re-admission on August 26, did not, for the purpose of section 1 (2) (d) of that Act, follow without any interval the period during which she was detained pursuant to the order. He dismissed the petition and the husband appealed. It was conceded for the purposes of the appeal that the original detention was pursuant to an order within section 1 (2) (a) of the Act of 1950.

CHARLTON v. CHARLTON.

No case other than those referred to in the judgments was cited in argument.

Laurence Pratt for the petitioning husband.
H. G. Bennett for the respondent wife.

EVERSHED M.R. This appeal raises a question of the proper construction of section 1 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, so far as it relates to what may be broadly called insanity as a ground of dissolution of marriage.

[His Lordship referred to the facts as to the original admission to the sanatorium as a temporary patient and continued:] The period of detention was limited, in accordance with the ordinary practice in such cases, to six months; and it is conceded that there were no circumstances which would have justified any extension of that period. At any rate, no such extension occurred; and on August 14, 1947, the wife was discharged from the sanatorium. She returned to her husband, the petitioner in the suit, but on August 26 she was re-admitted to the same sanatorium as a voluntary patient; and she has since been there continuously, and is there now, under care and treatment.

[His Lordship, having stated further facts and read the

[1] Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 1: "(1) Subject to the provisions "of the next following section, a "petition for divorce may be pre- "sented to the court either by the "husband or the wife on the ground "that the respondent . . . (d) is "incurably of unsound mind and has "been continuously under care and "treatment for a period of at least five "years immediately preceding the "presentation of the petition; . . . "(2) For the purposes of this section "a person of unsound mind shall be "deemed to be under care and treat- "ment—(a) while he is detained in "pursuance of any order or inquisi- "tion under the Lunacy and Mental "Treatment Acts, 1890 to 1930 [or "under one of a number of other Acts "specified] . . . (d) while he is "receiving treatment as a voluntary "patient under the Mental Treatment "Act, 1930, . . . being treatment "which follows without any interval "a period during which he was "detained as mentioned in paragraph "(a) . . ."

During the period from February 15, 1947, until the expiration of six months (namely, August 14, 1947), the detention in the Holloway Sanatorium was a detention within paragraph (a) of section 1 (2), being a detention in pursuance of an order under one or other of the Acts mentioned. From August 26, 1947, the wife has been receiving treatment as a voluntary patient continuously up to the present time; but there is the gap from August 14 to August 26, during which the wife was at home living with her husband. The question upon this appeal is whether that interval of time, in all the circumstances of this case, constitutes an "interval" within the meaning of section 1 (2) (d).

At the hearing before the commissioner a point was made on the husband's behalf that the wife's sojourn with her husband should be regarded as being a sojourn with someone who was taking care of her and treating her, in the same way as she would have been cared for had she been in the institution. That suggestion was based, among other things, on the fact that the husband was given certain sedatives with which to quieten her impulses during the time when she was with him; but Mr. Pratt has not felt able in this court (and, if I may say so, he is plainly right) to suggest that, during the 12 days when the wife was with her husband, she could sensibly be regarded as being under care and treatment as a voluntary patient within the meaning of the Act. In those circumstances, Mr. Pratt has been constrained, in effect, to contend that the interval (having regard to the facts which I will mention in a moment) is or should be regarded as being negligible, to the extent that the court may properly disregard it and may say that the wife was under treatment as a voluntary patient "without any interval," to use the language of paragraph (d), from the moment when the order ceased to have effect on August 14.

The doctor who had attended the wife at the institution, Dr. Parfitt, gave evidence. He said, in answer to a question put to him in examination in chief, that she was capable of expressing herself as willing or unwilling at the time that she first left the institution. I will read one or two more questions which follow that answer: "(Q) What did you do? (A) The temporary order "was running out, and we decided to make her a voluntary "patient. (Q) How do you make a person a voluntary patient? "(A) The only way is if the person himself or herself is perfectly "willing to become a voluntary patient. (Q) Was she? (A) Mrs. "Charlton was perfectly willing to be a voluntary patient, "although at the same time she was certain we were detaining "her against her will. She was perfectly willing, and was on "parole most of the time, except for the occasional interludes. . . "(Q) Was that," that is, her leaving the hospital on August 14, "pursuant to any arrangement that she should go on trial? "(A) Yes, it was a kind of trial. It was for a fortnight." He said that the electrical treatment which she received just before leaving was, in fact, not the sort of treatment that would be given to a person who was being discharged unconditionally and without any arrangement for a return. In cross-examination by Mr. Bennett on behalf of the wife, the following questions and answers appear: "(Q) The fact is that for the period from August "15 to the date of her re-admission on August 26, this woman "was the subject of no order at all? (A) That is so, other than "the fact that we knew she was returning. (The commissioner): "There was nothing legal? (A) No. (Q) Had she not desired "to return on August 26, she need not have done so? (A) She "would have had to have been certified; that would have been "inevitable. (Q) You will know from your experience that there "can be trial periods given to patients who remain the subject of "an order? (A) That is so, yes. (Q) That was not so in this "case, was it, because there was no order in force against her? "(A) There was no order in force against her." In re-examination: "(Q) If the patient had not returned at the end of the "period, what action would you have taken? (A) Mr. Charlton "would have had to have taken the action and called in doctors "to certify Mrs. Charlton. (The commissioner): Supposing he "had not taken any action? (A) Mrs. Charlton's conduct was "such that, if Mr. Charlton had not, someone would have had "to have done, because when she became impulsive she really "was dangerous and suicidal. It would have been quite "inevitable."

Those are the facts; and they disclose a tragic state of affairs in which one cannot help feeling great sympathy not only for the unfortunate wife herself but also for her husband. But I have found it impossible to conclude that, within the fair interpretation of the relevant parts of this section, it can be said that the wife underwent treatment after the termination of the order "without "any interval."

Mr. Pratt has very properly referred the court to cases in which the Court of Appeal has said that, in construing this Act, one must depart from so strict an interpretation of its language as would deprive it of sense and obvious intention. Thus, in Frank v. Frank,[1] the court came to the conclusion that where a patient who was being detained in an institution in Scotland was moved to an institution in England, the inevitable gap that occurred from the termination of the effectiveness of the Scottish order and the beginning of the effectiveness of the English order, a gap which was occupied in the patient being transported from one institution to the other, could not have been intended to constitute a break in continuity. It was demonstrated in that case that unless such inevitable gaps as were occupied with necessary transit were to be excluded from consideration, one would get from the language of the Act a result which could not possibly have been within the intention of its terms. But, although such a very strict construction of the language must be rejected if it is necessary to do so to make the terms of the section effective, it seems to me that that cannot justify giving to the section a construction not only so liberal but, as I think, so loose as to amount to the substitution for the language Parliament has used of some different language. Parliament has said "without "any interval"; and the argument of Mr. Pratt would, I think, compel us to interpret the section as though Parliament had said "without any substantial interval." But we are concerned with the language Parliament has used, and not with some other language which one might think, if it had been used, would have enabled us in the present case to avoid a possible hardship.

Mr. Pratt put his case also on the basis that, in all the circumstances, this interval of 12 days might be disregarded by application of the principle de minimis non curat lex. But I doubt whether it is legitimate to apply that principle in the construction of this section. In expressing that doubt I am indeed doing no more than echoing the language which Lord Greene M.R. used in this court in 1944 in Safford v. Safford.[2] In that case, Lord Greene M.R. said, in terms, that he doubted whether the principle could properly be applied. He said[3]: "I am very doubtful whether the principle of de minimis ought to "be applied. If detention means detention in a physical sense "it is interrupted by four days' absence just as much (though "not for so long) as by forty." In that case, the question was whether the detention had been "continuous." There had been, in fact, during certain periods actual physical absences from the place where the detention had occurred, although the orders for detention had still remained in operation; and it was pointed out by the Court of Appeal that detention was to be regarded rather as a status than by reference to the physical fact of being kept under lock and key at a particular place. No question of that kind arises in the present case. The facts are, as I have stated them by reference to the evidence, that during a period, which cannot be regarded as wholly negligible, the wife was living with her husband. The order for her previous detention had ceased to operate, and she had not taken the steps necessary to become a voluntary patient and she did not become a voluntary patient until 12 days had elapsed.

In my judgment, it is not possible, without doing violence to the plain words of this statute, to say in those circumstances that the treatment which followed the termination of the order's operation followed "without any interval"; and, though I repeat my sympathy for both the parties, I fear that no other conclusion is possible than that at which the commissioner arrived. I think, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed.

CHARLTON v. CHARLTON.

HODSON L.J.: I agree. The commissioner, I think, was bound to arrive at the conclusion at which he did arrive. The order lapsed on August 15, 1947, and from that date until the wife was re-admitted on August 26, there was no order in existence at all. On the latter date the wife became a voluntary patient, which she has remained ever since. It is not possible, therefore, for the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls, to say that her treatment as a voluntary patient followed " without any interval " a period during which she was detained under an order. I agree, therefore, that the appeal must fail.

PARKER L.J.: I have come to the same conclusion. From August 26, 1947, up to the date of the petition more than five years had elapsed during which the wife was incurably of unsound mind and was continuously under care and treatment. So far, therefore, the provisions of section 1 (1) (d) of the Act apply; but, in the case of a person receiving voluntary treatment under the Mental Treatment Act, 1930, as this wife was, the petitioning husband must show that the treatment as a voluntary patient followed " without any interval " a period during which she was detained. There appears to be no authority as to the meaning of those words " without any interval," but we were referred to a number of cases dealing with the meaning of the word " continuously " in connexion with the phrase " continuously " under care and treatment." Those cases appear to show that, once a person has acquired a status or quasi-status of a person detained or a person undergoing treatment as a voluntary patient, a break in the actual treatment may not prevent a continuation of that status: compare Safford v. Safford,[4] and a more recent case Swymer v. Swymer,[5] in particular the judgment of Lord Goddard C.J.[6] They also show that treatment may be said to be continuous even if there is a slight break in it, provided that that break is necessary (for example, in order to transfer the patient from one institution to another institution) and, for this reason, that to hold otherwise would defeat the whole intention of the Act: consider Frank v. Frank.[7] Further than this the cases do not go.

So far as the present case is concerned, clearly no question of status can arise, because the original order of detention had lapsed and the wife did not become a voluntary patient until 12 days later. Further, it seems to me quite impossible to say that the 12 days' interval in question here was an interval which was necessary for the purpose of her becoming a voluntary patient.

Mr. Pratt finally suggested that the principle of de minimis should be applied. Like the Master of the Rolls in the present case and Lord Greene M.R. in Safford v. Safford,[8] I share the doubts as to whether this principle can be applied in such a case as this; but, even if it could, I am quite satisfied that the interval of 12 days could not be brought within that principle. Sympathising, as I do, with the husband, I feel nevertheless that this appeal should be dismissed.

Legal Aid—Costs—Charge on property recovered—Plaintiff legally aided—Infant plaintiff suing through next friend—Small contribution—£125 paid into court for plaintiff by defendants—Tender accepted by plaintiff after commencement of trial—Settlement approved by judge—Plaintiff ordered to pay £20 towards defendants' costs—Balance of £105 ordered to be paid into county court for benefit of plaintiff—Whether subject to first charge for benefit of legal aid fund—Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949 (12, 13 & 14 Geo. 6, c. 51), s. 3 (4).

An infant plaintiff, suing by her father, brought an action against her employers for damages for personal injuries. She had been granted a legal aid certificate in her own name, her contribution being fixed at £4 10s. The defendants paid into court a sum of £125, which, at the commencement of the trial, with the approval of the judge, was accepted by the plaintiff. The attention of the judge was not directed to the provisions of the Legal Aid & Advice Act, 1949, in respect of the legal aid fund's costs, and he ordered that the money paid in, after the deduction of £20 in respect of the defendants' costs, should be transferred to the county court for the benefit of the infant plaintiff. Subsequently an application to the county court for the payment out to them of the money was made by the Law Society, who claimed that the legal aid fund had a first charge on the sum recovered in the action for the balance of the fund's costs not covered by the plaintiff's contribution. On appeal from the county court judge, who ordered payment out to the plaintiff on her application:—

Held, that the appeal must be allowed, since section 3 (4) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, gave to the legal aid fund a first charge on any property (including money) recovered or preserved in any proceedings in respect of the fund's legal costs not covered by the contribution of the person legally aided; and regulation 19 (1) (2) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, vested in the Law Society the right to enforce that first charge. Moreover, in the circumstances, the Law Society was "a person interested" under Ord. 16, r. 13 (2), of the County Court Rules.

LAW SOCIETY v. RUSHMAN.

Per Singleton L.J. It is most important in the administration of the service given by this Act that the plaintiff should be advised what the position is in a case such as this before a settlement is arrived at.

APPEAL from Judge Dutton Briant, sitting at Brighton County Court.

The following facts were stated by Singleton L.J. in delivering his judgment. The plaintiff, Miss Eileen Joyce Rushman, an infant, was injured when working for the defendants, and on January 25, 1952, suing through her father as her next friend, she issued a writ against them, claiming damages. On May 21, 1952, the defendants paid the sum of £120 into court. Subsequently an application for legal aid was made by the plaintiff's father as her next friend, and on October 29, 1952, a civil aid certificate was granted to the plaintiff "to continue proceedings "by her next friend," and her contribution was assessed at the sum of £4 10s. The acceptance of those terms was given both by the father as next friend and by the plaintiff herself, though the grant of legal aid was to the plaintiff.

On July 16, 1953, the action was in the list at Lewes Assizes to be heard and determined by Havers J., and it was decided at that stage that the plaintiff would accept the sum of £125 paid into court. Havers J. approved the settlement, and after consideration assessed at £20 the amount payable by the plaintiff to the defendants in respect of their costs after the date of the payment in. His order included the following passage: "And it "is further ordered that the sum of £125 aforementioned do "remain in court to abide the taxation of costs, the sum of £20 "or such smaller sum as shall be certified by the district registrar "as payable hereunder by the plaintiff to the defendants shall "be paid out to the defendants . . . and that the balance of the "said sum thereafter remaining in court be transferred to the "Brighton County Court there to be invested applied or otherwise "dealt with for the benefit of the plaintiff Eileen Joyce Rushman "in such manner as the county court in its discretion shall "think fit."

Accordingly, the sum of £105, plus interest, was transferred in due course to the Brighton County Court for the plaintiff's benefit. Subsequently, applications for payment out were made both by the plaintiff and by the Law Society. The latter claimed to be entitled to the money in part satisfaction of their costs under section 3 (4) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949.[1] On March 2, 1955, the county court judge gave a reserved judgment

[1] Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, s. 3 (4): "Except so far as regula- "tions otherwise provide, any sums "remaining unpaid on account of a "person's contribution to the legal aid "fund in respect of any proceedings "and, if the total contribution is less "than the net liability of that fund "on his account, a sum equal to the "deficiency shall be a first charge for "the benefit of the legal aid fund on "any property (wherever situate) "which is recovered or preserved for "him in the proceedings."

ordering the money to be paid out to the plaintiff. The Law Society appealed.

John Macgregor for the Law Society.
J. K. Wood for the plaintiff.

No case was cited in argument other than that referred to in the judgment.

SINGLETON L.J. stated the facts set out above, and continued: There having been an order made for the taxation of the plaintiff's costs under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, those costs were taxed as between solicitor and client at the sum of £213. That amount was reduced by 15 per cent. under the terms of the Act, and the amount paid out of the legal aid fund was in fact £172 odd. The plaintiff had contributed the sum of £4 10s. in accordance with the terms on which legal aid had been granted, and thus the sum of £167 10s. was due to the legal aid fund.

The order of Havers J. was made on July 16, 1953. Some time afterwards two applications were made, the one being directly opposed to the other, to Judge Archer, who was then the county court judge for the area which includes Brighton. One application was made by the Law Society that the £105 should be paid out to them; the other was an application by the plaintiff that it should be paid out to her. Judge Archer thought that there were difficulties because of the framing and the wording of the order of Havers J., and he adjourned the matter so that it might be mentioned to the judge. Meantime, there came a decision of the Divisional Court in Reg. v. Judge Fraser Harrison, Ex parte The Law Society.[1] When the Law Society's advisers saw that decision they thought their proper course was to go back to the county court and to ask again for the money to be paid out to them. They returned, and their application was heard by Judge Dutton Briant, who had been appointed as county court judge for that area a short time earlier. The judge also heard the application of the plaintiff, who appeared in person. On March 2, 1955, he delivered a reserved judgment in favour of Miss Rushman, ordering that the money should be paid out to her. Against that decision the Law Society appeals to this court.

[His Lordship read section 3 (4) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, and continued:] Property for this purpose includes money; the contrary has not been argued in this court. Thus the effect of section 3 (4) is that if the legal aid fund is out of pocket, any money recovered on behalf of a plaintiff is subject to a first charge for the benefit of the fund if there is a deficiency. Again I emphasize the words "a first charge." It ought to be understood that the legal aid fund is not wholly charitable. It has served for some years now a good purpose for persons whose financial position is such that they are unable to undertake litigation on the one side or the other unless they have help. Help is provided, and provided out of public funds, and the framers of the Act of Parliament thought it right to say that, if there was a deficiency arising from a person's contribution to the fund, the property recovered in an action should be subject to a first charge for the benefit of the fund.

If a person, with the help of the legal aid fund, obtains £5,000 damages, it is surely only right and proper that some part of those damages should be made available, if there be a deficiency, rather than that the public should bear the cost. There are many cases, no doubt, in which there are no funds available, and the cost to the public of the administration of the Legal Aid and Advice Act must be considerable. In a case such as the present, if the damages recovered amount only to a sum of £105, while the deficiency is £167 10s., it appears to me to be open to the Law Society, who administer the legal aid fund, to claim their first charge on the £105. It is unfortunate for the plaintiff that she did not recover more damages than the deficiency which arose in costs, but that is not the fault of the Law Society or of those who administer the legal aid fund. The £125 might have been taken out of court before there was an application for legal aid, or at a later stage before the case went to trial. Why it was not I do not know; nor do I know anything about the circumstances of the action or the injury, but at the trial the plaintiff was advised to take the £125 out of court. It is most important in the administration of the service given by this Act that the plaintiff should be advised what the position is in a case such as this before a settlement is arrived at. It is disappointing for a plaintiff if she is advised to take £125 out of court, and is not told she will not get a penny by reason of the fact that someone else has a charge over the whole amount, and it may lead some people to think that there is not so much good in the Act of 1949 as there is.

Section 3 (4) of the Act is clear in that it gives a first charge to the legal aid fund in respect of any deficiency there may be, and I should say that the later subsections of section 3 of the Act make it clear that this case is covered. In particular, subsection (5) covers the case of a compromise, as this may be described, although it was a compromise arrived at with the approval of the court.

Regulation 19 of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, provides: "(1) Any charge on property recovered or preserved "for an assisted person arising under section 3 (4) of the Act "shall vest in The Law Society. (2) The Law Society may "enforce any such charge in any manner which would be avail- "able if the charge had been given inter partes. (3) Any such "charge affecting land shall be a land charge of class B within "the meaning of section 10 of the Land Charges Act, 1925.

" (4) Subject to the provisions of the Land Charges Act, 1925, all " conveyances and acts done to defeat, or operating to defeat, " such charge shall, except in the case of a conveyance to a " bona fide purchaser for value without notice, be void as against " The Law Society."

In the regulations, as in the Act, care is taken to provide for the protection of public moneys in that way, and to provide a means of enforcing the first charge which is given under section 3 (4). Furthermore, there is no doubt that when circumstances such as these arise the Law Society is a " person " interested " under Ord. 16, r. 13 (2) of the County Court Rules, 1936.

When this matter was before the county court judge he had the help of counsel on one side, but the plaintiff appeared in person. The judge pointed out that he would be very glad if the case was considered elsewhere, but that he hoped, in such an event, the plaintiff would have some help to put her case before the court, as he had been without assistance on her side. Accordingly, it was arranged that she should have legal aid for the purposes of this appeal, and I am very glad that that was done. There were several reasons which led the judge to make an order that the money in court be paid out to the plaintiff. First, I think he was in something of a difficulty in view of the order made by Havers J. The difficulty was created by the fact that section 3 (4) of the Act of 1949 was not drawn to the attention of Havers J. If it was present to the mind of counsel in the case, I think it ought to have been mentioned; it would have saved a lot of trouble. Havers J. having made the order in the terms in which he did, I am inclined to think that thereafter there might have been an application made to him to reconsider the terms of his order under the slip rule, but it may be that no one thought of it until the money was lodged in the Brighton County Court.

Judge Dutton Briant, in the course of his judgment, referred to Reg. v. Judge Fraser Harrison, Ex parte The Law Society,[2] which was before the Divisional Court, consisting of Lord Goddard C.J., Cassels and Sellers JJ., on January 13, 1955. There the point raised was almost precisely the same as in the present case. Damages had been awarded by Glyn-Jones J., who approved a settlement; the money had been paid into the Liverpool County Court, and an application similar to the present was made. Glyn-Jones J. had said: " I gather that the defendants " have not offered to pay you any costs. We must leave the legal " aid fund to deal with the next friend." Judge Fraser Harrison thought it right not to order that the Law Society's application be granted, because of what Glyn-Jones J. had said. In the Divisional Court, on an application for an order of mandamus, the Lord Chief Justice, in the course of his judgment, made it clear that section 3 (4) gives a first charge to the Law Society, and that the county court judge had no option but to make the order which the Law Society sought.

LAW SOCIETY v. RUSHMAN.

To my mind, that case is on the same footing as the present case. It is true that there was no representation on behalf of the other party in that case, and some of the questions which have been mentioned before us were not argued there, but I see no distinction between the two cases.

Judge Dutton Briant, giving his reasons for making the order which he made, said: "This case can be distinguished from Reg. "v. Judge Fraser Harrison[3] in that Havers J. dealt with the "question of defendants' costs and ordered the plaintiff to pay a "sum not exceeding £20 towards the defendants' costs, clearly "with the intention that the plaintiff should receive the balance "of the money. If he had been informed that the effect of his "order was that the defendants would be deprived of the balance "of their costs over £20, and that the rest of the money would "go to the legal aid fund and not the plaintiff, I do not think he "would have limited the plaintiff's liability to £20. Unfor-"tunately, the defendants have had no opportunity of arguing this "point."

It may be that if the judge had realized the result of this, he would have thought it right to let the defendants in the action have more than £20; he might have done; why he should I do not know. That would not have had any effect on the plaintiff, nor would it have benefited her, and I do not think that upon that ground a distinction can be drawn between the present case and Reg. v. Judge Fraser Harrison.[3]

The next reason given by the county court judge is: "Although the legal aid certificate was granted nominally to the "plaintiff, as she was an infant she was under no personal liability "for costs, and the next friend was joined for the purpose of "meeting any liability for costs, and it is he, if anyone, who is "liable for the deficiency." In the ordinary way, where an action by an infant suing through his or her next friend fails, the order for costs will often be "costs against the next friend." That has no bearing upon this case. Legal aid was granted to the infant; the infant recovered in the action a sum of damages; those damages are subject to a first charge as a sum recovered in the proceedings. It matters not for this purpose whether the plaintiff is an infant or not, in view of the fact that the certificate was granted to the infant, and the first charge is given in respect of the deficiency in those proceedings, which were the proceedings in which the infant had been granted legal aid.

The third reason is: "Section 3 (4) of the Act provides for a "first charge on property recovered 'except in so far as regula-"'tions otherwise provide,' and regulation 19 (2) provides that "the Law Society 'may' enforce such charge. In my opinion

[3] [1955] 1 Q.B. 287.

" this gives the Law Society a discretion as to whether or to " what extent they should seek to enforce the charge." That is a matter for them. I suppose they have a discretion as to how far they will go in these matters, but it is right to say that when they are administering the legal aid fund they are dealing with public funds, and they owe a duty to the public which is at least as high as their duty to anyone else; it is sufficient to say they seek to enforce the first charge which they are given by the Act of Parliament.

Fourthly, the judge said: " That I am bound by the order of " Havers J., and by Ord. 16, r. 13 (4) of the County Court " Rules to administer the fund for the benefit of the plaintiff " within my discretion." It is the form of the order of Havers J. which caused some difficulty; none the less, if the county court judge was satisfied that the order was made without the attention of Havers J. having been called to the section in question, and if the section is clear, I think he ought to have followed it.

Fifthly, Judge Dutton Briant said: " There being conflicting " claims to the fund, I must exercise my discretion, having regard " to the benefit of the plaintiff, and in spite of the contention of " the Law Society that the charge would still attach to the money " in the hands of the plaintiff. I reject the argument that this is " a good reason for refusing payment out to the plaintiff. For these " reasons I order payment out of the whole sum in court to the " plaintiff."

I am not quite sure what that means. If the judge has a discretion, he must exercise the discretion according to law. His duty was to regard the terms of the statute. He must have realized that the order of Havers J. would not have been in that form if his attention had been drawn to the words of section 3 (4) of the Act of 1949. I should think that if the money is still in the county court it would be open to the Law Society to apply now for an injunction to prevent the plaintiff in the action from dealing with it pending the determination of the question; but if this court is satisfied that the Law Society's claim to a first charge is right, it would be idle that there should be further proceedings.

It appears to me for these reasons that the proper course is for this court to allow the appeal, and to say that the order which the Law Society seeks should be made. I wish to add one further observation. Consideration should be given to the framing of an order which will meet the position when a situation of this kind arises; it would save trouble if associates, both on circuit and in London, had this kind of question always present to their minds, for they are able to remind a judge if the position is not brought to his attention by counsel. There are provisions as regards moneys recovered by infants in R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14, and other provisions under regulation 16 of the Legal Aid Regulations, which overlap to some extent. There is no difficulty in the working of them provided that some form of order is devised which will cover both sets of circumstances.

JENKINS L.J. I agree, and find nothing I could usefully add to the reasons my Lord has given for holding that this appeal should be allowed, and that the sum in court should be paid out to the Law Society.

MORRIS L.J. I also fully agree with the judgment which has been delivered by my Lord, and I do not think I could add anything usefully to what has been said.

* WOODLANDS v. HINDS.

[1955 W. No. 307.]

Practice and Procedure—Summary procedure under Order 14A*—Action for specific performance—Alternative claim for damages—Agreement to purchase or to find a purchaser for shares in limited company—"Property" including shares—"Purchase"—R.S.C., Ord. XIVA (S.I.* 1954, No. 1728/*L.*25).

An agreement made between the plaintiff and the defendant was evidenced by the following letter dated January 14, 1952, signed by the defendant: "In consideration of your taking up 1,580 . . . "redeemable preference shares . . . in the . . . company, I under-"take either myself to purchase or to find a purchaser . . . for "such of the . . . shares in the company as you may hold on "December 25, 1954, and which by that date have not been "redeemed."

The defendant failed to fulfil the agreement and the plaintiff took out a summons for summary judgment under Order XIVA asking for specific performance or for damages in lieu thereof:—

Held, that, since (1) the order in its revised form applied to cases in which there were alternative claims for damages; (2) "property" included shares in a limited company; and (3) an agreement to purchase or find a purchaser for property was an agreement for the purchase of property within the meaning of the order, the agreement of January 14, 1952, was enforceable under Order XIVA.

SUMMONS under R.S.C., Ord. XIVA.

An agreement was made between the plaintiff and the defendant relating to certain shares in a private company, of which the defendant was a director. The agreement was in the first place oral; but later the defendant furnished a written statement of the terms of the agreement in the following letter, dated January 14, 1952: "Re Hind & Co. (Surrey) Ld.: In considera-"tion of your taking up 1,580 £1 6 per cent. redeemable " preference shares and 3,160 1s. 0d. ordinary shares in the above " company, I undertake either myself to purchase or to find a " purchaser at par for such of the redeemable preference shares " in the company as you may hold on December 25, 1954, and " which by that date have not been redeemed." The letter was signed by the defendant over a sixpenny stamp.

The plaintiff fulfilled his part of the agreement, and received share certificates for the shares. None of the preference shares was redeemed by December 25, 1954, but the defendant did not perform his part of the agreement, although he recognized the existence of the letter dated January 14, 1952, by various letters written during the year 1954. He paid a sum of £80 to the plaintiff's accountants, who acknowledged it as part payment for the plaintiff's shares in the company.

By the indorsement on the writ the plaintiff claimed for: (1) specific performance of the agreement evidenced by the letter of January 14, 1952; (2) alternatively, damages in lieu of specific performance; (3) damages in any event for delay in performing the agreement or alternatively for failure to perform the agreement; (4) an inquiry as to damages as aforesaid.

The plaintiff took out a summons for summary judgment under R.S.C., Ord. XIVA,[1] on March 29, 1955.

The minutes of order provided that the court, being of opinion that the agreement made on or about January 14, 1952, between the plaintiff and the defendant ought to be specifically performed, and the plaintiff having elected to treat the agreement as repudiated by the defendant, there should be an inquiry as to damages; and that in calculating the damages the defendant should be treated as having paid £80 in part payment under the agreement and the plaintiff as having transferred 80 of the shares comprised therein, and that within 14 days from the date of the master's certificate in answer to the inquiry the defendant should pay to the plaintiff the amount certified to be due in respect of such damages.

The master adjourned the summons into court to determine whether the contract came within Order XIVA.

Woodlands v. Hinds.

Vaisey J. This summons raises a somewhat curious point arising first, on the proper construction of an agreement which was originally oral, but which has either been reduced into writing or evidenced by a letter dated January 14, 1952, and secondly, on the true construction of the new Order XIVa, which came into operation on January 11, 1955.

The chief difference between the new Order XIVa and the old Order XIVa is that the latter only applied to agreements in writing, whereas the former applies to agreements whether in writing or not. There are also other differences between the two orders, some of which are material for the purposes of the present case. The first is this: the old Order XIVa was headed by the words "Summary Judgment for Specific Performance," but the new Order XIVa is headed with the words "Summary Judgment "in Actions for Specific Performance." Arising from that difference, it is to be observed that the kind of action to which both forms of the order apply is a claim for specific performance of an agreement for the sale or purchase of property, but the new order has put in these words: "with or without alternative claims "for damages, for rescission or for the forfeiture or return of "the deposit. . . ." I think that the difference is reflected or anticipated in the heading of the present order which provides not for summary judgment for specific performance, but for summary judgment in an action for specific performance which, as the rule indicates, may or may not include a number of alternative claims.

The new rule follows closely the words of the old rule, and provides: "the court or judge may thereupon give judgment in "the action unless the defendant . . . satisfies the court or "judge that he" is entitled to defend. I think that the new Order XIVa must, in order to make sense, be held to cover a case in which there are alternative claims to the main claim for specific performance. That is the position here. The plaintiff has elected to treat the agreement in question as repudiated and is asserting a claim for damages, which is one of the claims set out in the indorsement to the writ.

Another point taken, and rightly abandoned, was that property here means only real property, or, at any rate, chattels real or real property. "Property" is obviously a word of the widest possible import and includes personal property and real property and certainly includes the shares in a limited company.

The agreement in question, either as expressed in or evidenced by the letter of January 14, 1952, consists, so far as material, of an undertaking by the defendant either himself to purchase or to find a purchaser at par for certain preference shares.

It was alleged that a contract either to purchase or to find a purchaser at a fixed price for property is not an agreement for the sale or purchase of property, and that the alternative claims which are mentioned in the new order do not include an alternative claim to find a purchaser as an alternative to an agreement to purchase. There are several answers to that. The first is that the agreement is an agreement for sale or purchase of property, even though it contemplates that the purchase will be effected either by the contracting party himself, or by somebody whom he can produce before the appropriate date to take it over on the same terms in place of himself. I think that it is none the less an agreement for the sale or purchase of property because the purchaser may be either the contracting party or somebody else. Besides coming within the words of the new order as I have indicated, I doubt whether in such a case as the present the agreement to find a purchaser, as an alternative to becoming a purchaser, really adds anything to the sense of the arrangement. Every contract for the purchase of property may be carried out by the person who agrees to carry it out in his own person or by the substituted action of somebody found by that purchaser to do it.

Nor do I think that on the question of damages—and I assume and hold that this claim for damages comes within the new order—there is any difference; the damages may be, or would be, precisely the same. It can be tested in this way: suppose the purchaser, the signatory of this letter, became bankrupt so that he was wholly unable to perform the contract, or died, I think that if his trustee in bankruptcy or his legal personal representative found somebody else to take over the contract there would be no answer on the part of the vendor to say that he was only contracting with the immediate contractor and would not enter into an agreement with anybody else. The purchaser who is found, that is to say, the purchaser who is ready to purchase these shares at par, must have certain qualifications. In the first place, he must have the money; he must not be a man of straw. Secondly, he must be of full age, and as these are shares in a private company he must possess the necessary qualification to be accepted as a shareholder by the directors of the company.

On all these grounds, in spite of the objections which have been very ably put forward by the counsel for the defendant, I hold that this contract comes within the new Order XIVA.

I must make the order asked for and the costs must be the plaintiff's costs in any event.

Order accordingly.

Legal Aid—Costs—Order for costs against aided person—Relevant circumstances—Aided person uninsured driver—Supported by Motor Insurers Bureau—Whether to be taken into account in making order against unsuccessful aided person—Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949 (12 & 13 Geo. 6, c. 51), s. 2 (2) (e).

Road Traffic—Third party insurance—Motor Insurers Bureau.

The fact that an unsuccessful legally aided defendant, to an action for personal injuries incurred in a road accident, is supported by the Motor Insurers Bureau in the proceedings, as he was uninsured at the time of the accident, is a circumstance which is relevant to the question whether an order for costs against the aided person should be a full order or not, and the matter lies within the discretion of the trial judge.

ACTION.

Judgment was entered for the plaintiffs, Arthur Ralph Godfrey and Frederick Charles Humphrey Fowle, in an action in which they claimed damages for personal injuries incurred as a result of a collision between a motor-cycle, on which they were riding, and another motor-cycle ridden by the first defendant, Leslie Edward Smith. The second defendant, the first defendant's father, was dismissed from the suit. At the time of the accident the first defendant was uninsured and he was supported in the action by the Motor Insurers Bureau.[1] It was submitted by the plaintiffs that this was a matter which the judge could take into account in considering whether or not to make an order for the full amount of costs against the first defendant, but the first defendant contended to the contrary.

John D. Stocker for the plaintiffs.
Stephen Chapman Q.C. for the defendants.

DONOVAN J. In the ordinary way I should have made an order here for the sum of £50 by way of costs to be paid by the unsuccessful defendant by instalments of £1 a month, if he so wished, because, apart from one circumstance, there is nothing which would justify a full order. But it appeared that, at the time of this accident, the defendant was driving his motor-cycle uninsured, with the result that these proceedings, so far as he is concerned, are, to use a neutral term, supported by the Motor Insurers Bureau.

It is wrong to say that the bureau indemnifies the defendant against damages and costs. The position is, as I have been told,

[Reported by G. D. BLACK, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

[1] Pursuant to an agreement dated June 17, 1946, between the Minister of Transport and the Motor Insurers Bureau.

GODFREY v. SMITH.

that there is an agreement between the bureau, which was set up by the leading insurance companies, and the Minister of Transport, under which the bureau undertook to pay such damages and costs as were awarded in an action against an unsuccessful defendant. I am also told, and I accept it, that the judgment which is obtained by the plaintiff in such a case has to be assigned to the Motor Insurers Bureau, and that they, thereafter, are in a position to execute it against the defendant. Whether they do or not, I do not know, but I should imagine that if the defendant's means increased they would. It is said that that is a circumstance which I ought to take into account in determining what order as to costs ought to be made. Whether one calls it indemnity or by some other name, in fact the unsuccessful defendant will not, in the first instance at least, pay. It will be paid by the Motor Insurers Bureau, pursuant to their agreement with the Minister of Transport.

Whether I take that into account or not seems to me to be largely a matter of discretion, and I look at it in this way: Here is an individual plaintiff who is not legally aided, who has suffered a wrong, and who has been awarded damages in consequence. I think it would be wholly unjust if he had to be out of pocket of a considerable sum because the defendant was legally aided and could not, in the ordinary way, pay the full costs, which I should imagine amount to more than £50. I think justice requires that I should take into account the circumstance of the Motor Insurers Bureau being behind the defendant in the sense I have indicated, as something which is relevant when it comes to the question of making a full order or not. Therefore, I order that the first defendant shall pay the two plaintiffs' costs, as taxed in the ordinary way.

Held, (1) that, although the maximum period of 14 years might be appropriate for a new term where the goodwill attached to the premises by reason of the tenant's trade and business was substantial, the length of the new term should bear some relation to the nature and value of such goodwill and a lessor offering a new tenancy in lieu of compensation under section 4 did not commit himself to the grant of a tenancy for the maximum period, nor was such an offer in itself an admission that there was a "goodwill" as distinct from a "normal" rent. During the 21 year term goodwill had attached to the premises and, considering all the circumstances of the case, a reasonable term for the new tenancy was 10 years.

(2) That trading results, especially those for periods reasonably close to the end of the tenancy, might afford assistance in considering future rent, and that, in the circumstances, a reasonable method to adopt was to assess the "goodwill" as distinct from the "normal" rent, on figures estimated from such trading results, subtracting from the total amount of annual estimated takings amounts in respect of (a) expenditure, (b) interest on capital and in respect of profit (25 per cent. on estimated capital of £12,000) and (c) repairs, and to deduct from the sum so obtained such figure as would reduce it to the normal rent. A reasonable method of making that deduction was by way of a percentage which, on the facts, should be 10 per cent.

Whiteman Smith Motor Co. Ld. v. Chaplin [1934] 2 K.B. 35, 50; 50 T.L.R. 301 applied.

Per curiam. There is no power conferred on the tribunal under section 4 to deal with the terms of the new tenancy other than those relating to period and rent, and it is not open to the tribunal to introduce into the tenancy in a case arising under section 4 a condition in the terms of section 5 (5).

ORIGINATING SUMMONS adjourned into court for judgment.

By a lease dated November 21, 1932, premises known as the Cameo Cinema, Charing Cross Road, together with the fixtures, fittings, furniture, plant and equipment in and about or belonging to the premises were let from November 21, 1932, for 21 years at a weekly rent of £50 for the premises and £10 for the fixtures, etc. exclusive of rates.

On August 12, 1952, the tenants, the present applicants, served on the landlord, the respondent, a notice under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927,[1] claiming a new lease under section 5,

[1] Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 4: "(1) The tenant of a holding to "which this Part of this Act applies "shall . . . be entitled, at the ter- "mination of the tenancy on quitting "the holding, to be paid by his land- "lord compensation for goodwill if he "proves to the satisfaction of the "tribunal that by reason of the carry- "ing on by him or his predecessors in "title at the premises of a trade "or business for a period of not less "than five years goodwill has become "attached to the premises by reason "whereof the premises could be let at "a higher rent than they would have "realised had no such goodwill "attached thereto: Provided that . . . "(b) the tenant shall not be entitled "to compensation in respect of such "goodwill if within two months after "the making of the claim the land- "lord serves on the tenant notice "that he is willing and able to grant "to the tenant, or obtain the grant "to him of a renewal of, the "tenancy of the premises at which "the trade or business is carried on or, alternatively, £20,000 compensation for goodwill under section 4. On October 10, 1952, the landlord offered to grant a new lease at such rent and for such a term as, failing agreement, the tribunal might consider reasonable and on October 24, 1952, the tenants accepted that offer. On July 16, 1953, the tenants took out an originating summons for the determination of what was a reasonable rent and term for the renewal of their tenancy under the provisions of section 4 of the Act, and the proceedings were referred to a referee for inquiry and report. The referee considered that the landlord, in offering to grant a new lease, impliedly admitted that there was some adherent goodwill and, basing his assessment on the trading figures of the last three years, assessed the rent at £5,000 a year and was of the opinion that a new lease should be granted for 14 years subject to the condition (for determination by the landlord after seven years if the premises were required for re-development) contained in section 5 (5) of the Act.

Further facts and the findings of the referee are more fully stated in the judgment of Ashworth J.

George Avgherinos for the applicants.
Neville Faulks for the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 19. ASHWORTH J. read the following judgment: The proceedings herein, which arise under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, were begun by originating summons taken out on behalf of the applicants on July 16, 1953. The applicants are a company known as Rialto Cinemas Ld., and in December, 1932, they became assignees of a lease dated November 21, 1932,

" at such rent and for such term " not exceeding fourteen years as, " failing agreement, the tribunal may " consider reasonable . . . (d) the " tribunal shall, in determining the " amount of compensation for good- " will— . . . (ii) disregard any value " which is attributable exclusively to " the situation of the premises. (3) " Where an offer of the renewal of a " tenancy by the landlord under this " section is accepted by the tenant, " the rent fixed by the tribunal shall " be the rent which in the opinion of " the tribunal a willing lessee other " than the tenant would agree to give " and a willing lessor would agree to " accept for the premises having " regard to the terms of the lease, but " irrespective of the value of any good- " will which may have become " attached to the premises by reason " of the tenant or his predecessors in " title having carried on thereat a " particular trade or business.

S. 5. " (1) Where the tenant " alleges that, though he would be " entitled to compensation under the " last foregoing section, the sum which " could be awarded to him under that " section would not compensate him " for the loss of goodwill he will " suffer if he removes to and carries " on his trade or business in other " premises, he may in lieu of claiming " such compensation, . . . serve on " the landlord notice requiring a new " lease of the premises at which the " trade or business is carried on to be " granted to him. (5) Every lease " granted under this section shall, if " the landlord so requires, be subject " to a condition that if at any time " after the expiration of seven years " from the commencement of the term " thereof the premises are required " for the purpose of carrying out a " scheme of re-development, the land- " lord . . . may determine the lease " and resume possession . . . upon " payment of . . . compensation."

whereby premises situate in Charing Cross Road and known as the Cameo Cinema were demised for a term of 21 years from November 21, 1932, at the weekly rents of £50 for the premises and £10 for the furniture and equipment. The respondent, Henry Lucien Wolfe, was not the original lessor, but acquired the freehold subject to the lease. By an order dated July 30, 1953, the matter was referred to a referee for consideration and report, and in pursuance of that order came before Mr. B. Mark Goodman in the month of June, 1954. His report is dated September 16, 1954, and the case was then restored to the list and came before me on May 10 and 12, 1955. Both parties criticised the report. As appears from paragraph (h) of the originating summons, which was admitted in the answer, the applicants in August, 1952, served on the respondent a notice claiming a new lease or compensation for goodwill, and in October, 1952, the respondent served a counter-notice offering a renewal of the tenancy under the provisions of section 4 of the Act of 1927, which offer was accepted by the applicants. It was common ground between the parties that the issues which I have to decide are (a) for what term not exceeding 14 years the new lease should be granted, and (b) what rent should be fixed.

An outline of the history of the cinema is to be found in the report, from which I extract the following passages: "The "premises have been a cinema for many years prior to 1932, "one witness said prior to 1910, and are situated in a central "position with frontages to Charing Cross Road (Nos. 35 & 37), "Bear Street, which leads into Leicester Square and Hunt's "Court. Prior to the applicants' tenancy, the Cinema showed "feature films and was conducted on the lines of an ordinary "suburban cinema by the respondent's father. The applicants "leased the premises with the intention of converting it into a "News Theatre, as soon as the existing advance bookings of "films, which bookings they had to take over, ceased. Originally "there were 489 seats with licensed standing room for 80 persons. "Shortly after the applicants' tenancy begun, the seating was "slightly rearranged and the number of seats reduced to 464. "The main entrance was in Charing Cross Road, but there was "another entrance in Bear Street. On April 17, 1941, the "premises sustained bomb damage and ceased to be open as a "cinema. Various notices under the War Damage Acts were "served by the parties and from October, 1942, to some date "in 1944 the premises were used as a fun fair. In 1944 a licence "was obtained by the applicants to carry out temporary repairs, "and on August 6, 1945, the premises were reopened by the "applicants as a News Theatre. As the furniture, etc. had been "damaged or removed, the applicants had to repair, refurnish "and re-equip the premises, and by agreement the £10 a week "rent for furniture, etc. ceased and the applicants paid £50 a "week only. As a result of the bomb damage, the seating on "reopening was reduced to 414 and the licensed standing room

" from 80 to 35. Subsequently the seating was reduced to 403 " seats through the applicants installing a big screen. The audi- " torium had to be shortened because the projection room which " had been in a gallery had to be rebuilt on the ground floor, and " the Bear Street entrance was demolished and no longer exists."

It is convenient to mention here three matters which were the subject of agreement before the referee and are referred to in his report: " After some discussion the parties agreed further (1) that " the rent was to be assessed for an unfurnished and unequipped " cinema with its present seating capacity of 403 seats. (2) that " if at any time during the currency of the lease to be granted " the landlord obtains a licence to restore the cinema to its former " condition with a seating capacity of 464 or thereabouts, the rent " was to be reassessed. Mr. Faulks for the landlord stated the " latter was willing and anxious to restore the cinema when the " necessary licences can be obtained. (3) that in the absence of " agreement between the parties on the rent after restoration, " the matter was to be referred to me again." I should point out that in the course of the hearing before me it was stated without dissent on the part of the landlord that not only was he willing and anxious to restore the cinema, but that the new lease would contain a positive obligation on his part to do so when the licences were obtained.

Although the two issues now before me, namely, the issues as to the term of the new lease and as to the rent payable under it, are distinct, they cannot in my view be treated in isolation. The question what is a reasonable rent for the applicants to pay must be considered in relation to the period during which they are to be tenants, and I think it preferable to deal with the question of the term first.

Proviso (b) to section 4 (1) of the Act of 1927 enacts, in effect, that the tenancy is to be " for such term not exceeding 14 years " as, failing agreement, the tribunal may consider reasonable." In the present case agreement as to the term was not reached, the applicants seeking the full period of 14 years and the respondent contending that a 7 years' term is enough. The referee did not adopt either view, but recommended a term of 14 years subject to a condition in the terms provided by section 5 (5) of the Act, which reads as follows: " Every lease granted under this section " shall, if the landlord so requires, be subject to a condition that " if at any time after the expiration of seven years from the " commencement of the term thereof the premises are required " for the purpose of carrying out a scheme of re-development, the " landlord, on satisfying the tribunal that the premises are so " required, and on giving not less than twelve months' notice in " writing to the tenant, may determine the lease and resume " possession of the premises upon payment of such compensation " as the tribunal may determine to be the value of the unexpired " residue of the term of the lease."

RIALTO CINEMAS LD. v. WOLFE.

Ashworth J.

It was argued for the applicants that in the present case, which arises under section 4, there was no justification for introducing a condition applicable to a case arising under section 5. In support of this argument reference was made to subsection (2) of section 5, by which the tribunal is expressly empowered to order the grant of a new tenancy for such period not exceeding 14 years and on such terms as the tribunal may determine to be proper. No power is conferred upon the tribunal by section 4 to deal with the terms of the new tenancy other than those relating to period and rent, and for my part I do not think that it is open to the court to adopt the course recommended by the referee. Mr. Neville Faulks, who appeared for the respondent, did not seriously challenge the argument put forward on behalf of the applicants on this point, but did not in any way concede that a term of 14 years was reasonable.

It is to be noted that a term of 14 years is the maximum which in default of agreement can be imposed upon a lessor, and in my view it is reasonable to suppose that a term of that length was considered by Parliament to be appropriate for a case in which the goodwill attached to the premises by reason of the tenant's trade or business was substantial, or at least not open to doubt. In other words, the length of the new term should have some relation to the nature and value of such goodwill, and if a lessor offers a new tenancy in lieu of compensation under section 4, he does not commit himself to the grant of a tenancy for the maximum period of 14 years. In the present case the original lease was for a term of 21 years. As hereinafter appears, I have come to the conclusion that during that period goodwill did become attached to the premises which, but for the offer of a new tenancy, would have entitled the applicants to compensation, but I do not consider that such goodwill was of sufficient value to entitle them to the full term of 14 years by way of renewal. In deciding what term is reasonable I have considered all the circumstances of the case, and I shall deal with some of them in more detail in relation to the question of rent. My conclusion is that a reasonable term is one of 10 years.

So far as rent is concerned, it is convenient to start with a citation from subsection (3) of section 4 of the Act: "the rent "fixed by the tribunal shall be the rent which in the opinion of "the tribunal a willing lessee other than the tenant would agree "to give and a willing lessor would agree to accept for the "premises having regard to the terms of the lease, but irrespec- "tive of the value of any goodwill which may have become "attached to the premises by reason of the tenant or his pre- "decessors in title having carried on thereat a particular trade or "business." Although that subsection was not considered by the Court of Appeal in the leading case of Whiteman Smith Motor Co. Ld. v. Chaplin,[1] the judgments, in particular that of Maugham

L.J., contain statements of principle which are clearly applicable. As appears from the report,[2] certain matters which may favourably affect a business are none-the-less to be excluded from the valuation of the goodwill contemplated in section 4. For example, any value attributable exclusively to the situation of the premises must be excluded, subject however to the observations of Scrutton L.J. in Simpson v. Charrington & Co. Ld.[3] Further, an addition to the value due to an increase in the population, or a change in trading conditions, or a shortage of suitable premises, or other like conditions, must also be excluded. Further, profits due to the reputation of the proprietor, or to the personal skill or ability of the persons or the assistants employed in the business, must be excluded. Lastly, value which is largely or wholly due to the custom of persons who come to the premises simply because of their proximity, or because they lie on a line of route which the customers frequent, must be excluded.

Maugham L.J.[4] defined net adherent goodwill as meaning the goodwill, if any, which will remain attached to the premises, not including the site goodwill, that is, irrespective of customers who would come to a new tenant starting a new business, simply because of their convenient situation. Maugham L.J.[5] stated the problem in the following terms: "It follows that the real "question to be answered is: What is the addition to the value "of the premises in the hands of the landlord by reason of the "'net adherent goodwill'? This is in effect the same thing as "saying that the compensation to which the tenant would be "entitled is the difference, if any, between: (a) the value of the "reversion if the landlord were to let the premises at the goodwill "rent, i.e., for the purpose of the same business as that which "the tenant has carried on, and (b) the value of the reversion "if he let the premises at the normal rent."

In my judgment the problem in the present case is to fix what Maugham L.J. termed the normal rent, and the answer can best be ascertained by deciding first what is the goodwill rent, and then by deducting from it such figure as will reduce it to the normal rent. This appears to have been the method adopted by the referee and I agree with it, although I am unable to agree with the result as found by him.

Part of the argument before me centred upon the question of the material which the court is to take into consideration in fixing the rent. The respective expert witnesses adopted widely differing approaches. On the one hand, Mr. Levy on behalf of the applicants relied on his own experience and put forward estimates of his own which were in no way based upon the past trading results. On the other hand, Mr. Daly based his evidence on the past results, subject to their being adjusted in the light of his criticisms. Originally he relied on the relevant accounts for the three years ended respectively on March 25, 1951, March 30, 1952, and March 29, 1953, but in the course of the hearing before the referee, his attention was called to the draft accounts which had been prepared for the year ended March 28, 1954, and which were subject to audit. As the original lease terminated in November, 1953, these last-mentioned draft accounts covered a period during a considerable part of which the lease was still in being.

Warnings as to the risk of drawing wrong conclusions from figures of profit have been given on more than one occasion: see the judgments of Maugham L.J. in the case already cited,[6] and see also British & Argentine Meat Co. Ld. v. Randall.[7] So long as those warnings are kept well in mind, I am of opinion that trading results, especially trading results for periods reasonably close to the end of the tenancy, do afford assistance in considering the problem of rent for the future. I agree with counsel for the respondent that a witness, however experienced, who has not taken into account any of the trading figures, carries less weight than one who has at least considered them, and I am not surprised to find that the referee preferred Mr. Daly to Mr. Levy.

It is hardly necessary to state that, apart from the trading figures, there are other relevant factors. In the present case one of the most obvious is the site of the premises. The Cameo Cinema is in Charing Cross Road, close to Leicester Square, and is therefore in a position to attract a considerable volume of casual trade. Another factor (on which the evidence was conflicting) relates to the nature of the entertainment and its capacity to create goodwill. The Cameo Cinema has, since the year 1935 and subject to war-time interruption, been run as a News Theatre, with programmes made up of short films, the whole performance lasting approximately one hour. It is therefore an entertainment which is well adapted to suit the requirements of persons who have time on their hands and are prepared to spend it in a cinema without minding much which particular cinema it is. As against this there was evidence to show that persons do tend to go to a particular cinema, even a News Theatre, for its own sake and the substantial sums spent annually in advertisement must, I think, have had some effect in fostering and maintaining goodwill.

It was contended for the applicants that the respondent's counter-offer of a renewed tenancy in reply to the claim for compensation under section 4 constituted an implied admission that net adherent goodwill had been created by the applicants. In my view this contention, which appears to have been accepted by the referee, goes too far. Just as a counter-offer does not commit a lessor to an admission that the maximum term of 14 years is reasonable, so also it does not commit him to an admission that there is a "goodwill" rent as distinct from a "normal" rent. The most that can be said of a counter-offer is the comment that a lessor, who has premises to let for which there are would-be tenants in competition, is hardly likely to make a counter-offer if he is confident that no net adherent goodwill has been created.

[7] [1939] 4 All E.R. 293.

Proof of the creation of net adherent goodwill must frequently be a matter of difficulty for a lessee and the difficulty no doubt varies in degree according to the nature of the trade or business. In the case of a cinema carried on as a news theatre in the heart of London the difficulty is pronounced. On behalf of the respondent Mr. Daly expressed the view that no such goodwill had been created, but the referee did not accept this view. Nor do I. Having considered all the available evidence, I have reached the conclusion that the applicants have established that by their efforts, especially in the post-war period, some goodwill was created of which the respondent would receive the benefit, but (as will appear) I do not think that such goodwill calls for any substantial reduction in what Maugham L.J. described as the normal rent.

On the assumption that the past trading results are relevant to the question of future rent, the problem arises of how such figures are to be applied. Various suggestions were canvassed, namely, that one should look only to the figures of the financial year in the course of which the lease terminated; alternatively, that one should take an average of the results of recent years. The last completed accounts seen by Mr. Daly were those for the year ended March 29, 1953 (some eight months before the termination of the lease), and his evidence regarding future rent was therefore open to the criticism that he had not taken into account the change in circumstances revealed by the draft accounts for the year ended March 28, 1954. It appears from the shorthand note that a good deal of somewhat hasty arithmetic was carried out in the course of his evidence, and it is by no means easy to follow all the calculations recorded in the note as having been made by Mr. Daly and by counsel and by the referee.

The referee was favourably impressed by Mr. Daly as a witness, and I see no reason to take a different view. I have therefore thought it right to adopt in principle his method of arriving at a figure for future rent, but I have adopted somewhat different figures in the process and, as already stated, I have also decided that some allowance ought to be made for net adherent goodwill. I accept the referee's finding that the year 1954 was exceptional throughout the cinema trade and that the decline in takings then experienced generally might fairly be regarded as over. I have not overlooked the fact that the seating accommodation is now 403 instead of 464, but it was agreed on behalf of the respondent that the new lease should incorporate an obligation on him to restore the original seating capacity as soon as the necessary licences can be obtained.

Rialto Cinemas Ld. v. Wolfe.

Ashworth J.

I have considered the trading figures contained in the accounts for the years ended March, 1951, 1952 and 1953, and also the figures in the draft accounts for the year ended March, 1954. From the comprehensive picture presented by all those figures, the following conclusions may, in my judgment, reasonably be drawn: (a) that annual takings would amount to £38,000 or thereabouts; (b) that annual expenditure, excluding rent and also excluding a sum of £2,000 in respect of management expenses, would amount to £27,900. This figure is arrived at by deducting from a sum of £32,500 the aforementioned sum of £2,000 and a sum of £2,600 in respect of rent which was payable under the original lease and was included in the sum of £32,500. The question whether any and, if so, what deduction should be made in respect of management expenses was the subject of much evidence and argument, to the details of which I do not propose to refer. I consider that the management expenses actually included in the accounts were higher than a potential lessee would reasonably expect to incur, and the deduction of £2,000 is based upon Mr. Daly's evidence. On the other hand, in estimating expenditure at £32,500, I have kept in mind a point made on behalf of the applicants that any increase in rent would entail an increase in rates; (c) that a reasonable sum to attribute to the lessee in respect of interest on capital and in respect of profit would be £3,000 per annum, namely, 25 per cent. on an estimated capital of £12,000; (d) that a sum of £770 per annum would be a reasonable allowance in respect of repairs, being £500 in excess of the allowance laid down by statute, so as to take account of increased building costs.

These conclusions result in a balance of £6,330, made up as follows:

	Takings (para. (a))		£38,000
LESS	Expenditure (para. (b))	27,900
	Interest & Profit (para. (c))	3,000
	Repairs (para. (d))	770	31,670

This sum of £6,330 represents my view of what Maugham L.J. described as the goodwill rent and there remains for consideration the deduction necessary for the purpose of assessing what he defined as the normal rent. I am conscious that the result must on any view appear arbitrary, and that (as Maugham L.J. said [8]) it cannot be more than an intelligent guess, although I hope that at least it qualifies for that description. In my judgment a reasonable method of making the deduction is by way of a percentage, and I hold that 10 per cent., namely £630, should be deducted. The result is that I fix the rent at £5,700 per annum.

The plaintiff, the widow of a deceased testator, probate of whose will was granted on May 8, 1953, was dissatisfied with the provision made for her under the will. The plaintiff's solicitors were well aware of the six months' time limit prescribed for the making of an application under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, but refrained from taking immediate steps to issue a summons because they understood that an originating summons was to be taken out by the executors raising a question of the construction of the testator's will the answer to which might materially affect the widow's interest under it. On November 10, 1953, just outside the time limit, the plaintiff's solicitors took out a summons under the Act of 1938. A construction summons was never taken out, although until January, 1955, it was understood that such would be the case.

The plaintiff now asked for an extension of time within which the summons could lawfully be taken out for the purposes of the Act:—

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

The plaintiff widow of a testator, who died on February 11, 1953, being dissatisfied with the provision made for her under her husband's will was minded to take out a summons under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938,[1] asking for increased provision to be made for her out of his estate. Probate of the testator's will was granted on May 8, 1953, and, accordingly, the time prescribed by the Act within which such an application could be made expired on November 7 or 9, 1953 (November 8 being a Sunday). Shortly after the testator's death the plaintiff's solicitors were informed by solicitors acting on behalf of the executors that, on the advice of counsel, an originating summons would be taken out for the determination of the question whether the plaintiff took a life interest in the part of the testator's estate representing the assets of his business. Accordingly, the plaintiff's solicitors took no immediate steps to take out a summons under the Act of 1938, for the need for such action would depend on the outcome of the construction summons to be taken out by the executors.

The plaintiff's solicitors were well aware of the six months' time limit prescribed by the Act of 1938 and became anxious when no construction summons was taken out before the long vacation of 1953. It was still anticipated, however, that a summons would be taken out by the executors and this view continued to be held until January, 1955, when counsel advised the executors contrary to the opinion which had originally been given by other counsel, that there was no doubt about the effect

In the meantime, on November 10, 1953, the plaintiff's solicitors had taken out a summons under the Act of 1938.

The plaintiff now asked for an extension of time within which the summons could lawfully be taken out for the purposes of the Act.

B. S. Tatham for the third defendant, a beneficiary.

The case cited in argument is referred to in the judgment.

DANCKWERTS J. [having stated the facts:] In these circumstances, the plaintiff asks for an extension of time within which the summons can lawfully be taken out for the purposes of the Act. This application is not opposed by the executors, but it is opposed by the last defendant, who is joined as a beneficiary because she appears in a representative capacity on behalf of a class and feels it her duty therefore to put forward such arguments as shall be made against the granting of the application.

I have been referred to the decision of Roxburgh J. in In re Greaves.[1] In that case, apparently, there was a mistake by the solicitors for the plaintiff in the sense that it appeared that they were ignorant of the time limit. There had been negotiations in that case which might have avoided the necessity for starting any proceedings at all, but they apparently fell through and when the application was made it was two months out of time. Roxburgh J. held that the error was due to the mistake of the solicitors and as that was not a circumstance affecting the administration or distribution of the estate, he felt bound to refuse the application.

In the present case, it is true there has also been a mistake by the solicitors. There is that common feature between the two cases. But the mistake in the present case was of a different nature for the solicitors were apparently well aware of the date by which the summons ought to have been taken out, as well as the provisions of the amendment in the Act of 1952. It arose because the solicitors for the plaintiff were kept waiting by the executors' solicitors, who had led them to suppose that some proceedings would be started by the executors for the construction of the will. In one sense that is not a complete answer because it does not prevent the plaintiff starting her proceedings and having them adjourned pending a decision on the originating summons taken out by the executors.

On the whole, it seems to me that this is a case in which it would be a hardship if the time were not extended. I think that applications of this nature must be considered upon the particular facts in each case, and it is difficult to see that there is any general principle governing them except in so far as it is laid down in the provisions of the Intestates' Estates Act, 1952. In my judgment the present case falls directly within the words of sub-paragraph (b): "in consequence of a question whether a person "had an interest in the estate, or as to the nature of an interest "in the estate, not having been determined at the time when "representation was first taken out." It seems to me that there was a "question" in this case, and that it had "not been "determined." Therefore, I have power to extend the time and in my view it is a case in which I should extend the time. Accordingly, I will extend the time until the expiration of November 11, 1953.

[His Lordship directed that the plaintiff should pay the costs of all the defendants as between party and party, and that the first and second defendants should receive their costs as trustees according to the new form. Landlord and Tenant—Rent restriction. Court of Appeal—County court—Appeal from.

The plaintiff sought to recover possession from the defendant of a dwelling-house within the Rent Restriction Acts on the ground that the defendant had been guilty of conduct which was "a "nuisance or annoyance to adjoining occupiers" within paragraph (b) of the First Schedule to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933. The plaintiff's particulars of claim were dated October 23, 1954, and the case was not heard until March, 1955. The county court judge held that the plaintiff had established that on three occasions, the last of which was in June, 1954, the defendant's conduct had amounted to a serious "nuisance or annoyance." The judge refused to make an order for possession but he ordered the defendant to pay the plaintiff's costs:—

Held, (1) that, although the terms of Order 47, r. 1, of the County Court Rules, 1936,[1] appeared to put no limit upon the way in which a county court judge could exercise his discretion as to costs, in the ordinary case, where a defendant had been wholly successful, it was not a proper exercise of the judicial discretion to order such a defendant to pay the plaintiff's costs; and that such an order would be one upon which an appeal would be entertained by the Court of Appeal.

(2) But that, in a possession application under the Rent Acts, the plaintiff having established facts giving the court jurisdiction to make an order, it might then withhold relief by reason of matters of which the plaintiff had had no knowledge, and, accordingly, there was no reason for limiting the judge's discretion as to costs; and that the order as to costs in this case should not be interfered with.

APPEAL from Judge Elder Jones, sitting at Wandsworth County Court.

The plaintiff, Harry Frederick Ottway, had let the top floor of No. 84 Mount Ararat Road, Richmond, being premises within the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts, to the defendant, William Jones. The plaintiff had served a notice to quit dated July 16, 1954, on the defendant, and on October 23, 1954, started these proceedings to recover possession. The particulars of claim alleged that the defendant had been guilty of conduct which was "a nuisance or annoyance to adjoining occupiers" within the First Schedule, paragraph (b), to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933. Particulars were given of a number of acts on the part of the defendant of which the plaintiff complained.

The case did not come on for hearing until March, 1955. The judge then found that the plaintiff had proved three incidents which amounted to a nuisance and annoyance, but he held that as the last of those incidents had occurred in June, 1954, it would be harsh to make an order for possession. He directed the defendant to pay the plaintiff's costs. The county court judge's judgment is fully stated in the judgment of Evershed M.R.

The defendant appealed against the order as to costs.

OTTWAY v. JONES.

The following decisions were referred to in argument in addition to those referred to in the judgment: Hong v. *A. & R. Brown Ld.; Westgate v. Crowe†; Lloyd Del Pacifico v. Board of Trade.‡

EVERSHED M.R. This is an appeal, solely upon the question of costs, from a decision of a county court judge. Whereas under the rules applicable to the Supreme Court it would require leave, prima facie, to appeal to the Court of Appeal on a question of costs only, that provision does not find a place in the County Court Rules. The relevant rule now is Order 47, r. 1: "Subject "to the provisions of any Act or rule, the costs of proceedings "in a county court shall be in the discretion of the court"; and then follows a proviso relating to executors, and the like, which has no application to the present case. There appears to be no provision in the present County Courts Act, 1934, directed to this matter. It may, however, be relevant to observe that the provisions of the Judicature Act of 1925 as to costs—which relate in terms to the Supreme Court—are found, inter alia, in section 50 of that Act: "Subject to the provisions of this Act "and to rules of court and to the express provisions of any other "Act, the costs of and incidental to all proceedings in the "Supreme Court, including the administration of estates and "trusts, shall be in the discretion of the court or judge, and the "court or judge shall have full power to determine by whom and "to what extent the costs are to be paid."

I have read that section as lending (as I think) some support to the view that, if regard is had only to the terms of Order 47, r. 1, it would appear to rest entirely in the discretion of the county court judge by whom the costs of any proceedings should be paid, even though the person ordered to pay the costs had in substance or in fact been wholly successful—a view which again, I think, is supported by the reasoning in the speeches in the House of Lords in Donald Campbell & Co. Ld. v. Pollak[1] (see particularly the language of Cave L.C.).

But although the terms of the rule on the face of them appear to put no limit upon the way in which a judge exercises his discretion as to costs, there is, I think, no doubt that, in what I will call (and I will later define what I mean by the phrase) the ordinary case, where there is a decision to the effect that a defendant has been wholly successful, it is not a proper judicial exercise of the discretion to order such a defendant to pay the plaintiff's costs. That the judge may deprive the successful defendant of the costs which prima facie he would expect to recover is another matter. But decisions to which our attention has been drawn by Mr. Vowden for the defendant (of which the last one cited, Foster v. Great Western Railway Co.,[2] in this court, is an example) do, I think, undoubtedly establish as a general proposition, in what I have called the "ordinary" case, that it is not a good exercise of judicial discretion to order a successful defendant to pay the plaintiff's costs; so that such an order would be one upon which an appeal in this court would be entertained. Nevertheless, since the matter of costs is so much a matter of discretion it is equally true to say that the Court of Appeal will entertain appeals on matters of costs with great caution.

When Mr. Vowden first opened this case it looked to me, I must confess, very much as though there had been here an error on the part of the county court judge in what I have called the judicial exercise of the powers vested in him; for this was a case in which the plaintiff sought an order for possession of his premises which were in the occupation of the defendant, who admittedly had the protection of the Rent Acts; and the plaintiff failed to get the order which he sought or, indeed, to get any relief such as he prayed against the defendant. Nevertheless the judge, quite deliberately (because his attention was particularly drawn to the matter), ordered the defendant to pay the costs of the unsuccessful plaintiff.

I propose to read the whole of the note of the county court judge's judgment with which we have been supplied, because it states the facts of the case and also includes an expression of the judge's grounds for making the order as to costs which he did. The judgment is as follows: "I find that the plaintiff has become "psychopathic about the activities of the defendant not perhaps "without reason—and he sees an enemy under every bush. "Almost anything annoys him and is a nuisance, so I have to "take his evidence with great caution. But I am satisfied that "there were serious incidents on 2nd, 3rd May, 1953, and in "June of 1954, i.e., drunkenness, bullying behaviour frighten-"ing the plaintiff, and urinating, and unpardonable bullying "behaviour over the shed. Also malicious teasing plaintiff by "turning off water. I think other incidents of water are quite "unproved and are imaginary, and the objection to the fires and "the dog are similar. Only those three incidents are proved to "my satisfaction and are nuisance and annoyance. Defendant "is a liar, and is not to be trusted at all. I find him a bully and "that he did try (and successfully) to dominate the tenants but "plaintiff certainly provoked. As all three incidents long ago, "not reasonable to order possession. Can't make suspended "order for possession usefully. No order for possession, but as "nuisance and annoyance established defendant pay plaintiff's "costs Scale 2. Note. Mr. Vowden asked me if my order as "to costs was per incuriam, or did I mean it. I told him that "I did mean it; that I had decided it was unreasonable to make

" an order because the three incidents which I considered serious " were long ago. But that I found his client had been a ' nuisance " ' and annoyance,' and that, had this been a claim analogous to " an action for trespass and an injunction where damages could " be given in lieu of an injunction," and then there appears " (sic, in lieu of order for possession)," which I am not quite sure that I follow, but it may be " secus, in lieu of an order for " possession "—" then I would have awarded damages. I was " satisfied that the case was made out sufficiently to carry costs, " but in the circumstances it seemed to me the extreme penalty " of eviction of the defendant would be harsh."

To that narrative in the judgment I only desire to add very little, but that little must, I think, be added. It will be apparent that the nature of the case which the plaintiff set out to prove was that the defendant had acted in such a way as to cause a nuisance and an annoyance. That is a reference to the First Schedule to the Act of 1933, para. (b), " the tenant . . . has " been guilty of conduct which is a nuisance or annoyance to " adjoining occupiers, or has been convicted of using the premises " or allowing the premises to be used for an immoral or illegal " purpose . . ."

The other matter which I must add is this. The case was eventually heard and the judgment pronounced in March of the present year. The proceedings had been begun a great deal earlier, the date on the particulars of claim being October 23, 1954. It will be appreciated that the last of the three episodes which the judge mentioned, and which he said constituted acts of nuisance or annoyance within paragraph (b) of the schedule, occurred in June, 1954. We were informed that the hearing of the case was, for one reason or another, postponed—not for a reason for which the plaintiff was in any way at fault, but it was postponed; so that, when the judge heard the case in March, there was nothing proved as having constituted an act within paragraph (b) since the previous June. And that is the explanation of the emphasis, which twice occurs in the judgment, on the fact that the incidents had taken place some time ago.

In those circumstances it appeared to me, when we heard the case opened, that what the judge had really decided was this, that, having regard to the distance of time which had elapsed since the last incident of which there had been a valid complaint, it would be unreasonable to make an order for possession: in other words that, in considering the question whether he should make an order for possession, the judge was not influenced by the order for costs which he later made and which he then anticipated. But I am left in a little doubt as to that in view of the last three lines of the notes—" I was satisfied that the case " was made out sufficiently to carry costs, but in the circum- " stances it seemed to me the extreme penalty of eviction of the " defendant would be harsh." And so there was raised and discussed during the course of the argument this question:

whether a judge, in making up his mind whether it was reasonable to make an order for possession, could consider what order for costs he could or would make and allow his decision on reasonableness to be influenced by a forecast in his own mind of the order he would be later likely to make as to costs; or, to put the matter in another way, whether a judge, in considering the reasonableness of an order for possession, could or should consider what order as to costs he would (or, if the appellant is right, could) make, if no order for possession were made. I do not find it necessary to express any final view on the question, for, in all the circumstances of the case, I have come to the conclusion, upon another ground, that we ought not to interfere with the order which the judge made.

I should like to say (what is indeed obvious) that, where a plaintiff in the end fails, it must be a very unusual thing to order the successful defendant to pay the costs; and it would only be in exceptional cases that a judge would think it right to make such an order. Still, this is a matter of discretion; and, unless it is shown here that the judge erred upon some matter of principle, we should not, according to the well-established rules applicable to such matters, vary the discretion of the judge or seek to substitute a discretion of our own.

The basis upon which, in my judgment, this case ought to be decided lies in the peculiar jurisdiction of the court under the Rent Restrictions Acts. It will be convenient to read the opening words of section 3 of the Rent Act of 1933: "No order "or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house "to which the principal Acts apply or for the ejectment of a "tenant therefrom shall be made or given unless the court "considers it reasonable to make such an order or give such a "judgment, and either—(a)" (which is the relevant paragraph for present purposes) "the court has power so to do under the "provisions set out in the First Schedule to this Act." It will be seen, therefore, that Parliament has erected, so to speak, two fences, both of which a plaintiff must surmount, if an order is to be made in his favour for possession. But the two fences (if I may adhere to the metaphor) are of dissimilar character and structure; for the plaintiff must first of all establish, as a matter of fact or of right, that the court has power to make such an order. In order to do that, where the case falls within paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of section 3, the plaintiff has to establish that his case is within one or other of the paragraphs of the First Schedule. In that respect the plaintiff is in the same position as the plaintiff in what I have called (and I will now proceed to define) an ordinary action. In an ordinary action the plaintiff seeks to establish some matter of right, the existence of which depends upon his proving the necessary facts, and then invoking whatever is the appropriate provision of the law. But

v.
JONES.
Evershed M.R.

it is a matter of right: if the facts are proved, the right is established. That is the first stage in a rent case where a plaintiff seeks possession.

Having surmounted that fence, however, there is still the second obstacle; but in that case the plaintiff no longer is in the position of one seeking to establish a matter of right: there is no matter of right. When the plaintiff has established his right, that is, he has shown that he is in a position to invoke the jurisdiction, the court has to decide, as a matter of its own discretion, whether the remedy suggested, or indeed any remedy or relief, ought to be given. In determining that matter the court has to exercise a discretion, the character of which has been laid down in language often cited from the judgment of Lord Greene M.R. in Cumming v. Danson.[3] "the duty of the "judge" he said, "is to take into account all relevant circum-"stances as they exist at the date of the hearing. That he must "do in what I venture to call a broad, common-sense way as a "man of the world, and come to his conclusion, giving such "weight as he thinks right to the various factors in the situation. "Some factors may have little or no weight, others may be "decisive."

It is plain from the nature of that discretion that its exercise may depend upon matters of which a plaintiff might have no knowledge at all before the matter is tried out—circumstances affecting the personal or domestic considerations of the defendant, and the like. It seems, therefore, to me that in a Rent Act case, unlike an ordinary action, the question is not one of the plaintiff seeking to establish some matter of private right which, if he does suceed in establishing it, gives him the palm of victory; and so that, if he fails, as a matter again of right, prima facie at any rate he would expect to have to pay the costs which would be the fruit for the defendant of his victory.

Looked at in that way, I return again to the facts of the present case. From the judgment that I have read, it is quite plain that, though the incidents proved were in number but three, they were incidents of a very startling character; and the reference to the notes of the evidence emphasizes what the judge says, that the defendant, in addition to being a liar and not to be trusted at all, was a bully; he behaved beyond a doubt outrageously on each one of these three occasions. The plaintiff, I understand, is by trade or profession a musician, and plays in the Symphony Orchestra of the British Broadcasting Corporation. He may therefore well be a man of somewhat sensitive nature; and, as the judge says, and as Mr. Lester emphasized, the bullying and extremely vulgar behaviour of the defendant would be likely enough to have a serious effect upon not only the plaintiff's peace of mind but also upon his imaginative faculties; and one may indeed ask, in such circumstances, what could the plaintiff do to protect himself? He brought his action. So far as the matter rested on private right and upon his establishing such a case as empowered the court to give him relief, he succeeded. But then the judge, basing himself (and I assume basing himself substantially, if not exclusively) upon the fact that when he tried the matter in March, 1955, no incident had been proved since June of 1954, and after considering no doubt the other circumstances—for example, the circumstances of the defendant's household and family—came to the conclusion, to use his own words, that "the "extreme penalty of eviction would be harsh." But in those circumstances can it be said that this county court judge departed from a due exercise of his judicial duty in dealing with costs, having regard to the circumstance that, the plaintiff having done all he could as plaintiff to establish his cause of action, he nevertheless did not get the relief which it was within the discretion of the judge to give?

I said earlier that to make the defendant (who in the end succeeds in the sense that no relief is ordered against him) pay the costs of the plaintiff (who fails in the sense that no relief is obtained at his suit) requires a strong and exceptional case. But I cannot think that in a rent case such an award of costs must necessarily be in excess either of the powers of the county court judge or of a proper exercise of his judicial discretion.

Reverting to the cases which were cited, it is here, I think, that the contrast appears with such a case as that of Andrew v. Grove,[4] to which Mr. Vowden also referred. In that case Lord Alverstone C.J., who delivered the leading judgment of the Divisional Court upon an appeal from a county court judge, said[5]: "In my opinion this is a section" (he had referred to section 113 of the County Courts Act, 1888, since repealed) "which enables the county court judge to award costs in the "exercise of a judicial discretion, but to give him that discretion "there must be some right established by the plaintiff." In that case the plaintiff had failed to establish a right, because the defendant set up (as he was entitled to do) the Gaming Acts as an answer to the plaintiff's case. In the present case, however, applying strictly Lord Alverstone C.J.'s dictum, the question of right was successfully litigated by the plaintiff, because he established what he had to set out to prove, namely, power in the county court, by virtue of conduct by the tenant falling within paragraph (b) of the schedule, to grant relief, if in all the circumstances the court thought fit to grant it. Beyond that, the plaintiff could not, as a matter of right, establish anything: he could only submit himself to the discretion of the judge. And so again, I think that the case is to be distinguished from the sort of case this court had in mind in the language cited from Brett L.J.'s judgment in Foster v. Great Western Railway Co.,[6] to which I have already referred, for the Lord Justice said, in reference to the old Chancery cases of Witt v. Corcoran [7] and Dicks v. Yates,[8] "[they] seem to me to show that in the "opinion of the judges in the Court of Appeal, which if it is the "ground of their judgments is binding upon us even although "we did not agree with it, the meaning of Order 55 is that "there should be an absolute discretion over all costs within the "jurisdiction of the High Court, and that the jurisdiction of the "High Court should be precisely what the jurisdiction of the "Court of Chancery was before, and therefore, that where the "defendant has absolutely succeeded no order can be made "against the defendant in favour of the plaintiff for any part of "the costs of the litigation."

In the present case that observation seems to me inapplicable. It cannot, I think, be true to say of the defendant here that he absolutely succeeded. Upon the matter of private right (as I have many times said) he failed: the plaintiff succeeded. And so this case, being within the ambit of the Rent Acts, must be considered, as I think, in the light of the very special provisions of those Acts, and the peculiar nature of the limitations put upon a plaintiff's right to a remedy by virtue of the wide discretion reposed in a judge on the matter of reasonableness. I think it is indeed important, if justice is to be done, that these discretions should be of the widest possible character, and I should be very sorry to limit them. In the present case justice undoubtedly was to my mind done, because I do not see what else the unfortunate plaintiff could do but bring the case to the attention of the court, in an attempt to get a relief from the tempestuous conduct of the defendant. The judge, having regard to the length of time, felt that "the extreme penalty would be harsh"; but I should find it very difficult for my part to say that, in the result, it would be just that the plaintiff should have to pay any costs or, indeed, that there should be any other result than that this plaintiff should have the costs to which he had been put paid by the defendant, who was responsible for all that had occurred.

For these reasons I think we ought not to interfere with the judge's discretion; and I would dismiss the appeal.

HODSON L.J. I entirely agree with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, and cannot usefully add anything.

PARKER L.J. I have come to the same conclusion. It is, I think, clear, that the discretion of the county court judge under Order 47, rule 1 of the County Court Rules, just as that of a High Court judge under section 50 of the Judicature Act, 1925, is, on the face of it, completely unfettered. I say "on the face "of it" because, of course, the discretion cannot be exercised arbitrarily; it must be exercised judicially and on fixed principles dictated by reason and justice. One starts with this, that as a general principle costs follow the event, and the successful party is entitled to be paid his costs, unless there are special grounds to order otherwise; and those grounds, it is well settled, must be grounds connected with the cause of action. No doubt also where a plaintiff has wholly failed to establish his title or his right, it is impossible judicially to order the successful defendant to pay the plaintiff's costs. Indeed, as is shown by the cases to which my Lord has referred, it is there said that the occasion for the exercise of the discretion does not arise until the plaintiff has established his right. But it seems to me that those cases and that principle do not apply and cannot apply where the case, as under the Rent Acts, is a case calling for discretionary relief. Under the Rent Acts a plaintiff has to prove certain facts before the jurisdiction of the court arises to grant any relief at all. Once those facts are proved and the plaintiff has succeeded in establishing jurisdiction, then it may be that he will nevertheless fail to get his relief because of something which may be completely unknown to him, such as the extent and the needs of the defendant's family. In such a case, I can see no reason for limiting the wide discretion which exists to order the defendant to pay the plaintiff's costs. No doubt cases when that will be done will be rare: in general, it will be sufficient to deprive the successful defendant of his costs and not to order him to pay the plaintiff's costs. But, so far as this case is concerned, it is quite clear that the defendant's conduct was such as not merely to provoke the plaintiff but to make it inevitable and necessary that he should bring the proceedings—proceedings in which he ultimately failed, although, so far as lay in his power, he proved and satisfied the judge of the jurisdiction to grant the relief.

I would, in these circumstances, dismiss this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

REGINA v. BRYANT.

A person subject to military law who commits an offence coming within section 18 of the Army Act [1]—for example, the stealing of military property—should be charged under that section and not under the common law.

Simple larceny is an offence at common law, and when it is charged no reference should be made to section 2 of the Larceny Act, 1916.[2]

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant, Sergeant John William Bryant, Royal Army Service Corps, was convicted before a court-martial sitting in the Canal Zone, Egypt, of stealing two Egyptian pounds, the property of the president of the regimental institute of No. 1 Cold Storage Depot, Royal Army Service Corps, and was sentenced to reduction to the ranks. The appellant was charged under section 41 of the Army Act of committing the civil offence of larceny "contrary "to section 2 of the Larceny Act, 1916," which prescribes a maximum sentence of five years' imprisonment for the offence. The appellant appealed on the ground that the charge should have been laid against him under section 18 of the Army Act, which deals specifically with the offence of stealing the property of a service institution, and which limits the punishment upon conviction to two years' imprisonment " . . . or such less LORD GODDARD C.J. The appellant was charged and convicted before a court-martial sitting in the Canal Zone of an offence which was stated in the charge sheet as "committing a civil "offence, that is to say, larceny contrary to section 2 of the "Larceny Act, 1916, in that he at Port Said on December 22, "1954, stole two Egyptian pounds, the property of the president "of the regimental institute of No. 1 Cold Storage Depot, Royal "Army Service Corps." The appellant does not dispute the justice of his conviction in the sense that he has not alleged on the merits that he was not guilty of theft. The point he took was that he ought to have been charged under section 18 of the Army Act and not under section 41. The judge-advocate advised the court that, although he might have been charged under section 18, he was nevertheless liable to be charged under section 41 and, accordingly, the court convicted him and sentenced him to be reduced to the ranks, he being a sergeant.

This court desires to state that they entirely agree that the appellant ought to have been charged under section 18. It is highly desirable that the prosecuting authorities should make up their minds before starting a prosecution what is the appropriate section of the Army Act under which an accused person should be tried and charge him under that section, but in the particular matter with which we are dealing, it does not make any difference to the conviction whether he was charged under section 41 of the Army Act with committing a civil offence punishable under the law of England or under section 18 of that Act, which specifically deals, inter alia, with the offence of stealing the property of a service institution. What is said here is that he ought to have been charged under section 18, and that he cannot be charged under section 2 of the Larceny Act, 1916, because section 2 of the Larceny Act states: "Stealing for which no "special punishment is provided under this or any other Act for "the time being in force shall be simple larceny and a felony "punishable with imprisonment for any term not exceeding five "years."

The first thing to be noted is that section 2 of the Larceny Act does not create an offence. Larceny was always an offence at common law. Section 2 of the Larceny Act, 1916, is a section solely concerned with punishment, that is to say, if a person is guilty of larceny and there is no other punishment provided by the Larceny Act or any other Act, he is liable to a maximum of five years' imprisonment for the offence. It is worthy of note that the words "contrary to section 2 of the Larceny Act, 1916," which are contained in the charge sheet, are surplusage. If a person is charged with simple larceny, he is charged with a common law offence and not an offence against a particular statute.

C.-M. A. C. 1955

Byrne J. has reminded me of rule 4 (3) of Schedule I to the Indictments Act, 1915, which provides: "The statement of "offence shall describe the offence shortly in ordinary language, "avoiding as far as possible the use of technical terms, and "without necessarily stating all the essential elements of the "offence, and if the offence charged is one created by statute, "shall contain a reference to the section of the statute creating "the offence." Simple larceny is not an offence created by statute; it is an offence at common law. Therefore, the charge sheet might have left out the words "contrary to section 2" and simply stated "committing a civil offence," that is to say, larceny. A soldier commits larceny. What is the position?

[His Lordship read the relevant portions of section 41, and continued:] If the soldier is charged with larceny and is convicted, he is liable to serve such punishment as is assigned for such offence by the law of England. In cases of simple larceny, if there is no other section of the Larceny Act, 1916, or any other Act which imposes any particular sentence, he is liable under section 2 to five years. But section 18 of the Army Act provides: "Every person subject to military law who commits any of the "following offences; that is to say . . . (4) Steals, embezzles or "fraudulently misapplies or receives, knowing it to have been "stolen or embezzled, any property belonging to a person subject "to military law, or belonging to any service mess or band or "to any service institution, or to the Navy, Army and Air Force "Institutes, or any public property . . . shall, on conviction by "court-martial, be liable to suffer imprisonment, [for a term not "exceeding two years] . . ." That limits the penalty to two years, but it does not affect the offence; it affects the penalty. It limits the penalty to two years because the accused being a soldier convicted of simple larceny there is a special section which provides that two years is the maximum sentence. This is only limited to convictions by court-martial; he is liable to two years instead of being liable to five years. There is no question here of any length of sentence because the appellant was not sentenced to imprisonment at all. Section 18 provides that he shall "be liable "to suffer imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or "such less punishment as is in this Act mentioned," and such less punishment was reduction to the ranks. That was the sentence imposed.

Accordingly, the appeal is dismissed, but the court would emphasize the desirability of the prosecution making up their minds what the offence is that is charged, and the facts relating to the offence before they commence proceedings; and if it is an offence which falls within section 18, as does apparently stealing government stores by a soldier, then he should be charged under section 18 and not under the common law. If the authorities do charge him under the common law, they should leave out any words relating to section 2 of the Larceny Act, 1916, and charge him, as it is proper to charge him in this country, simply with the common law offence of larceny.

Hire Purchase — Hire-purchase agreement — Assignment — Prohibition against assignment of goods or benefit of agreement—Option to purchase—Sale of goods by hirer—Tender of balance of hire and purchase price by purchasers — Purchasers without rights under hire-purchase agreement—Damages not restricted to balance of hire and purchase price.

Detinue—Damages.

On October 8, 1952, the plaintiffs let a motor-van under a hire-purchase agreement which provided, inter alia, that "the hirer . . . "shall not sell, offer for sale, assign or charge the goods or the "benefit of this agreement . . ." and which contained a provision giving to the hirer, on payment of all instalments and moneys due under the agreement, an option to purchase the van for 10s. On December 24, 1953, during the currency of the hire-purchase agreement, the hirer sold the van to one T., who in turn sold it to the defendants. On January 4, 1954, the plaintiffs served a notice upon the hirer terminating the agreement and on the same day the defendants, on the basis that they had become entitled to exercise the right of the hirer under the agreement, tendered to the plaintiffs the amount of the unpaid balance of hire and the 10s. purchase-money. The plaintiffs, having refused to accept the tender, claimed in detinue for the return of the van or alternatively its value:—

Held, that since the hire-purchase agreement by its terms prohibited the hirer from assigning either the goods themselves or the benefit of the agreement, he was unable to pass any rights in the van or under the agreement to T. which T. could pass to the defendants; that the defendants, therefore, had no interest in the goods which diminished the value of them in their hands and no contractual rights against the plaintiffs enabling them to cut down the plaintiffs' prima facie right to recover the van or its value, and accordingly, in default of the return of the van the amount payable to the plaintiffs was not the outstanding balance of hire and the purchase-money, but was the full value of the van.

By an agreement dated October 8, 1952, the plaintiffs, United Dominions Trust (Commercial) Ld., a company dealing in hire-purchase finance, let a 10 cwt. Morris Cowley van to one John Theodore Williams under a hire-purchase agreement, for a term of 18 months from October 8, 1952. The schedule to the agreement set out the price of the van as £579 15s. with charges of £46 8s., making a total hiring cost of £626 3s. An initial instalment of rent of £193 5s. was payable on the making of the agreement, leaving £432 18s. balance of hire to be paid by 18 monthly instalments of £24 1s. each, the first payable on November 8, 1952, and each subsequent instalment on the same day of each succeeding month.

By clause 1 of the agreement "The hiring shall commence "on the date [October 8, 1952] specified in the schedule and "unless determined by the hirer or the owner as hereinafter "provided shall continue for the period of hire . . ." By clause 2 "The hirer shall upon the making of this agreement "pay the initial instalment of rent . . . and shall punctually "pay the several instalments of the balance of hire as set out "in the schedule on the dates therein provided." Clause 6 of the agreement provided that "during the continuance of this agree-"ment the hirer shall keep the goods in his own possession at the "address specified in the schedule and maintain the goods in "proper repair and in good and serviceable condition and shall "not use or permit the goods to be used for any purpose for "which they are not designed or reasonably suitable and shall "not sell, offer for sale, assign or charge the goods or the benefit "of this agreement nor create any lien on the goods or pledge "the owner's credit either for repairs thereto or otherwise and "shall not make or allow any removal, obliteration or change of "any identification marks thereon or purport or attempt to do "any of such things." By clause 7 "The goods are and shall "remain the property of the owner unless and until the hirer "exercises the option to purchase contained in this agreement "after becoming entitled so to do and the hirer will at all times "allow the owner . . . reasonable facilities for inspection of the "goods and access for that purpose to any premises in or upon "which the goods may be." By clause 13 "If the hirer shall "make default for ten days in payment of any instalment . . . "or if the hirer shall commit any breach of any term hereof or "shall do or suffer anything whatsoever which in the owner's "opinion bona fide formed upon reasonable grounds will or may "have the effect of jeopardising the owner's rights of property "in the goods the owner shall have the right by notice forthwith "to terminate this agreement and to retake possession of the "goods . . . and thereupon this agreement shall cease and deter-"mine but the hirer shall be liable for, and the owner shall have "the right to recover against the hirer, all instalments which at " the date of such termination shall then be in arrear and unpaid " together with interest thereon . . . and . . . any other sum " that may at the date of such termination be due from or " payable by the hirer to the owner." By clause 17 " . . . if " and when all instalments and other moneys payable by the " hirer to the owner under this agreement shall have been duly " paid and provided that the hirer shall not have committed any " breach of the provisions of this agreement then the hirer shall " have the option (but shall not be bound) to purchase the goods " for the sum of ten shillings."

Williams paid the initial payment and all the instalments as they fell due under the agreement up to December 8, 1953, but on that day, in breach of the covenant in clause 6, he advertised the van for sale. On December 24 one Trotter induced Williams to enter into an agreement to sell the van to him, and gave Williams a cheque for £453. That cheque was valueless and it was later held that the transaction in which Williams parted with the van to Trotter was a transaction obtained by false pretences. On December 26 Trotter purported to resell the van to the defendants. The defendants knew that the van was subject to hire-purchase terms but it was part of the terms as between them and Trotter that Trotter would see that Williams would exercise his right under clause 17 to pay to the plaintiffs the balance due under the hire-purchase agreement and the 10s. purchase-money, and the defendants paid Trotter £410 12s. On December 28, Williams reported the matter to the plaintiffs and paid the instalment which had become due on December 8. On January 4, 1954, the plaintiffs served a notice upon Williams terminating the hire-purchase agreement, and on the same day the defendants tendered to the plaintiffs by cheque the sum of £96 10s., the amount of the unpaid balance of hire and option money, and subsequently, when the cheque was returned, the same amount in cash, on the basis that they had become entitled to exercise the right of Williams under the agreement.

The plaintiffs refused to accept the tender by the defendants, but demanded the return of the van. They now claimed in detinue against the defendants, alleging that the defendants had wrongfully converted the van to their own use and claiming the return of the van; alternatively, its value and damages for its detention.

The defendants denied that the plaintiffs were entitled to possession of the van. They contended that on December 24, 1953, Williams, having paid all the moneys due under the hire-purchase agreement, was entitled on payment of the sum of £96 to purchase the van for 10s. and that, since the plaintiffs had not terminated the agreement by notice in accordance with clause 13 the plaintiffs, in refusing to accept payment of the sum of £96 10s., were in breach of the implied condition of the agreement that the hirer might exercise his option to purchase the van and that the plaintiffs would accept the payments in full discharge of the obligations under it.

Maurice Lyell Q.C. and J. M. Rankin for the plaintiffs.
John Thompson Q.C. and J. W. Borders for the defendants.

The following cases were referred to in argument: Belsize Motor Supply Co. Ld. v. Cox *; Whiteley Ld. v. Hilt †; Brierly v. Kendall ‡; Chinery v. Viall §; and Johnson v. Stear.‖

McNAIR J., having stated the facts substantially as set out above, and observed that since Williams had, on December 28, 1953, paid the instalment which was due on December 8, he was not on that date in breach of his agreement otherwise than by reason of the fact that he had sold or attempted to sell in breach of clause 6, continued: The real dispute between the parties is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the value of the van at the date of conversion, the sum of £350, or whether their claim for damages is limited to the sum of £96 10s. Normally, a party who converts the property of another is bound to pay him the real value of the property so converted, but it is said on behalf of the defendants that while accepting that as a general rule the law recognizes an exception applicable to cases of this nature, namely, that in these circumstances the damages payable to the hire-purchase company are limited to the outstanding hire money and the money which it would be necessary to pay to exercise the option of purchase.

Mr. Thompson primarily relies in support of that contention on two cases: Belsize Motor Supply Company v. Cox [1] and Whiteley Ld. v. Hilt,[2] a decision of the Court of Appeal. In the former of those cases Channell J. had to consider two points: one, whether the hirer under a hire-purchase agreement in similar, but not identical, terms with the present, was a person who could part with property under section 25 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, to a person taking it from him in good faith; and, secondly, the question of damages.

I am not concerned here with the first question, but with the question of damages, on which, it being a question of a pledge, Channell J. held that as the pledgee had an interest in the vehicle the measure of damages was not the full value of the vehicle but was only the value of the owners' interest therein, that is, the amount of the hire and purchase-money remaining unpaid.

In the course of his judgment, he said [3]: "The second point "in the case is more doubtful. Does this case come within the " exception to the general rule that in an action for conversion " the measure of damages is the value of the goods and chattels " converted? There is an exception to that rule where the " defendant has an interest in the goods and chattels converted; " then the measure of damages is the value of the plaintiff's " interest as between himself and the defendants. This exception " has often been recognized; for example, in Brierly v. Kendall,[4] " Chinery v. Viall,[5] and Johnson v. Stear.[6] I am not aware of " any binding authority applying this exception to a case where " the rights of the parties depend upon a hire and purchase " agreement. The defendant is not himself the original bailee, " but is a third person deriving title from the original bailee. In " the present case he is a pledgee. A pledgee or purchaser takes " such title as his pledgor or vendor has, and here, whether the " pledge to the defendant was rightful or wrongful (in this case " it was wrongful), yet the defendant thereby acquired such " rights as the Burgess Company, the original hirers, had."

In my judgment, it is quite clear that Channell J. took the view, as a matter of construction of that particular hire-purchase agreement, that the hire-purchase agreement itself was assignable. The clause in that case, concerning re-letting and selling part of the possession, is in these terms[7]: " The hirer shall not " re-let, sell or part with the possession of the said motor taxi- " cab . . . without the previous consent in writing of the owners " or their said agents." But there is nothing in Belsize Motor Supply Co. v. Cox[7] in any way comparable with the words in clause 6 of the agreement in the present case which prohibit the hirer from assigning the goods or the benefit of this agreement. That Channell J. took the view that an assignable interest in the contract passed to the defendants in the case he was considering is, I think, clear from the language to which I have referred and from the cases noted in his judgment upon which he relied. In each of those cases, which have been examined before me, the defendant had a contractual interest in the goods and when sued by the respective plaintiffs for conversion was able to say that as between him and the plaintiff he, the defendant, had an interest in the goods which had the effect of diminishing the value of the goods in his hands. In Belsize Motor Supply Co. v. Cox,[7] also, the defendant Cox was in a position to say that he had an interest arising under the hire-purchase agreement which gave him a right to obtain the ownership of the motor-vehicle on payment of the unpaid balance. That can only be upon the footing that that contractual option was an assignable option and had in fact in the circumstances been assigned to the pledgee.

Whiteley Ltd. v. Hilt[8] was a case arising out of a hire-purchase agreement under which a piano was let out on hire by Whiteley

Ld. to a Miss Nolan and passed into the possession of the defendant. The question in that case, too, was whether, inasmuch as the original hirer, Miss Nolan, had a right to acquire ownership by exercising an option, the defendant, as her assignee, could exercise the same right and so limit the amount of damages recoverable. Swinfen Eady M.R., giving the leading judgment, states the question for the court as follows [9]: "The first question "which arises is whether Mrs. Widlake"—Mrs. Widlake was formerly Miss Nolan—"had any interest under the hire-purchase "agreement which she could lawfully assign." Warrington L.J.[10] and Duke L.J.[11] posed the question in the same terms.

It was only because the Court of Appeal came to the conclusion, on the facts of that case, that the original hire-purchase agreement was assignable that they limited the plaintiffs' right to recover in the same way as it had been limited by Channell J. in Belsize Motor Supply Co. v. Cox.[12] The Belsize case [12] is only referred to in the judgments by Warrington L.J.,[13] and I think it is clear from the way in which he refers to that case that he treats it as being a case parallel to the case then before the court.

If one turns to the particular contract here, it is quite clear that, by its terms, the hirer is prohibited from assigning or purporting to assign or attempting to assign either the goods themselves or the benefit of this agreement. Accordingly, as it seems to me, Williams, the hirer, was unable to pass any rights in the van or any rights under the agreement to Trotter; and if he could not pass any rights to Trotter then Trotter could not pass any rights to the defendants. Accordingly, the defendants are in the position of persons who have no interest in the goods and have no contractual rights or other rights against the plaintiffs which enable them to cut down the plaintiffs' prima facie right to recover the value of the goods. Accordingly, in my judgment, they are entitled to the return of the van or to recover the sum of £350, the approved value of the motor-van.

Will—Construction—Omission—Implied power of appointment—Words inserted—No restriction on method of exercise—Drafting by scissors or paste.

A testator settled a share of his residuary estate on each of his four daughters for life, and provided that "... after the death "of [each] such daughter my trustees shall hold such share and "future income thereof upon trust for all or such one or more "exclusively of the others or other of the children or remoter issue "of such daughter and in default of and subject to any such "appointment in trust for all or any the children or child of such "daughter of mine ..."

On the hearing of a summons to ascertain whether on the true construction of his will the testator intended to confer on each of his daughters a special power of appointment enabling her to appoint her share of residue among her issue, (1) by deed or will or codicil, or (2) by will or codicil:—

Held, that the will should be read as it stood without the omission of any part of it, even though that would involve the addition of a power of appointment; but as it was not known what sort of a power the testator would have given, there should be inserted a power of appointment without any restriction on its exercise, and the will should read as if it contained the words "... as she shall "appoint ..." immediately before the words "... and in default "of and subject to any such appointment ..."

John Cory made his will on December 31, 1920, and two codicils thereto (not here material) in 1925 and 1931 respectively. He died in 1931, and his will was admitted to probate on January 23, 1932.

By clause 19 of his will the testator devised and bequeathed the residue of his real and personal estate to his trustees on the usual trusts for sale and conversion, and gave certain gifts of income to his wife and to a daughter. By clause 19 (f) of his will, subject to those bequests, the testator provided that his trustees were to stand possessed of the residue upon trust for his children, Amy, Alice, Florence, Edith, John and Charles, "... in equal shares share and share alike as tenants in "common ..." He settled his daughters' shares so that each daughter should have a life interest in her share, subject to restraint from anticipation; and the clause continued: "... and "after the death of such daughter my trustees shall hold such "share and future income thereof upon trust for all or such one "or more exclusively of the others or other of the children or "remoter issue of such daughter and in default of and subject

The trustees of the will took out this summons to ascertain whether on the true construction of the will the power of appointment referred to in clause 19 (f) was intended to confer on each of the testator's daughters (i) a special power of appointment enabling her to appoint her share of residue by deed or by will or codicil among her issue, or (ii) a special power enabling her to appoint by will or codicil, or (iii) any and if so what other power of appointment.

C. A. Settle for the plaintiffs, trustees of the will.

Allan Heyman for the first four defendants, the testator's daughters.

D. A. Thomas for the fifth defendant, a grandson of the testator.

Case cited in argument not referred to in the judgment: In re Smith.[1]

HARMAN J., having stated the facts, continued: It leaps to the eye that clause 19 (f) is imperfect. It is in common form and one's instinct is to say at once that the testator intended to give his daughters a power of appointment and left it out by mistake, because here the area of selection was clearly started by him—" such one or more exclusively of the others or other of the " children or remoter issue of such daughter "; but the power of selection is not given. Indeed, one finds the words " . . . and " in default of and subject to any such appointment in trust for " all or any the children . . ." It is clear, therefore, that there was, as the clause stands, an appointment in contemplation.

Mr. Thomas pointed out that in the edition of Key and Elphinstone then current (10th ed. (1914), vol. 2, p. 896), if one read to the end of paragraph 6 at the top of the page and went straight on to paragraph 7, without putting in the words creating the power to which reference has been made, one would produce exactly the result that was produced here. It may well be that that is what happened. But, he submitted, it is as easy to look at it the other way. One may suppose either that the words conferring the power were there and were purposely cut out, or that these words were assumed to be there and were accidentally left out. In other words, it is as easy on this document to use scissors as paste. That being so, a certain result can be produced with this document by putting things in, and an equally good result can be produced by taking them out to the like extent. The question is which should be done.

Mr. Thomas rightly pressed me with the decision of In re Follett,[1] where the Court of Appeal declined to follow the speculations, as they held them to be, of Roxburgh J., where he put in a number of words. Jenkins L.J. pointed out that it is possible that, after the clause had been discussed between the testator and his advisers, the testator was minded to cut it out, but the excision was imperfectly done.

Mr. Thomas also drew attention to the fact that there is no hotchpot clause in this will. It is usual—and I may take judicial notice of this—in wills giving powers of appointment unequally per stirpes to provide that an appointed stirps will bring into hotchpot what it takes under the clause, which operates in default of appointment. That is to produce, so far as may be, equality between the branches of the family.

He urges me to hold that the draftsman cut out the power and cut out the hotchpot clause but left more lines in than he should have done. That is very attractive, but it means that I must not read the whole of the will which has been admitted to probate, but must strike out a portion of it, because this is not a will such as that in Follett's case,[2] where, by a certain hard wresting of the language, one could make sense of it as it stood. It is clear that a power of selection was intended if I am to read the will as it stands. All that is left out is what power of selection was intended. I do not think that I ought to cut any words out of the will, unless I am forced to do so.

It was urged on me that the special powers now provided for in the various text books are always in a form of a power to appoint by deed or will. On the other hand, there is a form of special power, which is less fashionable today, which is the power which provides for various ancillary payments for education, advancement, etc., in the trustees' discretion, all to be imported into the power. There are many possibilities. In a will drawn in 1920 a man might well have provided that the appointment should be by deed which should be witnessed by more than two persons. By 1926, as it was pointed out, that was altered by section 159 of the Law of Property Act, 1925; but in 1920 such a provision was still not unlikely.

On the whole, I feel that this will must be read without excision, the whole of it being included, even though the result is to involve an addition. I think that here I am justified in adding the power. It is true that I do not know exactly what it is that the testator might have inserted as the power, so all that I propose to do is to add the power, without stating in any way what sort of power he intended.

I propose, therefore, to read the will by treating as added the words "... as she shall appoint ..." immediately before the words "... and in default of such appointment ..." That Husband and Wife—Nullity—Intention to marry—Marriage to evade immigration regulations—Intention to become man and wife—Valid marriage.

In 1925 a woman of German nationality went through a ceremony of marriage with an Englishman, the sole object of the marriage being to enable her to enter and remain in England and thus to continue an irregular association which she had formed in Germany with another Englishman who was already married and unable to obtain a divorce. The irregular association continued until 1948 and the parties themselves never lived together as man and wife. On the wife's petition that the marriage should be declared null and void:—

Held, dismissing that petition, that, where parties went through a ceremony of marriage only for the sake of representing it as such to the outside world but with the intention of becoming man and wife, in the absence of any element of duress, the marriage was valid.

Observations in H. v. H. [1954] P. 258, 269; [1953] 3 W.L.R. 849; [1953] 2 All E.R. 1229 applied.

United States v. Rubenstein (1945) 151 Fed.Rep. (2nd Ser.) 915 not followed.

WIFE'S UNDEFENDED PETITION for declaration of nullity or, in the alternative, divorce.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment. The petitioner, Bertha Anna Silver, otherwise Kraft, was born in Stuttgart, and there in 1919 met one Abraham Springer, whom she then thought to be unmarried. They fell in love with one another and became engaged. She went to England with him in 1921 and met his parents. She then for the first time discovered that he was a married man and had several children, though he was living apart from his wife. She returned to Germany, telling her parents nothing of the discovery which she had made during her visit to England. Later Abraham Springer returned to Germany and made it clear that he was unable to obtain a divorce, and the petitioner and he decided to live together as man and wife. This they did for a short time in England; later she returned to Germany with him and they lived together as man and wife in Cologne, where he had civilian employment with the army of occupation.

In 1925 Springer's employment in Germany ceased; he returned to England and the petitioner to her mother in Stuttgart. In the summer of that year he went out to Germany again and it was agreed between them that the petitioner should go through a ceremony of marriage with the respondent, Samuel Silver (the stepbrother of Abraham Springer), the object of this marriage being to enable the petitioner to enter England and remain there as long as she wished. In accordance with this plan, on November 13, 1925, Samuel Silver and the petitioner went through a ceremony of marriage at the register office in Stuttgart. After the ceremony they travelled back to London together; the petitioner met Abraham Springer at the station in London, and they resumed living together. The petitioner saw the respondent only once more before the death of Abraham Springer in 1948, and that was on an occasion, some six months after the marriage, when she accompanied him to the Home Office and there declared that she and the respondent had cohabited for six months, the object of that being to prevent her having to return to Germany again. Apart from that application she had no contact with the respondent from the time they parted in London until 1951. She continued to live with Abraham Springer until he died on June 23, 1948.

In 1951 she met another man, a German, whom she wished to marry. Some time after meeting him she traced the respondent and arranged to meet him; they did so, and discussed the possibility of a divorce. It was not, however, until 1954, after she had again met the German whom she wished to marry, that any further meeting was arranged between herself and the respondent. A meeting was arranged; the respondent did not attend but sent his sister, and from her the petitioner for the first time discovered that the respondent had, since 1940, been living with a woman by whom he had had three children.

H. V. Brandon for the wife petitioner.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

COLLINGWOOD J. stated the facts and continued: On those facts the court is asked to say that, the parties having agreed to go through a ceremony of marriage, solely for the purpose of representing themselves as married to the immigration authorities of this country and without any intention of ever living together as man and wife, the purported marriage was null and void for want of consent.

The voluntary consent of both parties is necessary for a valid marriage, and the marriage is void if such consent is lacking, as, for example, where it is procured by threats or duress. Mental reservations on the part of one or both of the parties to a marriage do not affect its validity. Thus, in Brodic v. Brodic,[1] the wife petitioned for restitution of conjugal rights and the husband pleaded an agreement signed by both parties before the marriage whereby it was agreed that he should, after the marriage, live separate and apart from his wife and that she should not require him to live with her by any legal proceeding. Horridge J. held the agreement to be void as against public policy and that the respondent's plea was no answer to the petition, and he granted the wife a decree of restitution, thereby affirming the validity of the marriage, which, indeed, was never in question in that case.

In H. v. H.[2] the wife petitioned for a declaration of nullity on the ground of duress. The ceremony took place in Budapest at a time when the Communist Government ruled Hungary, and the object of the marriage was to enable her to obtain a French passport and to leave the country. The parties agreed that the marriage should be in name only, and it was never, in fact, consummated. Karminski J. found that the fear entertained by the wife of the danger which remaining in Hungary would entail was of such a kind as to negative her consent to the marriage, and he granted a decree of nullity. In the course of his judgment he said[3]: "If the present case was devoid of the element of fear "I should be compelled to find that the parties to the present "suit intended that the petitioner should become the wife of the "respondent", and he declined to follow the reasoning in a decision in the United States Circuit Court of Appeal[4] that "if "the spouses agree to a marriage only for the sake of repre- "senting it as such to the outside world and with the under- "standing that they will put an end to it as soon as it has "served its purpose to deceive, they have never really agreed to "be married at all."

I respectfully agree with the view of Karminski J., and hold that the parties here intended that they should become man and wife, and went through the ceremony with that object, and that there being no element of duress the prayer for a decree of nullity must be rejected.

As to the prayer for dissolution, the court is asked to exercise its discretion in the petitioner's favour. In coming to a decision upon that question I have had regard to the interests of the petitioner, who wishes to marry again, the fact that no question arises of a possible reconciliation between the spouses, the interests of the woman with whom the respondent has been living for a number of years and the interests of the children whom she has borne, for, though marriage will not legitimize them, they can at least be adopted by their parents in the event of their marriage; and, finally, the interests of the community

Husband and Wife—Property—Proceedings under Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17—House purchased jointly for home—Intention of parties that house be owned in equal shares and that husband meet mortgage payments — Wife's payment of certain household expenses—Part of mortgage repaid by husband—Application by husband for order that house belonged to him—Duty of court to give effect to intention of parties — Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 17.

A house was conveyed to a husband and wife jointly, both contributing equal amounts towards the purchase price of £1,760, and both being parties to the mortgage deed for the balance. It was agreed between them that the husband would make the weekly payments on the mortgage, the wife paying other expenses of the matrimonial home out of her own earnings. Later the parties fell out, and though both continued to live in the house, the wife began proceedings against her husband for judicial separation. Before the hearing of that petition, the husband applied to the county court under section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, for an order that the house belonged to him. At that time about half the mortgage had been paid off. The county court judge found that when the house was bought the parties intended that it should be owned in equal shares, but made an order for its sale with vacant possession, the wife to receive £300 only of the proceeds of sale. On appeal by the wife:—

Held, (1) that the evidence established that the wife had a right to an equal share in the property and the court had no power under section 17 of the Act of 1882 to vary those rights or to reduce her to the status of a mere creditor.

(2) That the order made under section 17 that the house be sold should be discharged, since the wife was entitled to remain in it both as a wife and as co-owner.

(3) That as there had been a breakdown of the marriage which had been the basis of the original arrangement that the husband should repay the mortgage, each party should from the date of the breakdown and until the house was sold be liable in equal shares for the balance of the mortgage repayments.

APPEAL from Judge Lawson Campbell sitting at Wisbech County Court.

COBB
v.
COBB.

The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment of Denning L.J.: The parties, Frank Cobb and Hilda Margery Cobb, were married in 1936. The husband was a commercial buyer earning £7 a week and a bonus over and above it. The wife was a school teacher earning over £5 a week. On September 14, 1950, they bought a house, No. 114A, Osborne Road, Wisbech, intending it to be their matrimonial home. The purchase price was £1,700 plus legal costs of £60, making £1,760 altogether. In order to meet this sum the husband and the wife each paid in cash £230, making together £460, leaving £1,300 outstanding. They borrowed the remaining £1,300 from the husband's employers on mortgage at 4 per cent. interest. The advance was made to the husband and wife jointly and they both made themselves responsible for the mortgage, which was repayable at the rate of £3 a week. The husband made arrangements with his employers for the £3 a week to be deducted each week from his wage. The husband made no housekeeping allowance to his wife but he paid some of the household bills. The wife also paid some of the household expenses and bought furniture, replaced linen, crockery, and so forth.

In the middle of 1954 the parties fell out, but they remained living in the same house. On June 22, 1954, the wife launched a petition for divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery and cruelty. Her petition was later amended so as to claim only a judicial separation and not a divorce. The husband defended the case, but he made no cross-charges against his wife. The case had not been heard at the date of the appeal but had been certified as fit for a speedy trial.

One of the differences between the parties was because the wife's parents came to the house on April 16, 1954, and stayed for some months. The husband was so annoyed about this that he went to solicitors to get them out. Before the application was actually issued, however, the parents left, on September 7, 1954.

On September 9, 1954, the husband made an application to the county court judge under section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882,[1] in which he asked for an order that the house belonged to him, and that the wife should do everything necessary to vest it in his name, and that the wife should join in evicting her parents. As the parents had already gone, the latter part of the application was not pursued, but the husband went on with the claim that the house was his.

[1] Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17: "In any question "between husband and wife as to "the title to or possession of pro- "perty, either party . . . may apply "by summons or otherwise in a "summary way to any judge of the "High Court of Justice in England ". . . or . . . in England to the "judge of the county court of the "district . . . and the judge of the "High Court of Justice or of the "county court, . . . may make such "order with respect to the property "in dispute, and as to the costs of "and consequent on the application "as he thinks fit . . ."

The case was heard on March 22, 1955, by which time £651 had been paid off the mortgage, leaving £649 still outstanding. It was agreed that the house was of approximately the same value as when it was bought, namely, £1,700.

The county court judge said that it was quite clear that, at the time of the purchase of the house in 1950, the parties had contributed in equal shares, and that it was their intention to own the property in equal shares. But, he continued, that was only part of the story. £1,300 had been raised on mortgage and the arrangement was that £3 a week should be deducted from the husband's wages and put aside towards the payment of the mortgage. That position continued until the parties fell out, by which time the husband had paid almost half the mortgage. The question he had to decide, the judge continued, was who owned what right in the house? The solicitor for the wife had argued that the parties were joint tenants and owned in equal shares; but that did not conclude the matter. The judge then referred to the dictum of Evershed M.R. in Rimmer v. Rimmer,[2] and said that the intention was that the husband should wipe off the mortgage, that he had done that, and that he (the county court judge) attached considerable importance to that in deciding to what share each party was entitled, and the contribution to household expenses.

The county court judge made an order that the house was to be sold with vacant possession, and that the proceeds were to be applied in the following way: first, in payment off of the balance due on the mortgage; secondly, in paying £300 to the wife; and thirdly, that the balance should be paid to the husband.

The wife appealed.

DENNING L.J. stated the facts and continued: Under section 17 of the Act the court can, on application, decide questions as to the title to or possession of property as between husband and wife. The first question in this case is, To whom does the house belong? The law in cases of this kind was considered by this court quite recently in Rimmer v. Rimmer,[1] and I would like to repeat what I said there[2]: "In cases when it is clear that the "beneficial interest in the matrimonial home, or in the furniture, "belongs to one or other absolutely, or it is clear that they "intended to hold it in definite shares, the court will give effect "to their intention: . . . but when it is not clear to whom the "beneficial interest belongs, or in what proportions, then, in this "matter, as in others, equality is equity." I would only add that in the case of the family assets, if I may so describe them, such as the matrimonial home and the furniture in it, when both husband and wife contribute to the cost, and the property is intended to be a continuing provision for them during their joint lives, the court leans towards the view that the property belongs to them both jointly in equal shares; and this is so, even though the conveyance is taken in the name of one of them only and their contributions to the cost are unequal. All the more so when the property is taken, as here, in their joint names and it was intended to be owned by them in equal shares. The legal title is in them both jointly, and the beneficial interest is in them both as equitable tenants in common in equal shares. They hold the house as trustees on the statutory trusts for sale. But until the place is sold, each of them is entitled concurrently with the other to the possession of the house and to the use and enjoyment of it in a proper manner: and neither of them is entitled to turn out the other. The house cannot be sold with vacant possession unless both consent to it; but if one of them unreasonably refuses his or her consent, the other can go to the court and ask for an order for sale; and in aid of it, the court can order vacant possession to be given; but the court would only make such an order if it was satisfied it was right and proper to do so, and on such terms as it thought fit to impose; see the recent case in this court of Bull v. Bull,[3] and compare Smith v. Smith.[4]

The second question is whether the judge was right in ordering, as he did in this case, a sale with vacant possession, and in aid of it that the wife should be evicted. I do not think so. Apart altogether from the fact that she was co-owner of the house with her husband, she is his wife. It may be that she is an entirely innocent party and, if so, his duty as a husband is to provide a roof over her head. It would not be right for her to be turned out into the street. But as co-owner she is in an even stronger position. She cannot be turned out unless the court thinks it right to order a sale, and I do not think that this is the time or the occasion for such an order. The matter can best be considered by the matrimonial court when it comes to consider alimony or maintenance. That court could, on proper application being made, order a sale: but it might think it right to let the wife stay in the house with a reduction in the maintenance which would otherwise be payable by the husband.

There remains, however, the difficult question about the sum of £649 which remains outstanding on mortgage repayable at £3 a week. If the house were to be sold, there can be little doubt that this £649 would have to be paid out of the proceeds of sale, and the balance would be divided equally between husband and wife. But if the house is not sold what is to happen to the £3 a week? I have no doubt that if the marriage had never broken down. and the married life had continued as the parties contemplated, the husband would have paid the £3 a week until the mortgage was paid off, and then the house unencumbered would have belonged to them in equal shares; but a fundamentally different situation has emerged which they did not anticipate and for which they have not provided. The marriage has broken down. The wife no longer performs wifely duties for the husband. In those circumstances the court must do what is just and reasonable between the parties. They are both liable to the mortgagees for the repayment of the mortgage; and, as between the two of them, I think the only reasonable and fair thing is that, as from the time the marriage broke down, each should pay one-half of the outstanding repayments due on the mortgage until the house is sold. We may take it that the marriage broke down on June 22, 1954, when the wife launched her petition. Romer L.J. has framed a form of declaration stating the rights of the parties. I have had the benefit of seeing it, and I agree with the form of declaration which he will in due course propose. I think that the appeal should be allowed accordingly.

BIRKETT L.J. I entirely agree with the judgment which has just been delivered. I might add that on the two major points in the action which were so fully argued, the rights to the house itself and the question of sale, I hold very clear views which have been expressed by my Lord on the matter. I, too, have had the advantage of seeing the declaration which has been framed by Romer L.J., and I, too, agree with it. I content myself, therefore, by saying that I agree with the judgment just delivered and the result must be that the appeal should be allowed.

ROMER L.J. I also agree. In cases of this kind one usually has no direct evidence of intention in relation to the ownership of the matrimonial home, because the parties to the marriage very seldom form one when they buy it; and the court has to attribute an intention from the course of conduct of husband and wife (including their respective contributions towards the purchase price) at the time when the home was purchased and subsequently. But in the present case the judge has made certain findings about the intention of Mr. and Mrs. Cobb when they bought their house in 1950, and it seems to me that the rights of the parties in respect of the house have to be determined

v.
COBB.
Romer L.J.

in the light of those findings. Those findings were expressed by the judge as follows: "The parties were married in 1936 and in "1950 the house was conveyed to them as joint tenants; the "purchase price was £1,700 and of the deposit of £400, £230 was "paid by the wife and £170 by the husband, who also made "himself liable for the legal costs, about £60. It was quite clear "that at that time the parties contributed in equal shares, and "it was the intention of the parties that they should own the "property in equal shares. But that was only part of the story. "£1,300 was raised on mortgage and the arrangement was that "£3 a week should be deducted from the husband's wages and "should be put aside towards the payment of the mortgage. "This position continued until the parties fell out, by which time "the husband had paid almost half the mortgage. Interest does "not affect the position. Question I have to decide is who owns "what right in the house. Mr. Sessions argues that the parties "are joint tenants and own in equal shares, but this does not "conclude the matter—Rimmer v. Rimmer[5] the dictum the "Master of the Rolls read out, the intention was that the "husband should wipe off the mortgage, he has done this, and "I attach considerable importance to that in deciding to what "share each party was entitled and the contribution to household "expenses."

For myself, I was rather puzzled by what the judge meant by the second of those findings. I thought he was perhaps intending to say that the second intention, videlicet, as to the husband "wiping off" the mortgage, was arrived at subsequently to the original arrangement as to equal ownership and as a variation thereof; but as the original intention was, as the judge said, formed at the time of the conveyance, and as the date of the mortgage was the same as that of the conveyance, it seems to me that the judge was holding that there was only one composite intention, namely, that Mr. and Mrs. Cobb should own the property in equal shares, and that the husband, as between the two of them, should assume responsibility for the mortgage payment of £3 a week. Mr. Picard for the husband was, as I gathered, content to treat the case upon that footing, but submitted that the court has power under section 17 of the Act of 1882 to establish a title to property contrary to the intention of the parties, and that it should do so in the present case because the husband contributed so much more towards paying off the mortgage than the wife did. I think that there are two answers to that. The first is, that although the husband's contributions did in fact considerably exceed those of the wife, the payments which he made were precisely those which were originally contemplated and agreed that he should make, and no more. The second is, that I know of no power that the court has under section 17 to vary agreed or established titles to property. It has power to ascertain the respective rights of husband and wife to disputed property, and frequently has to do so on very little material; but where, as here, the original rights to property are established by the evidence, and those rights have not been varied by subsequent agreement, the court cannot, in my opinion, under section 17 vary those rights merely because it thinks that in the light of subsequent events the original agreement was unfair.

On the judge's findings, then, both husband and wife were to have an equal beneficial interest (as they had a joint legal interest) in what they intended to be the matrimonial home. The payments under the mortgage deed amounted to some £3 a week, which the husband promised to pay and which he did pay. For her part, the wife agreed to make certain contributions out of her own money towards the upkeep of the home in various ways. This arrangement was never subsequently varied and it therefore seems clear to me that the wife never changed from her original position as part owner of the house to that merely of secured creditor for the £230 which she contributed when the house was purchased. Nevertheless, she has been treated, in effect, as a creditor in the order which the judge made, and I am unable to accept the view that that was her position when the marriage broke down or is her position now. In my opinion, the facts as found by the judge lead directly to the conclusion that she has at all material times been, and is now, entitled to an equal half-share in the property, and not merely to repayment of the £230 plus the £70 which the judge thought right in all the circumstances to regard as the value of her subsequent contributions to the home. The property is now held by Mr. and Mrs. Cobb as trustees on trust for sale with power to postpone: see section 36 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. If and when a sale is effected, either by agreement or by an order under section 30 of the Law of Property Act, or by an order made in the divorce jurisdiction, it would not be right that the whole of the outstanding mortgage money amounting to over £600 should come out of the husband's share of the proceeds of sale in exoneration of the wife's share. The wife is no longer making any contribution to the expenses of the joint home, for there is no longer a joint home, and it is right, therefore, that she should bear one-half of the principal and interest payable under the mortgage deed. I would, accordingly, suggest an order made in the following form:

Discharge the order of the judge and declare that, subject to the legal charge dated September 14, 1950 (naming the parties thereto), the applicant and the respondent are beneficially entitled in equal shares to 114A, Osborne Road, Wisbech, and to the proceeds of sale thereof when sold; and declare that as from June 22, 1954, the applicant and the respondent have been and are liable as between themselves in equal shares for all sums payable under the said legal charge in respect of the principal moneys and interest thereby secured.

Picard. Since June 22, 1954, the husband has paid a great many £3's. I take it that will have to be adjusted?

DENNING L.J. Yes, that will be adjusted, but we take that date as the date when the marriage broke down. From that date the payments on the mortgage are to be borne equally. No order for a sale will be made. That matter must be left over until the Divorce Court proceedings, and that action should be brought on speedily.

Charity—Recreation—Recreation ground—Gift for a parish—Intention the maintenance and improvement of the health and welfare of the inhabitants — Whether valid charitable gift — Sports grounds already in existence—Application cy-près.

A bequest of a sum of money for the provision of a public recreation ground for the benefit of the inhabitants of a particular geographical area is a good charitable bequest.

A testator by his will dated July 12, 1946, bequeathed to his trustees the sum of £3,000 "... with a view to the maintenance and "improvement of the health and welfare of the inhabitants of [the "parish of J. in the county of Pembroke] by the purchase, equip- "ment and maintenance of a public recreation ground for amateur "activities" upon trust to apply the said sum "in the purchase "of a piece or parcel of land situated in or near the said village "of [J.] and in the improvement and equipping of the same as "a public recreation ground for amateur activities for the benefit "of the said parish of [J.] and in the maintenance thereof until "transfer of the balance of the said sum is made to the parish "council as hereinafter provided." The testator then decreed that so much of the £3,000 which was surplus to the requirements so far dictated should be handed over to the parish council to be treated as an endowment fund for the maintenance of the recreation ground.

Evidence was filed to the effect that in the view of the parish council a recreation ground as such was not required, in that the village already possessed a cricket ground and a football pitch, but that there was need of a parish hall or gymnasium:—

Held (it not being argued to the contrary), that the bequest of the sum of £3,000 was a valid charitable bequest, and that in the circumstances it ought to be carried into effect cy-près by way of scheme.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

Henry Hall Morgan, who died on February 11, 1953, by clause 4 of his will, dated July 12, 1946, provided: "Subject "to the trust contained in clause 2 hereof and upon the death "[of two named persons] or the survivor of them with a view "to the maintenance and improvement of the health and welfare "of the inhabitants of the parish of Jeffreyston in the . . . county "of Pembroke by the purchase equipment and maintenance of "a public recreation ground for amateur activities I bequeath "unto my trustees the sum of three thousand pounds in the "purchase of a piece or parcel of land situated in or near the said "village of Jeffreyston and in the improvement and equipping of "the same as a public recreation ground for amateur activities for "the benefit of the said parish of Jeffreyston and in the mainten-"ance thereof until transfer of the balance of the said sum is made "to the parish council as hereinafter provided." The testator then provided that so much of the £3,000 as was surplus to the requirements so far directed should be handed over to the parish council to be treated as an endowment fund for the maintenance of the recreation ground.

According to the evidence the view of the parish council of Jeffreyston was that a recreation ground as such was not what the village required, as it already possessed a cricket ground and a football pitch, but that what was needed was a parish hall or gymnasium.

The present summons was taken out by the trustees for determination of the questions (1) whether the bequest of the sum of £3,000 contained in clause 4 of the will was a valid charitable bequest; (2) if so, whether the sum in question ought to be applied cy-près and the matter referred to chambers for a scheme to be brought in.

MORGAN, DECD., In re. CECIL-WILLIAMS v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

HARMAN J. stated the facts and continued: The first question is whether there is a valid charitable gift. I am inclined to hold that there is. The whole matter has recently been very much canvassed in the House of Lords in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Baddeley,[1] in which case I, sitting at first instance,[2] called attention to certain cases concerning bequests for the promotion of sport and what has been termed "mere" sport, and found some difficulty in Clauson J.'s decision in In re Hadden.[3] But Viscount Simonds, in the leading speech in the Baddeley case,[4] made this careful observation, having regard to the presence in that case as amicus curiae of the Attorney-General: "I think it right to say that, in my opinion, a gift of "land for use as a recreation ground by the community at large "or by the inhabitants of a particular geographical area may "well be supported as a valid charity." He then made two reservations; one, where the nexus is a class determined by adherence to a particular religion, and the other where the nexus is any special provision relating to a particular employment or industry. Apart from that, he was very careful to say that his view was that such a gift could be supported.

I think that Lord Somervell was of the same opinion. Lord Somervell, at the end of his speech, said[5]: "Nothing that I "have said is to be taken as throwing any doubt or light on these "matters. Where a ground or hall is for the public different "considerations clearly arise." He clearly did take the view that where the public were interested in a hall or ground charity was not excluded.

Lord Reid, in his dissenting speech,[6] founded himself very much on the reasoning of Clauson J. in In re Hadden,[7] which was followed in two unreported cases, In re Foakes[8] and In re Chesters,[9] where the gift of money for the provision of recreation grounds for the inhabitants of a particular geographical area was held to be a good charitable bequest. I think I am bound so to hold, and I do so. It seems to me, therefore, that clause 4 creates a valid charitable gift.

But when I come to apply that principle to the circumstances of the present case I find that the parish council take the view that a recreation ground, in the ordinary sense of the word, is not at all what Jeffreyston requires. There is already a cricket ground and a football pitch. It is an agricultural community. What the young people want is somewhere where they can enjoy recreation under a roof. The parish council would not object to a playground for children with a building attached. What they really want is a parish hall or a gymnasium. There appears to be a real need for something of that sort in this place. Therefore, it seems to me that I am entitled to take the view that the gift provided by this testator to attain his object—the improvement of the health and welfare of the inhabitants of Jeffreyston—may be expended in that way. That does not mean that the gift for charitable purposes fails, but merely that the immediate method by which the testator wished to effect them is not available.

Consequently, in my judgment, I think that the proper course is to direct the application of this sum cy-près by way of a scheme, and I propose to refer to chambers for a scheme to be brought in by the plaintiffs, who will, of course, consult the parish council on the matter, as they are the persons who will have to administer the trust, for providing something in the nature of a playground, gymnasium and village hall where recreation can be had by the inhabitants of the area in question. I have no doubt that it will not be difficult to frame a scheme which is practicable and conducive to attaining the objects which the testator had in mind, namely, the improvement of the health and welfare of the inhabitants of this place.

Practice—Settlement of action—Enforcement—Action settled by consent on terms indorsed on counsels' briefs—No order of court—Non-compliance by one party with terms of settlement—Jurisdiction to enforce settlement — Informal settlement of actions — Form of order—"Tomlin" order.

An action claiming the return of moneys lent was settled before trial, there being written on the front of the brief of counsel for the plaintiff "By consent, all proceedings stayed on terms indorsed "on briefs. Liberty to apply" and on the back the agreed terms signed by counsel on either side whereby the defendant was to pay to the plaintiff a certain sum of money by instalments and the costs of the action, the "whole debt and costs" to become "due "and payable at once" on any instalment being in arrear. When the action was called on for hearing the court was informed of the settlement and what the terms of the settlement were, but no order was made by the court. Subsequently an order for taxation was made by a master. The defendant failed to pay one of the instalments and the plaintiff applied to the court for judgment for the balance due under the terms of the settlement, an order for the costs as taxed and the costs of the application:—

the new agreement between the parties comprised in the terms of settlement, and the court had no further jurisdiction in the matter; if the terms of the new agreement were not complied with the remedy of the injured party was not by application to the court but by action upon the new agreement.

Quaere whether under the "Tomlin" form of order the terms of settlement set out in the order are enforceable by the court without a further order.

Observations upon the effect of informal settlement of actions.

APPLICATION.

On January 11, 1955, an action was called on for hearing before Slade J., when counsel then appearing for the plaintiff told the court that the action had been settled and what the agreed terms of settlement were. In the action the plaintiff had claimed against three defendants jointly for the return of moneys lent amounting to £500 and against the first defendant for a further £50. When the action was settled the terms of settlement were written on the brief of counsel for the plaintiff as follows: on the front of the brief were the words "Cor. Slade J. By consent, all "proceedings stayed on terms endorsed on briefs. Liberty to "either side to apply"; on the back of the brief were the agreed terms: "By consent Dt. to pay plaintiff as follows: (1) £100 "forthwith; (2) £100 20th February, 1955; (3) balance of £250 by "three equal monthly instalments, the first payable on the 20th "March, 1955; (4) costs to be taxed or agreed and added to the "balance of £250 and paid with the third and last instalment; "(5) if any instalment in arrear whole debt and costs become due "and payable at once" and those terms were signed by counsel on both sides. No order of any kind was in fact made by the court, but on May 10, 1955, the costs of the action were taxed at £68 1s. 9d. in pursuance of a master's order.

The defendants duly paid the first £100; the payment of £100 due on February 20, 1955, and the first two instalments of the balance, but failed to pay the third instalment or the costs. The plaintiff applied to the court for judgment for the £83 6s. 8d. (one-third of the balance of £250) which had not been paid, for an order for costs as taxed and for the costs of the application.

John Frankenburg for the plaintiff referred to the following cases: Cristel v. Cristel [1]; Abbott v. Abbott [2]; Graves v. Graves [3]; Re Hearn [4]; and MacCabe v. Joynt.[5]

The defendants did not appear and were not represented.

SLADE J. referred to the facts as set out above and continued: Perhaps it is not surprising that I have no recollection of the circumstances of this case but Mr. Frankenburg, who was not here on January 11, tells me now, and I accept it, that I was in fact informed what the agreed terms of settlement were. Again, I have no recollection of them, but I have before me a brief of counsel who then appeared for the plaintiff.

[His Lordship read the indorsements on the front and back of the brief set out above and continued:] Although no doubt it was the intention of the parties that all further proceedings should be stayed in the light of that compromise, I am informed by the associate, who was present on that day, and Mr. Frankenburg on his instructions agrees that in fact I made no actual order staying all further proceedings although no doubt, of course, I should contemplate, as the parties would, that all further proceedings would in fact be stayed upon the basis of what I will call the new agreement. Nor did I make any order for taxation of costs which was one of the agreed terms in default of the costs being agreed, and I am confirmed in that view because I have since been shown the taxing master's certificate dated May 10 which says: "In pursuance of an order herein bearing date 24th "day of March, 1955, I have been attended by solicitors for the "plaintiff and for the defendants and I certify I have taxed the "costs." Therefore, the order for taxation was not made by myself on January 11, 1955, but no doubt by one of the masters on March 24, 1955.

That being the position, Mr. Frankenburg applied to me yesterday for relief in these circumstances. He said that the defendants, or one of them, had paid £100 forthwith, had paid the £100 payable on February 20, 1955, had paid the first two instalments of one-third of £250 on the due date, but had failed to pay the third instalment of one-third of £250, that is to say, £83 6s. 8d., or the sum of £68 1s. 9d. which by the time the third instalment became due had been shown by the taxing master's certificate to be the taxed costs which the defendants had agreed to pay. He asked me to give him judgment for the one-third which had not been paid, namely £83 6s. 8d., to give him an order for the costs in the figure at which they had already been taxed, and he furthermore (I think perhaps somewhat optimistically in this case) asked me to give him an order for the costs of the present application.

There are various ways in which an action can be disposed of when terms of settlement are arrived at when the action comes on for trial, or in the course of the hearing. I have had experience of at least five methods of disposing of an action in such circumstances. They are not exhaustive. One can in an appropriate case, as was done in one of the cases to which Mr. Frankenburg referred, get the terms of the compromise made a rule of court provided it appears that one of the terms of the compromise is that the terms shall be made an order of the court. But I am dealing with methods of disposing of an action of a less formal character than that. The first method which I have found to be very useful where the terms of compromise consist of an agreement by the defendant to pay a specified sum of money by specified instalments on specified dates is to give judgment for the total amount agreed to be paid coupled with a stay of execution so long as the instalments are paid in accordance with the terms agreed. I am sometimes asked to give judgment by consent and sometimes by the defendants submitting to it, and I have pointed out when invited to give judgment by consent that section 27 of the Debtors Act, 1869, (it also appears in the Annual Practice, 1955, p. 2007) requires that a consent judgment shall be registered at the Central Office within 21 days and if it is not so registered it will be void against the defendant's creditors. In the result, therefore, the form usually adopted is for the defendant to submit to judgment in open court.

GREEN v. ROZEN.

The second method, which is no doubt more appropriate when the terms of settlement are not so straightforward as the mere payment of an agreed sum of money by specified instalments, is to secure an order of the court made by consent that the plaintiff and the defendant shall do the things which they have respectively engaged themselves to do by the terms of settlement. In such a case the order would take this form. There would be the title and the preamble, and then the order would recite, the terms having been agreed between the parties: "It is ordered that (a) the defendant do," etc., "the plaintiff do." etc., making each of the agreed terms an order of the court that it shall be carried out.

The third method I have known is what has become known as the Tomlin form of order, a form suggested by Tomlin J.[1] The Annual Practice, 1955, at page 2007 says: "Where an action "is stayed by consent on terms scheduled, the terms cannot be "enforced on an application to commit or attach, but an injunc- "tion or an order for specific performance must first be obtained"; and it cites for the authority of that statement of practice Dashwood v. Dashwood.[2] Then it says (ibid.) "After this decision "Tomlin J. stated that in future when an action was proposed to "be stayed on agreed terms to be scheduled to the order, the "order should be as follows"—this is the Tomlin form of order —"And the plaintiff and defendant having agreed to the terms set forth in the schedule hereto, it is ordered that all further pro- "ceedings in this action be stayed"—now these are the important words—"except for the purpose of carrying such terms "into effect. Liberty to apply as to carrying such terms into effect." I understand from the chief associate that some doubt exists as to how far the Tomlin form of order will enable the terms set out in the order to be enforced by the court, at all events without first obtaining some further order such as a four-day order in the Chancery Division or an order of a judge in chambers in the Queen's Bench Division; possibly because it could be said first, that the schedule to the Tomlin form of order is not part of the order, and, secondly, that in any event all that the court has ordered is a stay of all further proceedings with a qualification by implication that they shall not be stayed so far as is necessary for carrying the agreed terms into effect, there being no positive order of the court that the terms shall be carried into effect. Those are the difficulties which occurred to me and I was invited to endeavour to clear up any doubt which may exist. Mr. Frankenburg has helped me in every possible way but I have not had the advantage of argument from the other side and I think that I should limit myself to dealing with the point which actually arises in the present case where there was no Tomlin form of order. All that I can do is to indicate the methods of disposing of an action which has been settled of which I have had experience in the hope that parties in future may choose the one which they may think is least open to controversy in the event of default being made in the carrying out of the agreed terms.

The fourth method I have come across is an order of the court made by consent staying all further proceedings in the action upon the terms agreed and indorsed on counsels' briefs. In that method there is an order of the court staying all further proceedings, but in the fifth method, that adopted in the present case, there is no order of the court at all, the court merely being told by counsel that the case has been settled upon the terms indorsed on counsels' briefs. That method I have known to be supplemented by a request for leave to withdraw the record, and I think in the case of a trial by jury a request for the withdrawal of a juror, although I believe that in the latter case the action can be set down and reheard if the terms are not complied with.

It will perhaps emphasize which is the easiest method of disposing of an action to consider what steps can be taken in each case to enforce the terms if they are not complied with. The first one seems to be simplicity itself. The court has already given judgment and the stay of execution lasts only so long as the agreed terms are complied with. If there is a failure to comply with them the party who suffers merely has to proceed to levy execution.

In the second case, the court has made an order in the terms I have indicated, that the plaintiff do so-and-so, the defendant do so-and-so, and if the plaintiff or the defendant, as the case may be, fails to carry out the court's order it is only necessary for application to be made to the court and the court will enforce it, what each party is to do or refrain from doing being part of the order itself.

The third case is the Tomlin form of order with which I have already dealt, and parties who choose that form of order may, if the terms are not complied with, find contentions raised against the enforcement of it, the nature of which I have already indicated.

In the fourth case the court, at the request of the parties, has made an absolute and unqualified order for a stay of all further proceedings. I say " absolute and unqualified " in contradistinction to the form of order where it is qualified by the words " save " for the purpose of carrying the terms into effect." Parties who wish to adopt the fourth method would be wise before doing so to read the note which appears at the top of page 3182 of the Annual Practice, 1955. Under the rubric " Effect of a stay of " proceedings " it says: " Two views may be taken: first, that " it is a discontinuance, and therefore cannot be removed; " secondly, that it is not equivalent to a discontinuance, but may " be removed if proper grounds shown." If you are anxious to resolve an interesting point of law as to which of those two schools of thought is correct, you could not do better than adopt the fourth method.

GREEN v. ROZEN.

The fifth method, which is the only one I propose to decide, is the one adopted in the present case. The court has made no order of any kind whatsoever, and having considered such authorities as I have been able to find, I arrive at the conclusion that in those circumstances the court has no further jurisdiction in respect of the original cause of action, because it has been superseded by the new agreement between the parties to the action, and if the terms of the new agreement are not complied with the injured party must seek his remedy upon the new agreement.

I mentioned to Mr. Frankenburg what I thought were one or two of the difficulties in his way. He is asking me to give him judgment for £83 6s. 8d. as well as the costs. £83 6s. 8d. is one-third of £250 and arises only under the terms of the new agreement. He cannot come here and ask me to remove the stay because I have made no order for the stay at all: there is nothing to be removed. In my judgment, therefore, the plaintiff's remedy in this case to enforce payment of the sum of £83 6s. 8d. plus the taxed costs which the defendants agreed to pay must be by action upon the new agreement. I am sorry to have to come to that conclusion because it may mean starting a new action, but in my judgment I have no jurisdiction—I am not dealing with discretion at all—to give Mr. Frankenburg's client the relief she seeks. In those circumstances the application must be refused.

Application refused.

Costs—Lands Tribunal—Scale—Costs awarded by tribunal on county court scale 3—Order for costs of hearing before tribunal on scale 3 awarded to successful appellants by Court of Appeal—No application for certificates for increased charges and fees made until year after order as to costs—Grant of certificates out of time in discretion of court—County Court Rules, 1936 (S.R. & O. 1936, No. 626/*L.*17), Ord. 47, r. 21 (4).

Costs—County court action—Scale.

Order 47, r. 21 of the County Court Rules, 1936, provides that applications for certificates that charges and fees in the proceedings should not be limited to county court scale 3 may be made at the hearing or within seven days of the making of the order as to costs: "Provided that where an application which could have been made "at the hearing is made subsequently, the judge may refuse the "application on the ground that it ought to have been made at the "hearing."

On May 19, 1954, appellants from decisions of the Lands Tribunal succeeded in the Court of Appeal and were awarded their costs before the Lands Tribunal on scale 3. No applications were made under Ord. 47, r. 21 for certificates for increased charges and fees until May 12, 1955:—

Held, that the application ought to have been made at the hearing, since Order 47, r. 21, clearly intended that the applications for certificates should be made at the hearing or within a few days thereof, and the court, in the exercise of its inherent discretion, would not alter its order as to costs made at the hearing of the appeals on applications made after so considerable a lapse of time.

APPLICATION to alter order as to costs.

On May 19, 1954, judgments were delivered in the Court of Appeal in favour of Sandown Park Ld., in three appeals on rating matters from the Lands Tribunal, which had decided those matters in favour of the valuation officer, Alfred George Castle, and the Esher Urban District Council. The Lands Tribunal had awarded costs on county court scale 3, and the Court of Appeal, reversing those decisions, ordered that the successful appellants should have their costs before the Lands Tribunal on scale 3.

The unsuccessful respondents were given leave to appeal to the House of Lords, but the appeals were not pursued. When the time for appeal had run out, the question as to costs came before the taxing master, who was asked by the successful appellants to increase the scale of the costs awarded by the Court of Appeal, but he was of opinion that he had no power to do so. Sandown Park Ld. thereupon applied on May 12, 1955, under the County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 47, r. 21,[1] for certificates (1) that fees for counsel ought not to be limited to the amount allowed under scale 3; (2) that the proceedings were fit for more than one counsel; and (3) that the solicitors' costs for taking instructions for brief to counsel on trial ought not to be limited to the amount appearing in county court scale 3.

G. D. Squibb for Sandown Park Ld.

Harold J. Brown Q.C. and Nigel Curtis-Raleigh for the Esher Urban District Council.

Patrick Browne for the valuation officer.

BIRKETT L.J. stated the circumstances in which the application was made, and continued: I have considerable sympathy for the applicants. The case was one of some complexity and difficulty. A great deal of legal authority had to be cited, and the matter was argued very expertly and at considerable length. It would seem that, in the ordinary way, the three certificates which are asked for in this application would be granted. But the difficulty that arises is that this is merely a question as to the costs before the Lands Tribunal. The tribunal gave the urban district council and the valuation officer an order that they should have the costs on scale 3 of the county court. Mr. Squibb tells us that that is the ordinary practice of the Lands Tribunal, though they have power under the Lands Tribunal Rules, rule 42 (2), to order a lump sum to be paid by way of costs or on a specified scale according to the Rules of the Supreme Court or according to the rules of the county court; but I rather gather that in practice the Lands Tribunal confine the matter of costs to the county court scale; and that was done.

Therefore, as the order stood, Sandown Park Ld., who had lost their case before the Lands Tribunal, were ordered to pay costs on scale 3. There was an appeal to the Court of Appeal, and the Court of Appeal reversed that decision. The Court of Appeal, apart from making the order about the costs of the appeal, had to deal with the costs before the Lands Tribunal, and they decided (as would seem rather natural) that as costs on scale 3 had been awarded against Sandown Park Ld. the same rule ought to apply now that they were successful. The Court of Appeal said: "Appeal allowed; costs before the Lands Tribunal to be "paid on scale 3."

That is the whole point of this application. Unfortunately, there has been some delay. Sandown Park Ld. are not wholly responsible for that delay. The Court of Appeal, when allowing the appeal from the Lands Tribunal, gave leave for an appeal to "Rule may be made at the hearing "or on notice which shall be served "on the party sought to be made "liable within 7 days of the making "of the order awarding costs or "within 7 days of the receipt of "notice of payment into court or of "notice of discontinuance: Provided "that where an application which "could have been made at the hear- "ing is made subsequently, the judge "may refuse the application on the "ground that it ought to have been "made at the hearing."

the House of Lords, and nothing was done while that order was current; the appeal to the House of Lords was abandoned and it was then said: "We need not take any step now because the "taxing master's powers are sufficient to deal with this matter "as we would wish it to be dealt with." But the taxing master took the view that his powers were not sufficient and that an application ought to be made to this court.

The difficulty about the matter is that, under the County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 47, r. 21 (4), it is provided: "An application "for a certificate pursuant to the foregoing paragraphs of this "Rule may be made at the hearing or on notice which shall be "served on the party sought to be made liable within seven days "of the making of the order awarding costs or within seven days "of the receipt of notice of payment into court or of notice of "discontinuance." The preceding paragraphs of rule 21 deal with the costs of the proceedings, which are on scale 3, and expressly state that the judge can certify that the proceedings are fit for the employment of more counsel than one. But the proviso to rule 21 (4) is in these words: "Provided that where an applica-"tion which could have been made at the hearing is made "subsequently, the judge may refuse the application on the "ground that it ought to have been made at the hearing."

Mr. Harold Brown intervened to say that that really means that the time that is given is limited to seven days and the proviso means that if within seven days subsequently to the making of the order an application is made, the judge has power to say "I refuse it on the ground that it ought to have been made "earlier." Mr. Squibb contended that that was not the meaning of the rule, and referred to Order 13, r. 5, of the County Court Rules, which provides: "(1) Subject to the provisions of these "Rules, any of the times fixed by these Rules for—(a) taking any "step in any proceedings; or (b) filing any document; or (c) giving "any notice; may be enlarged or abridged by consent of all parties "or by the court on the application of any party. (2) An order "enlarging time may be made although the application therefor "is not made until after the expiration of the time allowed or "appointed." Mr. Squibb says that the time is not limited to seven days; it is any subsequent time; and, indeed, he said expressly that a year or eight days makes no difference; it is "subsequently"; and it is a matter for the court.

I do not think it is necessary for us to determine the construction of the rule, and whether the time is limited to seven days or not. It is plain that the application has been made subsequently to the making of the order, and the discretion is in the court to deal with that matter. The conclusion to which I have come is that, while I have considerable sympathy with the substance of the application, I do not think it is an application to which we ought to accede. After all, the order was made by the Court of Appeal and nobody at the time ever raised any question about it. Nobody suggested: "This is a case where it "ought not to be confined to scale 3"; and they would have found it a little difficult to argue that, in view of the fact that up to that moment the order which had been made against them for them to pay was on that self-same scale. It is only in the development of the circumstances—that is to say, the abandonment of an appeal to the House of Lords and the attitude taken by the taxing master—that it is thought that an application ought to be made to the Court of Appeal to vary (or, as Mr. Squibb said, add to) the order which was made with regard to costs.

In my view we ought not to make any such order. The proviso to paragraph 4 of rule 21 says: "Provided that where an "application which could have been made at the hearing is made "subsequently, the judge may refuse the application on the "ground that it ought to have been made at the hearing." If this point with regard to these three matters was to be raised it ought to have been raised at the hearing. The application, coming at this time, is in my opinion too late. I would therefore dismiss the application.

Romer L.J. I agree. I also feel sympathy with Sandown Park Ld., in this sense, that I cannot help feeling that if the application for these three certificates had been made when the judgment of this court was delivered that application would, very probably, have been acceded to, having regard to the nature of the case and the importance of the issues raised. But I cannot feel that an application made a year after judgment in this court was delivered should be acceded to now, having regard to the obvious conception which was in the mind of the draftsman of this rule that the application should be made at or within a very few days of the hearing of the trial. Accordingly, I agree that we ought not to grant this application.

Patrick Browne. Your Lordship said in the course of your judgment that you understood it was the usual practice for the Lands Tribunal only to give costs on scale 3. I ought to say that that is not by any means the invariable practice.

Birkett L.J. I gathered Mr. Squibb to say that the Lands Tribunal were in the habit of giving costs on scale 3.

Squibb. That is what I did say, my Lord. There have been cases where they have made orders on the High Court scale, but my experience has usually been the other way.

Patrick Browne. I have known quite a lot of cases where the High Court scale has been given. I feel it right to point that out.

Application dismissed.

Compulsory Purchase—Costs.

On the compulsory purchase of premises registered with an absolute title at H.M. Land Registry, the parties failed to agree the amount of the costs and expenses incurred by the sellers which, in accordance with section 82 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the purchasing authority was required to pay to the sellers. The bill of costs of the sellers' solicitors was taxed, but the purchasing authority objected to the basis of the taxation:—

Held, that, as the premises were registered with an absolute title, the remuneration of the solicitors was, by paragraph 1 (D) (i) of the Solicitors' Remuneration (Registered Land) Order, 1925, to be that prescribed in the schedule to that order (that is, a non-itemised scale fee based on the selling price of the property). The sellers were liable to pay that scale fee to their solicitor on the completed transfer and, therefore, that was the cost and expense incurred by them for the purposes of section 82 of the Act of 1845, irrespective of whether the work covered by the scale fee was or was not within the express terms of section 82.

Consolidation Act, 1845,[3] in accordance with section 82 of the Act, the costs and expenses of the sale were payable by the London County Council to the sellers. Application was made in due course by the sellers to the London County Council for payment of the bill, amounting to £159 15s., which had been delivered to the sellers by their solicitors on September 10, 1954. This bill was a non-itemised bill, drawn on the footing that the solicitors were entitled as against their clients, the sellers, to payment in accordance with the scale fee in the schedule to the Solicitors' Remuneration (Registered Land) Orders, 1925 to 1953.[4]

The London County Council objected to paying the bill, and the costs, therefore, became taxable under section 83 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845; and on a petition under that section an order was made on October 7, 1954, for the taxation of the bill. The order recited that the petitioners were the

It further recited that by section 82 of the Act of 1845 the London County Council were liable to pay the sellers' costs of the conveyance of the lands, including all charges and expenses specified in the section, and that the London County Council did not agree the amount of the bill delivered on September 10, 1954, and that the petitioners were desirous of having the bill taxed under section 83 of the Act, and the Solicitors' Remuneration (Registered Land) Orders, 1925 to 1953. The taxing master allowed the bill as presented.

The London County Council, on January 17, 1955, entered the following objections to the taxation of the whole bill:

"(1) Because this taxation (being the taxation of vendors' "costs arising out of a sale to which the Lands Clauses Con- "solidation Act, 1845, applied) is governed by section 83 of that "Act, under which the taxing master had an unfettered discretion "to certify the amount to be paid by the respondents [the London "County Council] to the petitioners [the vendors] in respect of "their costs.

"(2) Because the Solicitors' Remuneration (Registered Land) "Orders, 1925, 1944 and 1953, do not apply to a taxation as "between the vendors and the promoters under section 83 of the "Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, but apply only on the "taxation of a solicitor's bill as between him and his client.

"(3) Because the Solicitors' Remuneration (Registered Land) "Order, 1925, is expressed to apply to the remuneration of "solicitors in conveyancing and other non-contentious business "under the Land Registration Act, 1925, whereas the business "between the petitioners and the respondents arose under the "Town and Country Planning Acts, 1944–1947, and the Lands "Clauses Consolidation Acts, 1845, 1860 and 1869, as well as the "Land Registration Act, 1925.

"(4) Because in exercising his said discretion the taxing "master ought to allow only such costs as are in all the "circumstances fair and reasonable, using as a guide (but not as "fettering his discretion) the Schedule II remuneration prescribed "by the Solicitors' Remuneration Orders.[5]

" (5) Because, if and so far as the Solicitors' Remuneration " Orders are relevant, there is no reason in principle for dis- " tinguishing between unregistered land and registered land in " regard to the taxation of a vendor's costs arising out of sales " to which the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, applied, " and that since the Solicitors' Remuneration Order, 1882, " expressly excludes the scale in the case of sales of unregistered " land a similar exclusion ought to be implied in the Solicitors' " Remuneration Orders relating to registered land."

On February 7, 1955, the master delivered the following answers, overruling the objections of the London County Council: " Schedule I, Part I, of the Solicitors' Remuneration Order, 1883,[5] " (as amended by the Order of 1953), lays down a scale of charges " on sales, purchases and mortgages of land other than ' registered " ' land ' which varies according to the amount of the considera- " tion involved in the transaction. Rule 11 of the Rules applicable " to that scale provides that ' in cases of sale under the Lands " ' Clauses Consolidation Act . . . under which the vendor's " ' charges are paid by the purchaser, the scale shall not apply.' " It would seem that it must have been in the contemplation of " the framers of that rule that, but for the exception contained " in the wording of the rule itself, the scale would have applied " to such transactions.

" A scale of remuneration is provided under the Solicitors' " Remuneration (Registered Land) Orders, 1925 to 1953, govern- " ing, according to the amount of consideration involved, the " charges which solicitors are entitled to make for ' transfers on " ' sale . . . ' where land concerned is ' registered land.'

" There is nothing in the Solicitors' Remuneration (Regis- " tered Land) Order, 1925 (as amended by the Order of 1953), " corresponding to the exception of the Lands Clauses Consolida- " tion Act and similar cases contained in rule 11. . . . I " therefore conclude that such cases were not intended to be " excluded from the operation of the scale when the land is " registered land, and it would appear that the appropriate scale " does apply to the bill of costs referred to me for taxation in " this case. The registered land scale is chargeable in full " whether a contract of sale is entered into between the parties " or not, as is shown by paragraph 1 (D) of the Order of 1925."

The London County Council took out a summons asking the

" has, in accordance with paragraph " 6 of this order, elected to charge " under Schedule II.

" Such sum as may be fair and " reasonable, having regard to all the " circumstances of the case and in " particular to: (1) the complexity of " the matter or the difficulty or " novelty of the questions raised; (2) " the skill, labour, specialised know- " ledge and responsibility involved on " the part of the solicitor; (3) the " number and importance of the docu- " ments prepared or perused, without " regard to length; (4) the place " where and circumstances in which " the business or any part thereof " is transacted; (5) the time ex- " pended by the solicitor; (6) where " money or property is involved, its " amount or value; and (7) the im- " portance of the matter to the " client. . . ."

court to review the taxation and allow the objections presented by them; but Harman J. held that the costs were correctly taxed according to the scale fee in the schedule to the Solicitors' Remuneration (Registered Land) Orders, 1925 to 1953. He therefore dismissed the summons. The London County Council appealed.

Maurice Lyell Q.C. and H. E. Francis for the London County Council.

John Brunyate for the sellers.

In addition to the case referred to in the judgments the following was cited in argument: Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood.[6]

EVERSHED M.R. This appeal concerns the extent of the liability of a local authority, upon a compulsory acquisition, for the costs and expenses incurred on the part of the seller, those last words being taken from section 82 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. That section imposes upon a local authority in such a case as the present the obligation of paying such charges and expenses; but the section itself is in terms which, according to Mr. Lyell's argument, exclude from the liability of the local authority any costs, charges and expenses, which are related to work done on the seller's part, but which are not properly for work of or in connexion with the conveyance itself.

[His Lordship read section 82 and continued:] Section 83 provides that if the promoters and the party entitled to the costs shall not agree as to the amount thereof, such costs shall be taxed by one of the taxing masters of the court of Chancery "upon an order of the same court, to be obtained upon petition "in a summary way."

In the present case the land acquired was registered land, that is (as is conceded for the present argument) land which has been registered with an absolute or good leasehold title under the Land Registration Act, 1925.

The sellers under the compulsory purchase have sought to recover from the London County Council, the amount of the costs which they say that they became obliged to pay to their own solicitors, the costs being charged in accordance with the Solicitors' Remuneration (Registered Land) Order, 1925. The sum involved is not, in the circumstances, very large. We were told that the bill amounts to about £159 and it has not been suggested that that sum is by any particular amount excessive or indeed that it exceeds what, on a taxation under section 83, would have to be paid in any event by the London County Council.

Evershed M.R.

The matter has, however, come before us, as it is said, upon a question of principle, that question being whether the terms of the Solicitors' Remuneration (Registered Land) Order, 1925, apply at all to the acquisition under compulsory powers by a local authority of registered land; or alternatively, if the order does apply in any such cases, to what cases it does so apply.

The powers and rights of solicitors to charge for their services have for some time been regulated by orders made under the authority of Acts of Parliament and in that respect for a great many years a distinction has been drawn between charges in respect of sales of registered land and charges in respect of sales of unregistered land. The question which has arisen in the present case, and the difficulty which has exhibited itself, largely depends I think on the circumstance that, as regards unregistered land, the relevant order, as amended from time to time, contains an express exclusion of its applicability to cases of sales under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, whereas there is no such exclusion in the case of registered land. In the case of unregistered land the matter is regulated by the Solicitors' Remuneration Order, 1883, which has been amended in certain respects, but which provides that a scale set out in Schedule I of that order shall be applied in the case of certain transactions, including completed sales; but, by rule 11 of that order it is provided that, in cases of sales under the Act of 1845 or any other private or public Act under which the vendor's charges are paid by the purchaser, the scale shall not apply. When, however, one comes to the relevant order relating to registered land, which is the Solicitors' Remuneration (Registered Land) Order, 1925, there is no such exclusion.

The relevant provisions of the order of 1925 are as follows: [His Lordship read subparagraph 1 (D) (i) and continued:] The schedule to the order of 1925 contains a scale of remuneration which is related strictly to the value of the land sold. Subparagraph (G) provides: "In all exchanges and other transactions, save those hereinbefore specified, item [Schedule II] remuneration shall apply." Schedule II, putting it briefly, now regulates the remuneration in accordance with general principles as regard the amount of the work done, the skill in doing it, and so forth, including (but not limited to) the value of the subject-matter dealt with. [His Lordship read subparagraph (H) and continued:]

The burden of Mr. Lyell's argument which I have already anticipated is, that the liability under section 82 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, is limited, broadly speaking, to the costs and charges incurred in respect of the conveyance and other matters properly ancillary thereto, matters of title and so forth—in respect of matters, as he says, arising after the date of any contract which the solicitor might have been employed in drafting or perusing. Therefore, says Mr. Lyell, it will be seen that subparagraph (H) of the order of 1925, by making the remuneration extend to and cover, and in effect be remuneration for, matters other than those specified in section 82, imposes or would, if it were applicable, impose upon the acquiring authority a greater liability to pay costs than section 82 ordained.

Mr. Lyell referred us to the decision of Page Wood V.-C. in In re Hampstead Junction Railway Co., ex parte Buck.[1] In that case an acquiring authority, a railway company, acquired parts of certain properties and, as a consequence, the seller had to apportion the rents which he had been receiving from them. He sought to charge the railway company, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, with the costs of the apportionments in question.

Page Wood V.-C. said[2]: "I do not see in what way I can "give any costs under section 82, which are not costs of or "incidental to the conveyance. But the conveyance is a "perfectly distinct thing from that which is to be conveyed, "and from preliminary negotiations. The conveyance begins "when you have ascertained what is to be conveyed, and then "the provision of the Act is that the company are to pay the "costs of verifying the title and the expenses of conveyance." The Vice-Chancellor then gave one or two examples and concluded this part of his judgment thus[3]: "As regards the Act, "I think Mr. Speed's explanation the right one. Section 82 "deals simply with the legal expenses of making title and "conveying the property, taking these expenses in their "largest sense, but not with any costs of ascertaining what that "is which is to be put into the document."

Mr. Lyell has argued from that judgment that the costs properly attributable, for example, to the making of any contract preceding the conveyance are necessarily outside the ambit of the obligation imposed by section 82. It is not in my judgment necessary to express any view of the exact limits imposed by the terms of section 82 or to say whether in all cases, or in some cases, the costs of solicitors in preparing or perusing a contract would or would not be within the charge. I think that the answer to the present case depends upon the simple terms of the order of 1925, subparagraph (D). This is registered land. By the order of 1925 (the competence to make which has not been challenged and which in my judgment must be treated as a valid and effective order) the remuneration of solicitors in regard to conveyance of registered land is regulated by virtue of the order, so that under subparagraph (D), for every completed transfer of sale where the land is registered with absolute or good leasehold title, the remuneration shall be that prescribed in the schedule thereto.

Evershed M.R.

In my judgment it follows from those words that, the seller being liable to his solicitor by virtue of the order, which I have read, to pay a scale charge upon a completed transfer, those costs are inevitably, within the fair meaning of section 82, charges and expenses, incurred on the part of the seller, of the conveyance and assurance of the lands. I cannot for my part see any escape from that effect of the words which I find in this order. If it had not been for the exclusion, by virtue of rule 11 of the order of 1883, of sales upon compulsory acquisition of unregistered land, I should have thought, I must confess, that the matter was quite plain; but it is, as I have already mentioned, a curious and marked feature of the code of charges which has gradually been built up over the last three-quarters of a century that one does find in the case of unregistered land this express exclusion; and so it has been argued, and argued not without some force, that if a scale charge of this character is or was treated by the requisite authority as inapplicable to the case of unregistered land to compulsory purchasers, by the same token a scale charge in respect of registered land should be treated as equally inapplicable to such cases. Some attempt has been made in the course of argument to suggest reasons which may have influenced the order-making authority in making the exclusion in the one case and not the other. It is an exercise in speculation which does not, in my judgment, help the solution of the present case, although I think there is some force at any rate in Mr. Brunyate's contention that in the case of registered land, treating it in quite general terms, it would not be so easy to think of a fair method of assessing remuneration for work done which did not involve a calculation by reference to the value of the subject-matter sold—in other words, which did not in effect bring one back to the schedule to the order of 1925. However that may be, for some reason the exclusion is found in the one case and not in the other.

It is the function of the court now to construe together the Act of 1845, ss. 82 and 83, and the relevant solicitors' remuneration orders, and to see what in the result is the effect in such a case as the present. I have already indicated that in my judgment there is really no escape from the plain language of the order of 1925 and its consequence when one looks at section 82 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. There was, however, this further point made which depends upon the terms of subparagraph (H) in the order of 1925. Subparagraph (H) makes it plain that the scale remuneration under the order of 1925 covers not merely the costs and expenses of and incidental to the conveyance, but also, amongst other things, the costs related to all other work incidental to the transaction; and Mr. Lyell has said, that the scale must therefore have been arrived at, taking one imaginary example with another, so as to give, upon an average, a fair remuneration, whether there was or was not in any given case work incidental to the transaction not being work properly of or incidental to the conveyance. I can see the force of the argument, but in my judgment it cannot affect the result. Quite plainly—whether it is so in this case has never been inquired into—if there were no other work than work of or incidental to the conveyance, it would be, I think, exceedingly difficult to contend that the proper amount of charge which a solicitor could make was not that regulated by the express terms of the order of 1925, and that that sum was not in terms covered by section 82 of the Act of 1845. But assuming that in some cases there is work done which would not be within the scope of section 82, still, I think, the charges made under the order of 1925 are "charges and expenses of "the conveyance"; and not the less so because the solicitor is disabled from making any additional charge in respect of other matters which might as such be outside the scope of section 82.

There is the final point—for this reason I referred to subparagraph (G)—that if the remuneration is not to be the scale remuneration under the order of 1925, under what order is the solicitors' power to charge regulated at all? I think for myself that Mr. Brunyate is right when he says that subparagraph (G), which brings into operation Schedule II of the orders of 1883 to 1953, could not apply in such a case as the present since the transaction is one for which express provision has earlier been made in the order [of 1925]. But that is not necessarily conclusive because, as Mr. Lyell contends, the taxing master could still be invited to exercise his powers of taxation in general terms under section 83 of the Act of 1845. I find, however, the conception not an easy one to accept; for nowadays, 110 years after the Act of 1845, it seems to me difficult to suppose that the taxing master could be invited to tax upon some general discretion, altogether outside the ambit of any of the remuneration orders, the costs of a seller in a case such as the present. These matters, however, are but arguments, and no more, tending towards one or other of the two conclusions suggested on the strict wording of the Order of 1925.

For the reasons which I have already given it seems to me that the remuneration which the solicitors are entitled to charge, and indeed which, prima facie, they were bound to charge under that order for a completed transfer of sale, is within the exact language of section 82 as being charges and expenses incurred on the part of the sellers of the assurance.

I should like to say in conclusion that I have felt, and indeed expressed, some embarrassment, as Master of the Rolls, in this matter since the order-making authority in the case of solicitors' remuneration is vested in a committee of which the holder of my office for the time being is a member; and, as Mr. Lyell has indicated, these matters of solicitors' remuneration have been from time to time, and still are, matters of anxious consideration by that committee. The latest Schedule II order of 1953 was made during my own term of office. But I am fortunately disembarrassed, or at any rate substantially so, by the happy circumstance that both my colleagues have arrived at the same conclusion as myself. But for the reasons which I have stated I think that Harman J. rightly concluded this matter and I think the appeal should be dismissed.

JENKINS L.J. I agree and have nothing to add.

PARKER L.J. I agree and I would only add this. The London County Council, the promoters in this case, are bound, under section 82 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to pay the charges and expenses of certain work. As my Lord the Master of the Rolls has said, it is unnecessary to lay down exactly what is covered by section 82, but I will refer to it as X. Accordingly, if the sellers put forward a bill rendered by their solicitors in accordance with the appropriate statutory scale for that work, X, the promoters are bound to pay. It is perfectly true that if the bill rendered was a bill for work which the solicitors were only entitled to charge on the basis that they had done not merely X, but X plus Y, the promoters would be entitled to say that that was something more than they were bound to pay, but in the present case it seems to me to avail the promoters nothing to say that, if more work had been done than X and if X plus Y had been done, the solicitors could not have charged any more.

It seemed to me in the course of the argument that the only basis upon which the London County Council could succeed here would be if they could show that the two orders, the order in respect of registered land and the order in respect of unregistered land, must in some way be read together so that the exception in regard to compulsory sales, which is specifically laid down in the order dealing with unregistered land, should apply equally to registered land. Not only do I see no grounds whatever for reading the orders in that way, but it is to be observed that in 1953. both orders were amended by orders laid before Parliament, and whereas occasion was taken to amend that very exception in rule 11 of the unregistered land order, the opportunity was not taken, and presumably deliberately not taken, to amend the registered land order by including a similar exception. I would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Contract—Suspension—Notice to determine—Nature of notice—Patent—Licence subject to compensation for exceeding quota—Agreement to suspend payments of compensation—Litigation between parties—Counterclaim seeking to enforce payments—Whether sufficient notice—Patent—Licence—Condition—"Prohibit or restrict"—Meaning—Patents and Designs Act, 1907 (7 Edw. 7, c. 29), s. 38 (1). Patent.

By section 38 (1) of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907: "It "shall not be lawful in any contract . . . in relation to the . . . "licence to use . . . any article . . . protected by a patent to "insert a condition the effect of which will be—(a) to prohibit or "restrict the . . . licensee from using any article or class of "articles, whether patented or not . . . supplied . . . by any "person other than the . . . licensor or his nominees; or (b) to "require the . . . licensee to acquire from the . . . licensor or his "nominees, any article or class of articles not protected by the "patent; . . ."

The appellants, the registered proprietors of certain British letters patent, entered into an agreement with the respondents authorising them to manufacture under the patents subject to a quota. Clause 5 provided that if in any month the aggregate quantity of contract material, as defined by the agreement, sold or used by the respondents (other than material supplied to them by the appellants) should exceed a stated quantity, the respondents should pay compensation equal to 30 per cent. of the sum representing the excess net value. As a result of discussions between the parties in 1942 the appellants agreed to suspend enforcement of payments of compensation pending the foundation of a new agreement. In 1945 there was litigation between the parties, the respondents being plaintiffs and the appellants defendants, and on March 28, 1946, the appellants counterclaimed payment of compensation under the agreement but failed on the ground that when the counterclaim was delivered the waiver was still continuing. Subsequently the appellants commenced an action claiming payment of compensation alleged to be due for a period commencing January 1, 1947:—

Held, that in the circumstances the delivery of the counterclaim constituted sufficient notice of the intention of the appellants to terminate the suspension of the enforcement of the compensation provisions in clause 5, although no date of termination was specified. There is no universal rule that such an arrangement must always be terminated in one way.

Held, further (per Lord Oaksey, Lord Tucker and Lord Cohen; Viscount Simonds dissenting), that clause 5 was not void as contravening section 38 (1) of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, since the words "prohibit," and "restrict" and "require" indicated legal obligation and not mere financial inducement.

Appeal from the Court of Appeal (Somervell, Birkett and Romer L.JJ.).

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal dated March 29, 1954, whereby the court wholly set aside the judgment entered for the appellant company, Tool Metal Manufacturing Co. Ld., on November 16, 1953, in an action tried before Pearson J., without a jury, on November 9, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 16, 1953, by which the appellant company claimed certain sums described as "compensation" which the respondent company, Tungsten Electric Co. Ld. were, subject to the other questions raised, liable to pay them under a deed and licence both dated April 2, 1938.

The facts are set out in the opinions of Lord Oaksey and Lord Cohen.

F. W. Beney Q.C. and T. G. Roche for the appellant company.

Gilbert Beyfus Q.C., Kenneth Johnston Q.C. and A. C. Warshaw for the respondent company.

Besides the authorities cited in their Lordships' opinions, the following cases were referred to in argument: Hartley v. Hymans [1]; Cornish v. Stubbs [2]; A/S Tankexpress v. Compagnie Financière Belge des Petroles S.A. [3]; Combe v. Combe [4]; Nordenfelt v. *Maxim Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co. Their Lordships took time for consideration.

June 16. Viscount Simonds. My Lords, the facts in this complicated case are fully stated in the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Cohen, which I have had the privilege of reading, and I do not think it necessary to trouble your Lordships by referring, except incidentally, to the events which preceded the issue of the writ in the action in which this appeal is brought.

It was in the circumstances stated by my noble friend that the appellants, by writ issued on September 11, 1950, claimed from the respondents as compensation under clause 5 of the deed as from January 1, 1947, to January 26, 1950, a quantified sum of £84,050, and an account of compensation payable under the same clause from January 26, 1950, to July 27, 1950, when the licence terminated.

To this claim the respondents put in a number of defences. They pleaded that the provisions of clause 5 were void on three separate grounds: (a) because they imposed a penalty; (b) because they were an unreasonable restraint of trade; and (c) because they contravened section 38 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907. They also pleaded that the delivery of the counterclaim in the first action did not operate as notice to terminate the equitable arrangement which, as was held in that action, existed at any rate until such delivery, and that it was a condition of its termination that the notice determining it (a) should be unequivocal and (b) should specify the date of termination, and further that that date should give them a reasonable time to adjust their business affairs to meet the altered circumstances. To this, in effect, the appellants replied that the delivery of the counterclaim was a sufficient intimation of their intention to reassert their legal rights and that, that intimation having been given, equity demanded nothing more than that a reasonable time should be allowed before they sought to enforce them. And they further said (nor was this denied by the respondents) that upon this footing a reasonable time was given since the counterclaim was delivered in March, 1946, and compensation claimed from January, 1947.

Upon this part of the case I will be as brief as I can, for, having read the opinion of Lord Cohen in which the facts are set out at greater length, I am not prepared to dissent from his conclusion. It would not, however, be right in a case in which I find myself unable to agree with the decision of the Court of Appeal to say nothing on the far-reaching conclusion to which they have come.

My Lords, the decision of the Court of Appeal in the first action was based on nothing else than the principle of equity stated in this House in Hughes v. Metropolitan Railway Co.[1] and interpreted by Bowen L.J. in Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London & North Western Railway Co.[2] in these terms: "It seems to "me to amount to this, that if persons who have contractual "rights against others induce by their conduct those against "whom they have such rights to believe that such rights will "either not be enforced or will be kept in suspense or abeyance "for some particular time, those persons will not be allowed "by a court of equity to enforce the rights until such time "has elapsed, without at all events placing the parties in the "same position as they were before." These last words are important, for they emphasize that the gist of the equity lies in the fact that one party has by his conduct led the other to alter his position. I lay stress on this because I would not have it supposed, particularly in commercial transactions, that mere acts of indulgence are apt to create rights, and I do not wish to lend the authority of this House to the statement of the principle which is to be found in Combe v. Combe [3] and may well be far too widely stated.

The difficulty in the present case lies in the fact that in the first action, in which it was held that between these parties the principle applies, neither of them in any pleading or other statement between the delivery of the counterclaim in March, 1946, and judgment in April, 1950, took their stand upon its existence. The respondents asserted a binding agreement for the complete and final abrogation of any compensation: the appellants, though willing to make some concession in regard to the past, denied any agreement in respect of any period at all. The position of neither of them was compatible with the existence of an equitable arrangement by which the right to receive and the obligation to pay compensation were suspended for a period which lasted at least until March, 1946, and for a debatable period thereafter.

My Lords, I think that at this point the issue is a very narrow one. On the one hand it is said that a plea resting on the denial of an agreement cannot be a notice determining that agreement. This is the view taken by Romer L.J. in which the other members of the Court of Appeal concurred. On the other hand, it is urged that, since the suspensory period is due to the gratuitous willingness of the one party to forgo their rights, nothing can be a clearer intimation that they propose no longer to forgo them than a claim which, though it may ask too much, can leave the other party in no doubt that they must not expect further indulgence. The problem may perhaps be stated in this way. Did equity require that the appellants should expressly and unequivocably refer to an equitable arrangement which the respondents had not pleaded and they did not recognize? Or was it sufficient for them by a reassertion of their legal rights to proclaim that the period of indulgence was over? In favour of the latter view it is added that such an attitude on the part of the appellants could not surprise the respondents who had not hesitated to bring against them a serious charge of fraud.

My Lords, it is not clear to me what conclusion the Court of Appeal would have reached but for the authority of the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. The King,[4] to which I must refer later. For my part I have, after some hesitation, formed the opinion that, as soon as the counterclaim was delivered, the respondents must be taken to know that the suspensory period was at an end and were bound to put their house in order. The position is a very artificial one, but it was their own ignorance of a suspensory period, or at least their failure to plead it, which created the difficulty, and I do not think that they can take advantage of their own ignorance or default and say that they were entitled to a further period of grace until a further notice was given. Equity demands that all the circumstances of the case should be regarded, and I think that the fair and reasonable view is that the respondents could not, after they had received the counterclaim, regard themselves as entitled to further indulgence.

It was, however, urged on behalf of the respondents that, even if the counterclaim could otherwise be regarded as a sufficient notice that the equitable arrangement was at an end, yet it was defective in that it did not name a certain future date at which it was to take effect. To this the reply was made that equity did not require a future date to be named in the notice, but that what it did require was that a reasonable time should be allowed to elapse before it was sought to enforce it. Here, too, the Court of Appeal favoured the view of the respondents, again feeling themselves constrained by the decision in the Canadian Pacific Railway case.[4] And here, too, I am forced to the opposite conclusion. Equity is not held in a strait-jacket. There is no universal rule that an equitable arrangement must always be determined in one way. It may in some cases be right and fair that a dated notice should be given. But in this case what was the position in January, 1947, which I take to be the critical date? Then for nine months, the respondents must, in my opinion, be taken to have been aware that the appellants proposed to stand on their legal rights. It is not denied that those nine months gave them ample time to readjust their position. I cannot regard it as a requirement of equity that in such circumstances they should have been expressly notified in March, 1946, that they would have nine months and no more to take such steps as the altered circumstances required. In coming to this conclusion I do not think I run counter to any authority that was cited to us unless it be the Canadian Pacific Railway case[4] to which I must now refer.

My Lords, in his judgment in the Court of Appeal Romer L.J. introduced that case with these words[5]: "In my opinion, "although in many cases the equity, to which Hughes v. Metro-"politan Railway Co.[6] gave recognition and high authority, is "satisfied by merely conforming to the terms in which Lord "Cairns (and subsequently Bowen L.J.) formulated it, there are "other cases where justice requires that the resumption of legal "rights which have been suspended for a period must be preceded "by a notification to the other party concerned specifying a fixed

" period of grace during which that party can put his house in " order; and that in such cases a notification such as that will " be a condition precedent to the valid reassumption of the " owner's legal rights." " Such a case," the Lord Justice proceeds, " was Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. The King." [7]

My Lords, it is undoubtedly the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway case [7] decided that what I have called a " dated notice " was required in that case to terminate an existing licence and that the Crown, the licensor, had in that case the duty and the risk of fixing a reasonable period of notice, but I must observe that not only was the equitable principle, which was recognized in Hughes' case,[8] not invoked, but Lord Russell of Killowen in delivering the opinion of the Board expressly disclaimed any reference to that or any other equitable principle. The relevant problem there was whether a licence to occupy land by placing telegraph poles thereon had been revoked by the institution of proceedings by the Crown, and the question was what term in regard to revocation should be implied in the licence which the Crown was assumed to have granted. I have no doubt that the question is analogous to that which we have to decide in this case, for the implication of a term as to revocation, upon which the licence is silent, must depend on what is fair and reasonable between the parties. The court will be guided by the same principles in the one case and the other. The passage which I cited from Bowen L.J.'s judgment in the Birmingham case [9] ended with these words: " That is the principle to be applied. " I will not say that it is not a principle that was recognized by " courts of law as well as of equity. It is not necessary to " consider how far it was always a principle of common law." Nor, my Lords, is it necessary today, but in the House of Justice it would be difficult to distinguish between the equitable principle recognized in Hughes' case [10] and the rule well established at common law long before the fusion of law and equity that a licensor must give reasonable notice to determine a licence. It was this rule which was applied in the Canadian Pacific Railway case [11] and, in applying it, Lord Russell of Killowen said: " Whether any and what restrictions exist on the power of a " licensor to determine a revocable licence must, their Lordships " think, depend upon the circumstances of each case." And, as I read the decision, it was the circumstances of that case and nothing else, certainly not any general rule, which led him to say [12] that " it will be for the Crown to determine the licence " by service of a notice the sufficiency of which, if called in " question, will have to be decided, upon proper evidence, in " subsequent proceedings. It will be for the Crown, at its risk, " to fix the length of notice." The circumstances of that case were very unusual, and I do not doubt that they fully justified the rule being applied in that way. But so also in the present case the circumstances are very unusual: it is hardly possible that they should be repeated, and even if I apply in the amplest way to the termination of the equitable arrangement between the parties in this case the rule applicable to the revocation of licence, I find nothing in the Canadian Pacific Railway case [13] which precludes me from reaching the conclusion which I have already stated, viz., that the appellants gave sufficient notice that the suspensory period was at an end, and allowed enough time to elapse before seeking to enforce their rights. For these reasons I think that this defence fails and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal cannot on this ground be upheld.

The plea that the provisions of the deed are unenforceable because they impose a penalty clearly cannot be maintained. It is perhaps enough to say that they do not impose, or purport to impose, a penalty. No doubt the consequences of certain actions by the respondents may be detrimental to them, but that does not involve that a penalty is imposed in the sense in which that word is used in the equitable doctrine that equity relieves against penalties. No case was cited where the doctrine was invoked otherwise than for a penalty payable upon the breach of a contractual obligation.

The further plea that the provisions of the deed are unenforceable, because they constitute an unreasonable restraint of trade, must also fail. It was conceded that as between the parties the restraint was reasonable. But it was contended that it was unreasonable in the public interest. The onus of proof here lay with the respondents and it is a notoriously heavy burden. In my opinion, the respondents did not discharge it, and I concur so fully in the reasoning and conclusion of Romer L.J. that I need say no more.

My Lords, having come to the conclusion that it has not been established that clause 5 of the deed of April 2, 1938, is under the general law void as in restraint of trade, it is necessary now to consider whether it is avoided by section 38 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907. The Patents Act, 1949, has substituted a new section for that section but it is with the earlier section that we are here concerned. It had by 1907 become notorious that patentees were seeking by virtue of their patents to obtain a collateral advantage by imposing conditions upon licensees such as that the patented article should not be used save in conjunction with some other article produced by the patentee, or that the patented article alone should be used, or that the user should purchase his raw materials from the patentee: see Terrell on Patents, 9th ed., p. 262, and cases there cited. And it is, I think, clear that the object of the legislature was to put an end to this grave abuse of monopoly rights. How far it has done so must depend on the true construction of section 38 of the Act of 1907, but the background is one in which I see first the common law rejection of a monopoly, then the statutory grant under the Statute of Monopolies, 1628, and the succeeding Patent Acts of limited monopolies hedged about with divers safeguards in the public interest against their abuse, then the attempt by patentees, in spite of such safeguards, to secure for themselves collateral advantages by virtue of their monopoly, and finally the attempt to check such attempts by prohibitory legislation with powerful sanctions. Romer L.J. in Huntoon Co. v. Kolynos (Incorporated)[14] accurately stated the purport of the legislation in one aspect when he said that its language "would seem to suggest that the object "of the Legislature was to prevent persons who had obtained "a monopoly in respect of an article or a process by means of a "patent, so using that monopoly as to obtain for themselves a "virtual monopoly in respect of other articles and processes for "which they have not obtained any patent." His statement would be equally applicable to articles which had been patented but the patents had expired. Nothing, I suppose, could be in more direct conflict with the law relating to patents than a contractual provision which indirectly secured for a patentee a monopoly extending beyond the statutory period of his patent.

I now turn to section 38 (1), and for the sake of clarity state the first subsection, with the omission of words not relevant to the present case: "It shall not be lawful in any contract . . . "in relation to the . . . licence to use . . . any article . . . "protected by a patent to insert a condition the effect of which "will be (a) to prohibit or restrict the . . . licensee from using any "article or class of articles, whether patented or not . . . supplied ". . . by any person other than the . . . licensor or his nominees; "or (b) to require the . . . licensee to acquire from the . . . "licensor, or his nominees, any article or class of articles not "protected by the patent; . . ." I need not at the present stage refer to the provisoes to this subsection nor to the other subsections.

Upon the meaning and effect of the words that I have cited numerous questions have arisen, but the controversy has chiefly centred round the words "the effect of which will be" and the words "prohibit or restrict."

I think that it is clear that the words "the effect of which will "be" have a wider scope than the words "which will," and I cannot find a more accurate way of stating the difference than by saying that the former phrase emphasises that the result may be directly or indirectly achieved. But it is the word "will" which has caused the greater difficulty. It was pointed out truly enough that the word is "will" not "may," and from this the short step was taken of saying that it must be shown by evidence that the condition necessarily will or, in other words, must have a certain effect. But, in my opinion, too much stress is laid on the use of the future tense. The subsection looks forward to the future; it opens with the words "It shall not be lawful in any "contract," and in describing what could only be a future condition in a future contract it was, I think, good grammar to use the words "the effect of which will be." The problem is precisely the same as if the present tense had been used, or as if (leaving out the words "the effect of which will be") the subsection had run "condition prohibiting or restricting," etc., or (giving their proper meaning to the words I have for the moment omitted) "condition directly or indirectly prohibiting or restrict-"ing." It is common ground that the matter must be examined as at the date of the execution of the contract. That is a date at which the surrounding circumstances are known but the future cannot be foreseen, and nobody can predict that such and such a result will inevitably ensue. The court, then, in my opinion, in considering whether section 38 operates to avoid a condition, has the task of determining whether its essential quality is (I will not repeat "directly" or "indirectly") prohibitive or restrictive of a certain course of conduct. This cannot as a rule, I think, be a difficult task.

Obviously, no condition will have the effect of prohibiting or restricting me from following a certain course if I have never wanted and never shall want to follow that course. The fundamental supposition is that, if I do want to follow it, I shall be faced with the condition, and it is fair to assume that it is just because I may want to follow it, that the condition is imposed. If I find such a condition in a contract, it is, in my view, idle to speculate (as was done at great length in this case) whether and when I shall want to do a certain thing: the question is whether, when I want to do it, I shall find myself prohibited or restricted.

What, then, is the meaning of "prohibit" and "restrict"? It has been urged by the appellants and was, I think, held by Pearson J. that both these words cover only a direct contractual provision, e.g. "The licensee will not use any hard alloys except "those supplied by the licensor" or "the licensee will not use "more than 25 per cent. of hard alloys supplied by any other "supplier than the licensor," the former taken as an example of a prohibiting, the latter of a restricting, condition. And, if I understood the argument, it proceeded on the footing that "prohibit" meant "forbid," that "forbid" connoted such a contractual provision as I have stated and that "restrict," being found in immediate conjunction with "prohibit," must be given a similar meaning. I cannot accept this argument. In the first place, it wholly ignores the words "the effect of which will be." But, secondly, I see no reason in the context for so limiting the meaning of the word "prohibit" or, if indeed that word has a limited meaning, for saying that "restrict" must be similarly limited. I put to learned counsel the hypothesis of a penalty which must in fact effectually deter the licensee from purchasing in the market and he admitted candidly that his construction

Tool Metal Manufacturing Co. Ld. v. Tungsten Electric Co. Ld.

required him to deny that that operated to prohibit the licensee. It appears to me that, while one meaning of "prohibit" is "forbid" it has another meaning, which I would by no means call a secondary meaning, and that is "prevent." If a modest tourist say that the prices of a certain hotel are prohibitive, he is not thinking in terms of contractual provision. The prices are so high that he is prevented from entering that hotel. It is interesting to note that he might say that the condition of his purse forbade it. I would say then that a man may be prohibited from a course of action equally by the express terms of his contract, by the law of the land, or by economic circumstance. Nor do I see any reason for giving the word in the context of section 38 a narrower meaning than it fairly bears. True enough it is in a sense a penal provision. But I do not detract one jot from what I said in London & North Eastern Railway Co. v. Berriman[15] if I insist that, it being the plain purpose of the section to prohibit (or prevent) the licensor from using his monopoly to obtain a collateral advantage, nothing less than its fair meaning should be given to the clause. It would be a strange piece of legislation which disallowed a direct contractual provision but allowed a condition which indirectly had the same effect. It was, perhaps, in order to avoid the possibility of such a conclusion that the words "the "effect of which will be" were introduced.

But to "prohibit" must be added "restrict." If I am wrong in thinking that prohibition covers prevention as well by economic circumstance as by direct contractual provision, why should "restrict" be so limited? I see no reason for saying that it follows from an application or misapplication of the ejusdem generis rule. The argument, I think, involves that "prohibit" means "totally prohibit" and "restrict" means "partially "prohibit" and in either case by means of an express contractual provision: for otherwise I do not know what meaning can, upon this footing, be given to "restrict." But this would be surplusage: for it could not be maintained that a condition was not prohibitive, if it forbade the user of material supplied by outsiders to the extent of (say) 75 per cent. In truth, however, there is no valid reason in the context or otherwise for giving a limited meaning to this word. A word of command, the fear of penal consequences, or barbed wire may equally restrict my movement. I do not know why the means by which I am restricted should affect the fact that I am restricted in a real sense of that word. And I would say that in the sphere of commerce nothing could more truly restrict a trader than the fact that, wishing to purchase the goods of A rather than the goods of B, he finds that he can only do so at the cost of paying a heavy penalty to B. That is the effect which the penalty is intended to have and it will probably have it.

throws any light upon the meaning of the relevant words. The proviso to subsection (1) offers some mitigation to its stringency and subsection (4) gives cogent evidence of the importance attached by the legislature to subsection (1). Some comment was made on the fact that the section does not preclude a condition prohibiting sale by the licensee of goods supplied by outsiders, but I do not see why this omission should lead to a narrow construction of " prohibit " and " restrict " in relation to user. There may be good reason for thinking that a selling agent may fairly be restrained by the licensor from selling the goods of an outsider. This seems to be the motive of subsection (5) (a).

After this too long exposition of the section I return to the present case and ask whether, on April 2, 1938, it could fairly be said of clause 5 that it was a condition which will have the effect of prohibiting or restricting TECO from using contract material supplied by suppliers other than T.M.M.C. As I have already indicated, it must have been an idle and irrelevant speculation at that date whether at any time in the next ten years TECO would want to do so. The penal clause is inserted upon the assumption that they may or will want to do so and to meet just that eventuality. Assuming then, that the time comes when TECO wants to use contract material obtained from an outsider, will this clause have a prohibitive or restrictive effect? I do not see how it can fail to do so. The assumption is that TECO want to obtain their material from an outsider either because they can get it cheaper or because they think it better material or for some other good commercial reason. If there was no clause, they would do so. But the clause is there and at once the position is changed. They can pursue their chosen course only at the expense of a penalty which will not be borne by their own competitors in the market, and so they are compelled to buy from their licensors. I repeat that the compulsion of economic conditions is as truly prohibitive or restrictive as a direct contractual obligation. Its intention and its effect are to confine them to purchase from their licensor, when unhampered by the clause they would be free to purchase from another. That is, in my opinion, a restrictive condition which section 38 (1) of the Act avoids.

On this ground, and this ground only, I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD OAKSEY. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the opinion prepared by my noble and learned friend, LORD REID, who has not yet taken the Oath in your Lordships' House on account of his absence from the country, and as I entirely agree with his opinion I propose to read it as my own, and to vote accordingly.

My Lords, Krupps of Essen had been developing processes for the manufacture of hard metal alloys and in 1931 they formed the appellant company, whom I shall call " T.M.M.C.," to operate in Britain. T.M.M.C. owned a number of British patents and they sought to stop what they alleged to be infringements by certain British companies including the respondents TECO who had been making hard tips for machine tools and other articles from tungsten carbide powder. After much negotiation, on April 2, 1938, two deeds were executed by which T.M.M.C. granted a licence to TECO to import, make, use and sell under certain conditions hard alloys made in accordance with the inventions the subjects of their patents (called "contract material") and TECO agreed to pay a royalty of 10 per cent. and in addition "compensation" at the rate of 30 per cent. of the value of contract material sold or used by them in excess of 50 kilograms per month. This was a very heavy burden on TECO and they only agreed to it because the alternatives were either to defend an action for infringement, which would have been disastrous for them if they were unsuccessful, or to go out of business and perhaps also pay damages for past infringements. Before the war TECO paid about £16,000 to T.M.M.C. as "compensation."

Shortly before the war Krupps sold their interest in T.M.M.C. to British buyers and early in the war TECO settled their liability for compensation down to the date of settlement by paying a further sum of over £3,000. Thereafter no demand for further payment of compensation was made until after the end of hostilities.

In July, 1945, TECO sued T.M.M.C. for repayment of those sums amounting in all to £19,521, alleging that the deeds of 1938 had been obtained by fraudulent misrepresentation, and they also pleaded that T.M.M.C. had agreed that no further compensation should be payable. On March 26, 1946, T.M.M.C. lodged a defence and counterclaim denying fraud and claiming payment of royalties and also of compensation as from June 1, 1945. The case was finally decided by the Court of Appeal on April 4, 1950. Fraud was not proved and the counterclaim for compensation failed. In that action there was no plea or suggestion by TECO that their agreement to pay compensation was void or voidable on any other ground than fraud.

On September 11, 1950, T.M.M.C. raised the present action claiming compensation as from January 1, 1947, and TECO's defence was delivered on November 10, 1950. Four defences were pleaded; first, that no notice had been given by T.M.M.C. which entitled them to demand compensation, secondly, that the clause in the 1938 agreement imposing liability to pay compensation was in restraint of trade and illegal, thirdly, that this clause provided for the imposition of a penalty which was irrecoverable at law, and fourthly, that the clause was null and void in that it offended against section 38 (1) (a) of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907. I agree with your Lordships that the first and third defences fail, and I propose only to deal with the other two.

If these defences, or either of them, are valid it is somewhat remarkable that nothing was said about them in the earlier action but it is admitted that it is competent to raise them now for the first time. In order to deal with them I must first consider the terms of the clause against which they are directed. It is clause 5 of the agreement of 1938, which is in these terms: "If in any month during the continuance of the said "licence the aggregate quantity of contract material sold or used "by TECO and Industrial (other than contract material supplied "to TECO by the grantors or any licensees under the said "patents) shall exceed a quota of 50 kilograms (50 Kg) TECO "shall whether all or any of such material shall be subject to "royalty hereunder or not pay to the grantors compensation "equal to thirty per cent. (30%) of the sum which represents "the excess net value that is to say the average net value per "kilogram of all contract material sold or used by TECO and "Industrial in the said month multiplied by the weight in kilo-"grams of all such contract material as aforesaid sold or used "by TECO and Industrial during such month in excess of fifty "kilograms (50 Kg) Provided that contract material sold by "TECO to Industrial shall only be taken into account for the "purposes of this clause on the occasion of its sale or use by "Industrial."

Before considering this clause in detail it is necessary to have in mind something about the nature of contract material. TECO's process begins by taking tungsten carbide and any other desired ingredient in finely powdered form and the object of the process is to get the grains or particles to adhere to each other so that the finished product is an extremely hard object of the required shape. This is done by sintering in two stages. After the first stage the powder has been compacted into an object which can be fairly easily worked to approximately the right size and shape. The second stage then makes the object so hard that it is difficult to grind away any of it. It is only when this second stage is completed that the object becomes contract material within the meaning of the agreement. The manufacturer can then sell the object in this state or he can grind it after the second stage is completed so as to sharpen its edge or bring it to the exact shape which his customer wants. It is admitted that any such operation after the second stage is use of contract material by the manufacturer within the meaning of the agreement.

It appears that there are two grades of contract material, the iron grade and the steel grade. They are made by somewhat different processes and both were within the scope of the patents in force in 1938. But the patents with regard to the iron grade expired in 1941: thereafter only the patents with regard to the steel grade remained. So the clause operated in this way. Down to 1941 the only possible ways in which TECO could get contract material which they could sell or use were by making it themselves or by buying it from T.M.M.C or their other licensees. If in any month TECO sold or used more than 50 Kg. of contract material made by themselves they had to pay compensation on the excess, but they would pay no compensation in respect of selling or using any contract material which they had acquired from T.M.M.C. or their licensees. This was not, in my view, calculated to confer any preference on T.M.M.C. or to induce TECO to buy from T.M.M.C. rather than make the material themselves. There were price fixing arrangements in the deeds which, if I understand them rightly, would give little encouragement to TECO to buy from T.M.M.C. even though they could do so without compensation affecting material so bought, and I can find nothing to indicate that TECO did buy from T.M.M.C or that it was contemplated that they would make a practice of doing so. But the inclusion of this exemption in clause 5 and of a similar exemption from royalty in clause 3 shows that the parties thought that such purchases might occur and the most likely reason for the exemption would seem to be that, if TECO bought direct from T.M.M.C., T.M.M.C. would get their full profit on what they sold to TECO in the same way as if they had sold to anyone else, and that, if TECO bought from another licensee of T.M.M.C., the material sold by that licensee would be taken into account in assessing the compensation payable by that licensee. So, if material acquired by TECO from T.M.M.C. or their licensees were taken into account to increase the compensation payable by TECO, the effect would be that T.M.M.C. would get a double profit from the same material and that no doubt was thought to be unfair, and to require the insertion of the exemption.

But after the iron grade patents had expired the situation with regard to iron grade contract material might be different. It was then open to anyone to make that material and, if that material was then made by some manufacturer independent of T.M.M.C. it was open to TECO to buy it and use it or resell it. In 1938 no one could say whether after 1941 independent manufacturers would manufacture this material or whether, if they did, the price and quality of their product would offer any inducement to TECO to buy from them rather than make the material themselves or buy it from T.M.M.C. But the terms of clause 5 are certainly wide enough to require TECO to bring into computation for the purpose of compensation any material which they might then buy from independent manufacturers and use or resell themselves. And it is also clear that after the iron grade patents had expired TECO were still liable to pay compensation in respect of iron grade contract material manufactured by themselves.

TECO now say that inasmuch as clause 5 required payment of compensation to T.M.M.C. in respect of iron grade material after T.M.M.C.'s patents relating to that material had expired it was in restraint of trade. I think that in the circumstances of this case it may be presumed that this obligation would tend to have the effect of diminishing the amount of iron grade material which TECO would be able to sell at a profit and putting them at some disadvantage in competing with T.M.M.C. But even if that were sufficient to show that clause 5 is objectionable it is still necessary to consider whether any restraint which it might cause is justifiable as being reasonable in the interests of the parties and in the public interest. As regards the parties, counsel for TECO rightly admitted that in view of their disadvantageous position, which I have already mentioned, it was reasonable for them to accept the 1938 agreement. T.M.M.C. no doubt drove a hard bargain but I cannot hold that they took an unconscionable advantage of their position, or that clause 5 was commercially unjustifiable or unreasonable for the protection of their trading interests. Counsel argued that a restraint may be reasonable in the interests of the parties and yet against the public interest, and so it may be. But I am unable to hold that this restraint was against the public interest. There is nothing to show that it either limited or was likely to limit the total supply of the material available for purchase by the public or that it had or was likely to have any substantial effect on the price which consumers would have to pay. If TECO had refused to make the agreement it was not argued that there was any provision in the Patents Act which could have been invoked. The most that can be said is that T.M.M.C. instead of trying to drive TECO out of business, which they could probably have done without in any way offending against the law, offered to TECO an agreement which, although it might limit their activities, allowed to them a substantial share of the trade: and I know of no authority for holding that that is against the public interest. To hold that that is against the public interest would only encourage a trader in an advantageous position to act more ruthlessly against his rival than he might be inclined to do.

TECO's last defence is that clause 5 of the agreement of 1938 offends against section 38 (1) (a) of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, and is therefore null and void. Section 38 (1) is in these terms: "It shall not be lawful in any contract made "after the passing of this Act in relation to the sale or lease "of, or licence to use or work, any article or process protected "by a patent to insert a condition the effect of which will be— "(a) to prohibit or restrict the purchaser, lessee, or licensee from "using any article or class of articles, whether patented or not, "or any patented process, supplied or owned by any person "other than the seller, lessor, or licensor or his nominees; or "(b) to require the purchaser, lessee, or licensee to acquire "from the seller, lessor, licensor, or his nominees, any article "or class of articles not protected by the patent; and any such "condition shall be null and void, as being in restraint of trade "and contrary to public policy:"

Lord Oaksey.

This is not an easy subsection to interpret. Let me therefore first take a case to which it clearly applies. Before the section was enacted the owner of a patented process might and sometimes did attach to a licence to use the process a condition that the licensee must buy raw material used in the process from him and from no one else. Such a condition was prohibited by the section, no doubt because it was regarded as an abuse of the patentee's monopoly in that it imposed on the licensee a restraint beyond the scope of the patent. The condition might be a positive obligation to buy the raw material from the licensor —that is made unlawful by subsection (1) (b)—or it might be a negative obligation prohibiting the licensee from buying it from any person other than the licensor and that is prohibited by subsection (1) (a). In the same way the seller of a machine protected by a patent might require the buyer to purchase raw material from him or prohibit the buyer from purchasing it from any other person and that is also made illegal.

Obviously, a condition restricting the right of the licensee to choose from whom he would buy articles not protected by the licensor's patents need not be drafted in such direct terms. It it not difficult to imagine circumstances where a condition which did not expressly require the licensee to buy from the licensor or prohibit him from buying elsewhere would in fact operate to deprive the licensee of the right to buy in the open market and the section is drafted in terms wide enough to nullify such a condition. It is not limited to conditions which in terms prohibit or restrict or require: it makes unlawful any condition the effect of which will be to prohibit or restrict the licensee from buying from others or to require him to buy from the licensor.

In trying to simpify my explanation I have stated the effect of subsection (1) (a) rather too widely. For some reason that is not apparent to me this subsection does not nullify a condition prohibiting or restricting the licensee from purchasing articles from any person other than the licensor: it only affects conditions the effect of which will be to prohibit or restrict the licensee from using such articles. No doubt the effect would generally be the same because generally the licensee would purchase with a view to using the articles but it is worth noting in connection with the present case that, if the licensee desired to buy for resale and not for use, a condition might have the effect of restricting his right to buy in the open market and yet be unobjectionable, provided that its effect was not to require him to buy from the licensor.

Before turning to the question at issue in the present case I should perhaps deal rather more fully with the phraseology of subsection (1) (a). I read it as affecting, first, any article or class of articles, whether patented or not, supplied by any person other than the licensor, and, secondly, any patented process owned by any person other than the licensor; and the patented articles or patented processes must, I think, be articles or processes protected by other patents than those under which the licence is granted. I have tried to explain the subsection using only the words "licensee" and "licensor": I do not think that it is necessary to elaborate my explanation to include all the words "purchaser, lessee or licensee" on the one hand and "seller, lessor, or licensor, or his nominees" on the other. And I must further note that it is admitted that section 38 does not apply to a condition the effect of which is merely to restrict the volume of the licensee's trade or the amount of unpatented raw material which he can use in his manufacture while leaving him free to buy the restricted amount where he chooses. Such a condition is left to the ordinary law of restraint of trade. The purpose and effect of section 38 is to prevent the licensor from limiting the right of the licensee to trade with others so as in effect to compel the licensee to trade with him.

I now turn back to the facts of the present case. I have already said that the terms of clause 5 show that the parties contemplated at least the possibility that TECO would want to buy contract material as well as make it themselves; and that after the expiry of the iron grade patents they might be able to buy iron grade material from other manufacturers than T.M.M.C. and their licensees. If then they wanted to buy iron grade material and if supplies from such outside manufacturers were available, they would not be prevented by clause 5 from buying from outsiders but there would be an inducement to buy from T.M.M.C. and not from outsiders because purchases from outsiders would come into the computation for paying compensation, whereas purchases from T.M.M.C. would not. It is said that the effect of this inducement would be to restrict TECO from buying material from persons other than T.M.M.C. or their other licensees, and if TECO were not buying to resell but were buying to use the material themselves, then the effect of this inducement would be to restrict TECO from using material bought from persons other than T.M.M.C. or their other licensees. That and that alone is said to bring clause 5 within the scope of section 38 and to make it null and void.

It will be seen that a number of contingencies were involved before this inducement could operate: TECO must want to buy iron grade material instead of making it and they must want to buy it for use and not for immediate resale; some independent manufacturer must have started making the material; and the material must be of suitable quality and must be available at a competitive price. If then the independent manufacturer's price were more than 30 per cent. below T.M.M.C.'s price the 30 per cent. compensation would not matter as it would still pay TECO to buy from the independent manufacturer, and if that manufacturer's price were above T.M.M.C.'s price the compensation would not matter as TECO would in any case buy from T.M.M.C. But if that manufacturer's price were below, but less than 30 per cent. below, T.M.M.C.'s price, then the liability to pay compensation would probably induce TECO to buy from T.M.M.C. whereas, in the absence of clause 5, they would probably have bought from the independent manufacturer. It is the possibility of that happening which, on the argument for TECO, makes it necessary to hold that the effect of clause 5 "will be" to restrict TECO from using iron grade material supplied by any person other than T.M.M.C. and their licensees.

There appear to me to be four key words in the subsection—"the effect of which will be (a) to prohibit or restrict . . . or "(b) to require . . . ." To my mind, the natural meaning of the subsection is that the effect of the condition must be to limit the right of the licensee to make a choice, and I do not think that these words are appropriate to cover a case such as the present where the licensee remains free to choose but the presence of the condition will in some circumstances create an inducement to choose to buy from the licensor. I take first the word "require" in subsection (1) (b): the effect of a particular condition may be to offer so great an advantage to the licensee if he buys from the licensor that it would be extremely foolish of him not to do that, but I do not think that in the ordinary use of language it could properly be said that the effect of such a condition will be to "require" the licensee to do it. I feel bound to hold that subsection (1) (b) only applies if the effect of the condition is that, whenever certain circumstances occur, the licensee, if he wishes to buy the article, is obliged to buy it from the licensor. Then I take the word "prohibit" in subsection (1) (a). It is true that the adjective "prohibitive" is frequently used when there is no legal prohibition, as in the phrase "a prohibitive price," and it may be that the verb "prohibit" is sometimes used in that way; but I would not expect the word "prohibit" to be used in this context to denote a state of affairs where the inducement not to buy the other person's goods is so great that no reasonable person would choose to do so, and I see nothing in the context pointing to such a meaning. I think that the meaning is that the effect of the condition will be such as to oblige the licensee in certain circumstances not to use the other person's goods. Then I come to the word "restrict." A person, though not prohibited, is restricted from using something if he is permitted to use it to a certain extent or subject to certain conditions but otherwise obliged not to use it, but I do not think that a person is properly said to be restricted from using something by a condition the effect of which is to offer him some inducement not to use it, or in some other way to influence his choice. To my mind, the more natural meaning here is restriction of the licensee's right to use the article and I am fortified in that opinion by two considerations.

If I am right in thinking that "require" and "prohibit" refer to legal obligations to buy or not to use, I see nothing to suggest that "restrict" is used in quite a different sense which has nothing to do with legal obligation but which relates to financial disadvantage. And, secondly, to say that the effect will be to restrict seems to me much more appropriate if restriction refers to restriction of the licensee's right to use than it would be if restriction refers to an inducement not to use. The legality of the condition has to be determined at the time when the licence is granted and if the terms of the conditions are such as to restrict the licensee's right to use an article in certain circumstances, then it can properly be said that its effect will be to restrict him from using it. But if, as in the present case, all that can be said is that the effect of the condition in some circumstances will be to offer a financial advantage, which may be considerable or may be small, if the licensee uses the licensor's goods, I do not see how it can be said that its effect will be to restrict the licensee from using other goods. The licensee may be influenced by this financial advantage or he may, perhaps for good reason, choose to disregard it: it is impossible to say in advance what the effect will be.

I recognize that to give this meaning to the section leaves room for evasion. I do not think that the primary purpose of clause 5 was to evade this section and the absence of any reported case in a period of 48 years since the section was enacted would seem to show that evasion of this kind has not been common. But undoubtedly it would often be possible to achieve a preference for the licensor by coupling the licence with a condition which, though not having the effect of limiting the licensee's freedom of choice, imposed some burden on the licensee if he bought certain articles in the open market. The question is whether it is legitimate to stretch the words of section 38 to make them apply to such a case. Section 38 (1) is a highly penal provision. It not only makes the whole condition void, although the circumstances in which it would have the effect of restricting the licensee may be very unlikely to occur, but by subsection (4) it also makes the existence of the condition a defence to an action for infringement of the patent. At best the section is ambiguous, and if a penal provision is ambiguous it ought not, in my view, to be construed in a wider sense than the ordinary meaning of its terms requires. This section appears to have been enacted to deal with a definite and limited abuse, and if Parliament failed to take the opportunity to deal with the whole matter sufficiently comprehensively, then the remedy was an amending Act of Parliament.

I would allow this appeal, and restore the order of Pearson J. The respondents must pay the costs in your Lordships' House and in the Court of Appeal.

LORD TUCKER. My Lords, the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal of the present respondents (hereinafter referred to as "TECO") on the ground that the appellants (hereinafter referred to as "T.M.M.C.") were not entitled to recover sums called "compensation" under clause 5 of a deed dated April 2, 1938, to which T.M.M.C. and TECO were parties, because they had not before action brought given a sufficient notice to terminate a period of suspension during the currency of which payment of compensation money could not be enforced by reason of the equitable principle enunciated in Hughes v. Metropolitan Railway Co.[16] It may be convenient at this stage to quote the language used by Lord Cairns L.C. in that case. He said[17]: "It was not argued at your Lordships' Bar, and it could not be "argued, that there was any right of a court of equity, or any "practice of a court of equity, to give relief in cases of this kind, "by way of mercy, or by way merely of saving property from "forfeiture, but it is the first principle upon which all courts of "equity proceed, that if parties who have entered into definite "and distinct terms involving certain legal results—certain "penalties or legal forfeiture—afterwards by their own act or "with their own consent enter upon a course of negotiation which "has the effect of leading one of the parties to suppose that the "strict rights arising under the contract will not be enforced, or "will be kept in suspense, or held in abeyance, the person who "otherwise might have enforced those rights will not be allowed "to enforce them where it would be inequitable having regard to "the dealings which have thus taken place between the parties."

The present is the second of two actions between these parties arising out of the deed of April 2, 1938, which contained the terms and conditions under which a licence under certain letters patent was granted by T.M.M.C. to TECO. In the first action (Tungsten Electric Co. Ld. v. Tool Metal Manufacturing Co. Ld.[18]) TECO claimed damages for fraud against T.M.M.C. They alleged that as a result of certain fraudulent misrepresentations they had paid sums for compensation under clause 5, and in paragraph 10 of their statement of claim they said: "Thereafter the plaintiffs "and defendants agreed that no sums should be payable in "respect of compensation after December 31, 1939, or alterna-"tively that the defendants would accept the amount of the "royalties in full satisfaction of all sums payable under the said "deeds as from December 31, 1939."

By their defence, T.M.M.C., in paragraph 8, denied the agreement alleged and alternatively relied on the Statute of Frauds and lack of consideration. In paragraph 17 of their counterclaim T.M.M.C. said: "In breach of their obligations "under clauses 3, 5, 7 and 8 of the deed of agreement the first "plaintiffs" (i.e., TECO) "have not since March 31, 1942, "rendered any accounts or paid the sums due for 'royalties' or "compensation. The defendants do not desire to enforce pay-"ment of compensation in respect of deliveries made after "December 31, 1939, but before the end of hostilities with "Germany."

[18] (1950) 69 R.P.C. 108.

In their claim for relief they asked for delivery of accounts in the form specified in clause 7 of the deed of all material sold or used since March 31, 1942, and for an inquiry into the sum due from TECO for compensation since June 1, 1945.

In their reply TECO admitted that they had not rendered accounts or paid any sum to the defendants (T.M.M.C.) but otherwise did not admit paragraph 17 of the counterclaim.

It is perhaps relevant to refer also to paragraph 3 of the reply in which, inter alia, TECO relied on part performance in answer to the plea of the Statute of Frauds. The particulars thereunder are as follows: " Subsequent to the date of the said oral agree- " ment the plaintiffs have not paid any compensation and have " received no complaint from the defendants in respect of such " non-payment. Subsequent to the said date the defendants have " never made any demand upon the plaintiffs for the payment of " compensation but have confined their requests for payment to " payments due in respect of royalty, and in particular the " plaintiffs will rely upon letters passing between the first named " plaintiffs and the defendants " (the dates of which are then set out).

It will be observed that nowhere in the pleadings is there any statement of facts relied upon as giving rise to the application of the principle in Hughes v. Metropolitan Railway Co.[19] whereby T.M.M.C. would be precluded from recovering compensation for a limited period or for a period which would continue until terminated by notice. Nor are any facts set out showing in what manner and to what extent TECO altered their position in reliance on any promise or forbearance on the part of T.M.M.C.

At the trial before Devlin J. no amendments were made to the pleadings with respect to these matters although other amendments were made. Devlin J. found against TECO both on the issue of fraud and with regard to the agreement alleged in paragraph 10 of the statement of claim. After referring to the extremely vague and unsatisfactory evidence of Mr. McLeod on behalf of TECO with regard to the alleged agreement he said[20]: " Accordingly, the plaintiff has been forced to rely mainly upon " the evidence of a Mr. Bateman, a witness called for the defen- " dants, and Mr. Bateman's evidence was in these terms, that " on an occasion in 1942 he heard Mr. Wickman say to Mr. " McLeod when this topic was being discussed words to this " effect—he cannot of course remember the precise words—' I " ' have already told you that you will not be charged compensa- " ' tion and you will get a new agreement in which we hope there " ' will not be a quota.' That evidence, taken in conjunction with " the evidence of the plaintiff, vague though it is, satisfies me " that some agreement of some sort was made. When I use the " word ' agreement ' I am using it now in a very broad sense; " I am not attempting to consider the question of whether it is " an agreement that is binding in law. But it is quite plain that " something was said by Mr. Wickman to these licensees, some- " thing which resulted in their not paying compensation, at any " rate for the duration of the war, and I have no doubt that the " sort of thing that was said—and indeed it is the best evidence " the plaintiff could produce—is the sort of thing that Mr. " Bateman heard said. That being so, what I have to consider " is whether those words support the plaintiff's contention. The " plaintiff says that an agreement was made which relieved him " from the obligation of ever paying compensation again, and " thus to that extent varied the deed into which he had entered " in 1938, by striking out from it the compensation provisions. " I think that that is putting far too great a weight on the words " used by Mr. Wickman as Mr. Bateman heard them. One has " to have regard to the circumstances in which they were used. " They were used in relation to a plan (if I may so put it) that " a new agreement was in course of preparation, and that in this " new agreement there was going to be some sort of redrawing " of quotas. It seems to me extremely unlikely, since the idea " was then in the minds of the parties that a new agreement was " to be drawn up, that Mr. Wickman should have intended or " should have been understood to be striking something for ever " out of the old agreement."

After stating that that view is borne out by some further considerations, to which he refers, he went on[21]: " He is less " likely to have taken either of those courses if he treated it as " being merely a temporary remission of the obligation to pay " compensation, a remission that was to last only during certain " circumstances, or only until it was recalled by the defendants." Finally he said[21]: " The result is that I reject the view that " there was any agreement that was intended to continue, which " was to vary the original agreement. The agreement that was " made was, in my view, one of two things. I do not think " there was anything in it which could be said to limit its opera- " tion for the duration of the war, although that may have been " the intention of the defendant company. But I think it fairly " emerges, from the language which Mr. Wickman was heard to " use, that it was intended to be a temporary modification pending " the new agreement. Accordingly I think that when the new " agreement was presented to Mr. McLeod and was rejected by " him the temporary relief which he had been granted came to " an end. I do not mean that it came at once to an end. It is " obvious that it would be a reasonable provision that he should " have some reasonable notice in order to make the necessary " alterations. Compensation is now claimed from June, 1945, " which is some nine months after the new agreement was " presented to him, and I think that gives him sufficient time."

I have set out these passages at some length as I consider it important to see precisely what the learned judge decided. He uses the word "agreement" more than once, but explains that he is using it in a very broad sense, and when his findings are examined it appears that what he found as a fact was that Mr. Wickman had made a promise not to charge compensation pending the new agreement and that he had carried out his promise by not claiming it. That and nothing more.

On appeal the Court of Appeal held, with regard to the counterclaim, that the findings of Devlin J. made the principle laid down by Lord Cairns L.C. in Hughes v. Metropolitan Railway Co.[22] and by Bowen L.J. in Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London & North Western Railway Co.[23] applicable, but they differed from his view that the temporary period of suspension ended with the presentation of the new draft agreement or when the negotiations broke down. Somervell L.J. said[24]: "I "think, against that background, the plaintiffs were entitled to "an express notice if the old terms were to be enforced again "according to their literal provisions. If you read the corre- "spondence the plaintiffs wrote objecting to the agreement, "there was ample opportunity for the defendants to say: 'Well, "'you know, if you do not like this agreement we shall withdraw "'our terms of not collecting the 30 per cent. and you will be "'back on the letter of the old pre-war contract.' They not "having done that, I do not think they can rely on anything "until we come to the counterclaim. That plainly indicates the "view that they were taking." Cohen L.J. agreed and said[25]: "Now, as my Lord has said, the direct evidence that the plaintiffs "acted on that invitation may be somewhat scanty, but I "respectfully agree with him in accepting the argument of Mr. "Beyfus that the matter is really one of res ipsa loquitur, and "I feel no doubt that the plaintiffs carried on their business "during the war on the basis that the compensation would not "be demanded until due intimation of the intention so to do "was given." This last sentence sums up the essence of the decision on this point so far as the present action is concerned. The defendants could not get the relief they claimed in their counterclaim because they had given no previous intimation of their intention to demand payment. That left open for decision in a subsequent action whether or not the counterclaim was a sufficient intimation.

My Lords, the parties to the present action are estopped from disputing the correctness of the decision of the Court of Appeal in the first action to the effect that circumstances existed which gave rise to the application of the equitable principle in Hughes v. Metropolitan Railway Co.[26] and that no sufficient intimation to terminate the period of suspension of payment had been given prior to the counterclaim in that action, but it would be wrong, in my opinion, if the view were to prevail that your Lordships in the present case are tacitly accepting the correctness of that decision. If it were permissible to go into these matters on the present appeal I should—with all respect—have desired to hear argument as to the application of this equitable doctrine to a case where the party who says he has been misled and altered his position has done so in reliance on an agreement which is found never to have been entered into and which is essentially different from the promise which is held to have been made and who gives no precise evidence with regard to the manner or extent of the alteration of his position. The sole question, therefore, before the courts on this issue in the present action has been throughout: Was the counterclaim in the first action a sufficient intimation to terminate the period of suspension which has been found to exist? Pearson J. held that it was. He said [27]: "The result of these "cases in my opinion is that, where the rule of equity applies, "the period of suspension comes to an end when it is in all the "circumstances equitable that it should come to an end, and "that is, normally at any rate, according to the circumstances, "either at or within a reasonable time after the termination of "the state of affairs which is the cause or basis of the suspension. "It is not necessary that the person whose legal rights have been "suspended should give a notice purporting to terminate the "suspension, although of course it would be fair and reasonable "and advisable for him to do so. In this case the state of affairs "which was the cause or basis of the suspension would have "been, according to the view taken in the court of first instance "in the former action, the continuance of the negotiations for "new licensing arrangements, but according to the view of the "Court of Appeal the state of affairs was, I think, the attitude "of T.M.M.C. in not requiring payment of the compensation "for the time being. When that attitude was reversed, a "reasonable time for resumption of compensation payments "began to run. The making of the counterclaim in the first "action clearly involved a reversal of the previous attitude, and "therefore it started running a reasonable time for resumption "of compensation payments."

In the Court of Appeal it was argued on behalf of TECO that the counterclaim did not purport to determine any existing agreement and that in any event it was deficient in that it specified no date for the termination. These submissions were largely based upon a judgment of the Privy Council in the case of Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. The King,[28] which was cited for the first time in the Court of Appeal. It was a decision relating to a licence to erect certain telegraph poles and wires on property belonging to the Crown in Canada. I shall return to examine this case at a later stage. Both these submissions prevailed and the judgment of Pearson J. was reversed. Hence the present appeal.

My Lords, it is difficult to keep these two submissions entirely separate as they both involve consideration of what is necessary to terminate a period of suspension and restore the parties to their previous position. It has been said more than once that every case involving the application of this equitable doctrine must depend upon its own particular circumstances. It is, of course, clear, as Pearson J. pointed out, that there are some cases where the period of suspension clearly terminates on the happening of a certain event or the cessation of a previously existing state of affairs or on the lapse of a reasonable period thereafter. In such cases no intimation or notice of any kind may be necessary. But in other cases where there is nothing to fix the end of the period which may be dependent upon the will of the person who has given or made the concession, equity will no doubt require some notice or intimation together with a reasonable period for readjustment before the grantor is allowed to enforce his strict rights. No authority has been cited which binds your Lordships to hold that in all such cases the notice must take any particular form or specify a date for the termination of the suspensory period. This is not surprising having regard to the infinite variety of circumstances which may give rise to this principle which was stated in broad terms and must now be regarded as of general application. It should, I think, be applied with great caution to purely creditor and debtor relationships which involve no question of forfeiture or cancellation, and it would be unfortunate if the law were to introduce into this field technical requirements with regard to notice and the like which might tend to penalise or discourage the making of reasonable concessions.

My Lords, in the present case I can find nothing which persuades me that equity could require anything further than that which is contained in the counterclaim in the first action. It is true that it does not purport to be putting an end to an existing "agreement" for a temporary suspension. No such agreement had been pleaded. It does, however, contain a clear intimation of a reversal by T.M.M.C. of their previous attitude with regard to the payment of compensation and of their intention to enforce compliance with clause 5 of the agreement and for an account thereunder.

It does not, I think, lie in the mouth of TECO, who had consistently failed to comply with their obligations to render the returns required by the deed, now to complain that the notice should have specified a named future date upon which the suspensory period was to come to an end.

I turn now to the case of Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. The King,[28] which was so much relied upon by Romer L.J. in the Court of Appeal. It dealt with the withdrawal of a licence to erect telegraph poles. Licence cases are sometimes somewhat similar to the present class of case, but I do not consider that they are safe guides to the solution of the application of the equitable principle with which alone your Lordships are now concerned. Even licence cases are, however, largely dependent upon their special facts, as was pointed out by Lord Russell of Killowen in delivering the judgment of the Board in the Canadian Pacific case.[29] Furthermore, in that case it was expressly stated that it was not decided on equitable grounds. Lord Russell says[30]: "Upon the facts of the present case their Lordships can "find no foundation for the application of any equitable doctrine "in favour of the appellant. There was no mistaken belief by "the appellant as to the ownership of or the rights over the "Intercolonial property, still less was there any such mistaken "belief, which was known to the Crown. There was no conduct "on the part of the Crown which induced the appellant to build "in the belief that rights in perpetuity would be acquired. There "was nothing upon which to ground any estoppel. The facts are "all the other way." There was, moreover, one feature in that case which is alone sufficient to explain the decision requiring the Crown to specify a date in its notice, namely, that a letter had been written indicating that unless the poles were removed at once it would be necessary for the Crown to fix a date for their removal. No such date was ever fixed or notified to the company before the proceedings were commenced. In similar circumstances it might well be held inequitable to allow T.M.M.C. to enforce clause 5 of the deed by issuing a writ without first giving notice specifying a date. I do not, however, think it is profitable to examine the circumstances in which notices may have been required in other cases or the precise form of such notices unless some principle of general application is to be found therein. I can find no such general principle in the Canadian Pacific case[31] nor in any other of the cases referred to in argument on this appeal.

I should, perhaps, add that those cases where a licence has been given contractually, in my view, afford no assistance since in such cases the requirements with regard to notice must necessarily be dependent upon the construction of the contract by virtue of which the licence was obtained. I have not therefore thought it necessary to refer to the views expressed on that subject by the noble Lords who took part in Winter Garden Theatre (London) Ld. v. Millennium Productions Ld.[32]

Where I respectfully differ from the views expressed by Romer L.J. in the Court of Appeal in the present case is that I am unable to obtain the same help from the Canadian Pacific case,[33] and I feel that he has laid undue emphasis on the word "agreement" as constituting the basis for the application of the equitable doctrine and consequently imposing on T.M.M.C. steps which would normally be required from a party to a contract who desires to determine a contractual relationship.

In my view, the counterclaim of March 26, 1946, followed by a period of nine months to January 1, 1947, from which date compensation in the present action is claimed, is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of equity and entitle T.M.M.C. to recover compensation under clause 5 of the deed as from the latter date. In the somewhat peculiar circumstances of the present case any other result would, I think, be highly inequitable.

My Lords, with regard to the other defences relied on by TECO I agree that those of restraint of trade and penalty fail. As to the remaining defence of section 38 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, which involves a question of construction which, I confess has caused me considerable difficulty, I have reached the conclusion, for the reasons which have been stated by my noble and learned friend, Lord Oaksey, that the courts below were right in holding that this defence did not avail the respondents in the present case.

In the result, therefore, I would allow the appeal.

LORD COHEN. My Lords, the dispute between the parties is as to the right of the appellants to what was called compensation and arose out of two deeds, one a deed of agreement and the other a licence, both executed on April 2, 1938, and made between the appellants (to whom I shall refer hereafter as "T.M.M.C.") of the first part, the respondents (to whom I shall refer hereafter as "TECO") of the second part, and Tungsten Industrial Products Ld. (therein defined as "Industrial") of the third part. Industrial were the distributors of the products of TECO and played no part in the disputes with which your Lordships are concerned.

These deeds have given rise to two actions between the parties. The facts leading to the first action were carefully and elaborately marshalled in the judgment of Devlin J. therein and the events which subsequently occurred are stated with sufficiency and accuracy in the judgment of Pearson J. whose order, dated November 16, 1953, directing the payment by TECO to T.M.M.C. of the sum of £84,050 4s. 4d. with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. from September 11, 1950, to the date of judgment, was reversed by the Court of Appeal. It is from that order that the appeal now before your Lordships has been brought. Like Romer L.J. in the Court of Appeal, I shall confine myself to stating as briefly as I can the matters which appear to me to be relevant to the points argued before your Lordships.

In 1931 T.M.M.C. was incorporated in England by Krupps of Essen, the well-known German firm, for the purpose of developing as their subsidiary certain patents which Krupps had acquired in relation to Tungsten carbide. Under these patents T.M.M.C. manufactured articles which were, in the main, machine tool tips, and they marketed them under the name of "Wimet." In or about 1934 T.M.M.C. brought proceedings against the British Thomson-Houston Co. Ld. (hereinafter referred to as "B.T.H.") for infringement of the said patents, but those proceedings were settled upon the terms of an agreement made on January 1, 1936, under which B.T.H. acknowledged the validity of T.M.M.C.'s patents and were granted an exclusive licence to manufacture under such patents in territory which included the United Kingdom. One result of this agreement was that T.M.M.C. could only grant subsequent licences with the consent of B.T.H. but they were entitled to and did continue to manufacture themselves under the patents.

Some time later the activities of TECO came to the notice of T.M.M.C., who took the view that TECO were infringing T.M.M.C.'s patents. Negotiations took place and ultimately, with the consent of B.T.H., heads of agreement were signed on June 1, 1937, under which TECO received a licence under the said patents. I need not refer to the terms of the heads of agreement as they were superseded by the two deeds of April 2, 1938, which in substance incorporated the terms of the heads of agreement.

The licence was a non-exclusive licence under the patents to import, make, use, and, subject as thereinafter mentioned, to sell contract material as therein defined in Territory A as therein defined, and to sell contract material in and for export to Territory B as therein defined, upon and subject to the conditions therein and in the deed of even date contained. The licence was to commence from June 29, 1937, and to continue until September 18, 1947, and thereafter until determined by either T.M.M.C. or TECO on six months' notice in writing. Contract material was defined as: "Hard metal alloys made in accordance with the "inventions the subjects of the said patents or any of them whether made before or after the expiry of such patent or patents." The hard metal alloys mentioned in the said definition fell into two classes, "iron grade" and "steel grade." The last of the patents relating to iron grade expired in December, 1941. Broadly speaking, Territory A consisted of the United Kingdom and Territory B included the British Commonwealth and Empire but not Canada.

The agreement of even date with the licence contained a recital that TECO had made and sold hard metal alloys of a composition and by a process which fell within one of the said patents. Under clause 2 T.M.M.C. waived all claims against TECO and Industrial and TECO's customers in respect of any infringement of the patents.

Under clause 3 TECO had to pay to T.M.M.C. a royalty of 10 per cent. on the net value of all contract material sold or used by TECO and/or Industrial (other than contract material supplied to TECO by the Grantors or any licensees under the said patents) during the continuance of the said licence and made in accordance with one or more of the said patents (other than or in addition to letters patent No. 262,723) which should be in force at the date of sale or use thereof by TECO and/or Industrial, such royalty being payable in the case of contract material sold by TECO to Industrial only upon its use or sale by Industrial.

Clause 4 contained price regulation provisions which I need not set out in detail but which were said to throw light on the question of unlawful restraint of trade.

Clause 5 provided for the payment of what was called "compensation" and so far as material is in the following terms:— "If in any month during the continuance of the said Licence the "aggregate quantity of contract material sold or used by TECO "and Industrial (other than contract material supplied to TECO "by the grantors or any licensees under the said patents) shall "exceed a quota of fifty kilograms (50 Kg.) TECO shall whether "all or any of such material shall be subject to royalty hereunder "or not pay to the grantors compensation equal to thirty per cent. "(30%) of the sum which represents the excess net value." The clause then proceeded to define "excess net value."

Clause 7 provided for monthly returns of contract material sold or used by TECO and Industrial in the preceding month, and clause 8 provided for the monthly payment of royalty and compensation.

Clause 12 gave TECO certain rights in respect to improvements upon or modifications of the inventions the subject of the said patents.

I need not refer to any other provision of the deed of agreement.

The effect of clause 5 having regard to the division into iron grades and steel grades and to the dates of the relevant patents is accurately summarized by Pearson J. as follows[34]: "The "effect of the compensation provisions over the period of the "licence can be worked out in this way: June 1, 1937, to March, "1939: Both the iron grades and the steel grades are protected by "patents, and bear royalty, and also bear compensation on the "excess over the quota. For the period March, 1939, to "December, 1941, the iron grades are still protected by the "patent No. 4 in the schedule, they do not bear royalty, but they "bear compensation on the excess over the quota. The steel "grades are still protected by patents and still bear royalty and "compensation on the excess over the quota. In the third period, "December, 1941 to July, 1947, the iron grades are not protected "by any patent (unless possibly there might be some later patents "under clause 12), they do not bear royalty, but they do bear "compensation on the excess over the quota. The steel grades "are protected by patents, or at least one patent, and bear "royalty and bear compensation on the excess over the quota. "Then there is the fourth short period, July to September, 1947, "and both the iron grades and the steel grades are unprotected by

"patents (unless conceivably there might be some later patents "under clause 12) and they do not bear royalty but they do bear "compensation on the excess over quota."

It is convenient here to observe that between June 1, 1937, the date of the heads of agreement, and April 2, 1938, the output of TECO was in every month in excess of 50 kilograms and in March, 1938, amounted to 168 kilograms.

At the time of the execution of the agreements Mr. McLeod, who was the managing director of TECO raised no objection to the compensation provisions of the agreement, but finding that he could not pass the burden thereof on to his customers he was, even before the outbreak of war, protesting against them. Shortly before the outbreak of war the control of T.M.M.C. had passed from German to British hands and Mr. McLeod, who had been making his complaints to a Dr. Louis, an agent of Krupps, renewed them to Mr. Wickman, who was connected with the persons then in control of T.M.M.C. TECO, however, continued to make returns and to pay royalty and compensation down to the outbreak of war. TECO then defaulted, but in May, 1940, paid a sum in satisfaction of royalty and compensation due down to December 31, 1939. TECO continued to make returns and pay royalties, but not compensation, up to March 31, 1942. After that date returns were made up to some date which I am unable to specify in 1943, but nothing further was paid for royalty or compensation prior to the commencement of the first action.

Discussions appear to have gone on between Mr. McLeod for TECO and Mr. Wickman or other representatives of T.M.M.C. in regard to compensation. It seems clear that prior to the commencement of the first action T.M.M.C. did not make any claim for compensation in respect of any period after December 31, 1939, and in the first action TECO alleged a binding agreement for cancellation of the obligation to pay such compensation. The evidence as to what transpired is very sketchy. It is conveniently summarized by Devlin J. in his judgment in the first action as follows[35]: "The plaintiff has set up by way of defence "to that that there was an agreement between him and Mr. "Wickman, made on behalf of their respective companies, that "compensation should be washed out altogether. The evidence "which he has given about it is so vague that Mr. Beyfus has "said that if the matter was left there he could hardly rely upon "it. Mr. McLeod first stated that it was said by Mr. Wickman "on February 19, 1941, but Mr. Wickman was not in the "country, he was in America on February 19, 1941. Mr. "McLeod then said that though he might have been mistaken "about the date, at any rate it was said by Mr. Wickman on "some occasion in 1943. All he could remember about it was "that Mr. Wickman had said that compensation was washed "out and all that was wanted was a flat 10 per cent. royalty.

"He had no recollection really of the circumstances in which it "was said, and he really accepted that he had no real recollec- "tion of the interview at all. Accordingly, the plaintiff has been "forced to rely mainly upon the evidence of a Mr. Bateman, "a witness called for the defendants, and Mr. Bateman's "evidence was in these terms, that on an occasion in 1942 he "heard Mr. Wickman say to Mr. McLeod when this topic was "being discussed words to this effect—he cannot of course "remember the precise words—'I have already told you that "'you will not be charged compensation and you will get a new "'agreement in which we hope there will not be a quota.' That "evidence, taken in conjunction with the evidence of the plaintiff, "vague though it is, satisfies me that some agreement of some "sort was made. When I use the word 'agreement' I am using "it now in a very broad sense; I am not attempting to consider "the question of whether it is an agreement that is binding in "law. But it is quite plain that something was said by Mr. "Wickman to these licensees, something which resulted in their "not paying compensation, at any rate for the duration of the "war, and I have no doubt that the sort of thing that was said— "and indeed it is the best evidence the plaintiff could produce— "is the sort of thing that Mr. Bateman heard said."

On September 21, 1944, T.M.M.C. submitted to TECO the draft of the proposed new agreement. It did not abolish quotas but it provided for the distribution of any compensation payable by any of the licensees who exceeded their quotas amongst those licensees who failed to achieve their quota.

TECO did not accept the proposed new agreement and on January 17, 1945, issued the writ in the first action claiming damages for fraud or alternatively breach of warranty and damages for breaches of the contracts contained in the two deeds of April 2, 1938. In formulating their claim for damages in paragraph 6 of the statement of claim they alleged that they had paid as compensation £19,521 12s. 7d. and that thereafter it had been agreed that no sums should be payable in respect of compensation after December 31, 1939. By paragraph 10 of their defence T.M.M.C. denied any such agreement and in the alternative relied on the Statute of Frauds. In the further alternative they alleged that if (which was denied) any such agreement was made there was no consideration for it. By their counterclaim they alleged breaches by TECO of their obligation to pay royalties and compensation but stated that they did not desire to enforce payment of compensation in respect of deliveries after December 31, 1939, but before the termination of hostilities.

It is to be observed that neither in their statement of claim nor in their reply did TECO allege any equitable bar to the enforcement of the relief claimed by T.M.M.C. in their counterclaim though it must have been clear to TECO that T.M.M.C. were claiming to be entitled as from the termination of hostilities to enforce their strict legal rights under the two deeds of April 2, 1938.

On January 20, 1950, Devlin J. dismissed the plaintiffs' claim except in respect of a minor breach of the agreement of April 2, 1938, for which he awarded nominal damages of 40s. That part of his decision is irrelevant to the matter now before your Lordships. As regards the counterclaim, he negatived the assistance of any agreement binding in law for the final termination of the payment of compensation. I have already read one passage of his judgment dealing with this point. He concluded his judgment on this point of the case by saying[36]: "The result is that I "reject the view that there was any agreement that was intended "to continue, which was to vary the original agreement. The "agreement that was made was, in my view, one of two things. "I do not think there was anything in it which could be said to "limit its operation for the duration of the war, although that "may have been the intention of the defendant company. But "I think it fairly emerges, from the language which Mr. Wick-"man was heard to use, that it was intended to be a temporary "modification pending the new agreement. Accordingly I think "that when the new agreement was presented to Mr. McLeod "and was rejected by him the temporary relief which he had "been granted came to an end. I do not mean that it came at "once to an end. It is obvious that it would be a reasonable "provision that he should have some reasonable notice in order "to make the necessary alterations. Compensation is now "claimed from June, 1945, which is some nine months after the "new agreement was presented to him, and I think that gives "him sufficient time. If I should be wrong about that view then "I should hold that it was a temporary arrangement which was "made subject to the right of the defendant company to ter-"minate by giving reasonable notice. I should regard the "presentation of a new agreement in such circumstances as "amounting to a reasonable notice. I do not think that in this "type of case it is necessary that the notice should be express. "The rule that protects a party in circumstances such as these "is a broad rule of equity and justice. It is not thought right "that a man who has indicated that he is not going to insist "upon his strict rights, as a result of which the other party has "altered his position, should be able to turn round at a minute's "notice and insist upon his rights, however inconvenient it may "be to the party who thought he was temporarily relieved. "Equity requires that he should give reasonable notice that he "is going to resume his strict rights. But all that is necessary "to comply with that broad rule of equity is that the notice "should be such as to put an ordinary person clearly in mind that "the other party is going to resume his strict rights. I think it "is plain that when one man is served with a draft of a new

" agreement which shows that the compensation provisions are " going to be set in force again, he should understand from that " that he must either accept the new agreement or return to the " strict position under the old agreement." No such arrangement had been pleaded and had the judge thought that it afforded any defence to the counterclaim he would no doubt have required TECO to amend their reply, but on the view he formed of the matter any equitable bar to the relief claimed by T.M.M.C. in their counterclaim had been removed before the counterclaim was delivered. In the result T.M.M.C. succeeded on their counterclaim.

TECO appealed to the Court of Appeal, who dismissed the appeal so far as their claim in the action was concerned, but they allowed it as far as that part of the counterclaim was concerned which dealt with compensation. The court, which consisted of Somervell L.J., Singleton L.J. and myself, took a different view from that formed by Devlin J. as to the result in equity of the conversation between Mr. McLeod and Mr. Wickman and of the conduct of T.M.M.C. in not claiming compensation after December 31, 1939, at any time prior to the delivery of the counterclaim. Romer L.J. in the present action has cited relevant passages from the judgments of Somervell L.J. and myself in the first action, and I will content myself with three short citations. The first from the judgment of Somervell L.J.[37]: " I think, against that " background, the plaintiffs were entitled to an express notice if " the old terms were to be enforced again according to their " literal provisions. If you read the correspondence the plaintiffs " wrote objecting to the agreement, there was ample opportunity " for the defendants to say: ' Well, you know, if you do not " ' like this agreement we shall withdraw our terms of not collect- " ' ing the 30 per cent. and you will be back on the letter of the " ' old pre-war contract.' They not having done that, I do not " think they can rely on anything until we come to the counter- " claim. That plainly indicates the view that they were taking. " I think the plaintiffs would be entitled to a reasonable time " after that." I say[38]: " I think that there was the plainest " possible indication by the defendants that they did not intend " for the time being to claim compensation, and that they con- " veyed that intimation in terms which amounted to an invitation " to the plaintiffs to continue to conduct their business on the " basis that until something was done, until notice was given, no " royalty would be demanded. Now, as my Lord has said, the " direct evidence that the plaintiffs acted on that invitation may " be somewhat scanty, but I respectfully agree with him in " accepting the argument of Mr. Beyfus that the matter is really " one of res ipsa loquitur, and I feel no doubt that the plaintiffs " carried on their business during the war on the basis that the " compensation would not be demanded until due intimation of " the intention so to do was given." Later I say: " I think the " plaintiffs were entitled . . . to receive notice if the defendants " were proposing to enforce a right to compensation which had " been in suspense for five years or thereabouts. So far as I can " see, nothing equivalent to such notice was given before, as I " have said, the counterclaim was delivered, and in my opinion, " therefore, compensation did not become payable until a reason- " able time after delivery of the counterclaim."

It is, I think, plain from these judgments that at that time the Court of Appeal was of opinion that the counterclaim was a sufficient notice, and that after the lapse of a reasonable time to enable TECO to make the necessary adjustments in the conduct of their business compensation would be payable without the necessity for further action by T.M.M.C. But our observations on that point must be regard as obiter since once we came to the conclusion that (1) some positive action by TECO determining the temporary arrangement was required, and that a reasonable time must be allowed to enable TECO to adjust their position after that action had been taken before T.M.M.C. could enforce their strict legal rights, and (2) as no such positive action had been taken before the delivery of the counterclaim, the counterclaim so far as compensation was claimed must necessarily fail.

Reaching the conclusion that we did we should, I think, have required TECO to amend their reply so as to raise the equitable defence which they had successfully advanced in their arguments. Unfortunately we did not so do.

In the course of his judgment Somervell L.J. had dropped the hint that nine months might be a reasonable time after which compensation would be payable, and on September 11, 1950, T.M.M.C. issued the writ in the present action claiming compensation from January 1, 1947. By paragraph 4 of their defence TECO pleaded as follows: " In or about March, 1943, and on " an occasion prior thereto which the defendants cannot now " more particularly specify, the plaintiffs agreed to forgo the " payment of compensation by the defendants until a reasonable " time should elapse after notice given by the plaintiffs to the " defendants to resume such payment. No such notice has been " given to the defendants. Alternatively, if such notice has been " given to the defendants, a reasonable time thereafter had not " elapsed by January 1, 1947, or by any date during the currency " of the 1938 deeds." They do not now allege that if the counterclaim was a sufficient notice, the action was brought prematurely.

In paragraphs 6 and 7 of the defence they allege in the alternative that clause 5 of the agreement of April 2, 1938, was invalid either (a) as being an unreasonable and unnecessary restraint of TECO's trade, or (b) as being a penalty not recoverable at law, or (c) as offending against section 38 (1) (a) of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907.

On November 16, 1953, Pearson J. rejected all these defences and gave the judgment for T.M.M.C., the effect of which I have already indicated. He dealt first with the allegation of unreasonable restraint of trade and rejected it on the ground that the compensation clause did not contain any restraint of trade, but that even if it did, the provisions of the agreement and licence as a whole were reasonable both as between the parties and in relation to the public interest. He rejected the penalty argument because, as he found, no penalty was involved. He also held that clause 5 did not infringe section 38 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907. I shall return to this subject later.

On the question of the sufficiency of the notice to determine the temporary arrangement, he summarised his conclusion as follows[39]: "The result of these cases [Hughes v. Metropolitan "Railway Co.[40]; Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London & "North Western Railway Co.[41]; Central London Property Trust "Ld. v. High Trees House Ld.[42]] in my opinion is that, where "the rule of equity applies, the period of suspension comes to an "end when it is in all the circumstances equitable that it should "come to an end, and that is, normally at any rate, according "to the circumstances, either at or within a reasonble time after "the termination of the state of affairs which is the cause or "basis of the suspension. It is not necessary that the person "whose legal rights have been suspended should give a notice "purporting to terminate the suspension, although of course it "would be fair and reasonable and advisable for him to do so. "In this case the state of affairs which was the cause or basis of "the suspension would have been, according to the view taken "in the court of first instance in the former action, the continu-"ance of the negotiations for new licensing arrangements, but "according to the view of the Court of Appeal the state of affairs "was, I think, the attitude of T.M.M.C. in not requiring payment "of the compensation for the time being. When that attitude "was reversed, a reasonable time for resumption of compensation "payments began to run. The making of the counterclaim in the "first action clearly involved a reversal of the previous attitude, "and therefore it started running a reasonable time for resumption "of compensation payments."

TECO appealed to the Court of Appeal, who allowed the appeal. Romer L.J., in whose judgment Somervell L.J. and Birkett L.J. concurred, agreed with Pearson J. on the issues of unreasonable restraint of trade and penalty, and agreed provisionally with his conclusion on the issue arising under section 38 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, but stated that he did not necessarily agree with all the reasoning upon which that conclusion was founded. On the question of the issue as to the sufficiency of the notice to terminate the temporary arrangement for suspension of compensation payment the Court of Appeal differed from Pearson J. and, accordingly, reversed his order and entered judgment for TECO with costs.

TOOL METAL MANUFACTURING CO. LD. v. TUNGSTEN ELECTRIC CO. LD.
Lord Cohen.

My Lords, Romer L.J. based his conclusion on the notice point mainly on the decision of the Privy Council in Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. The King.[43] He said[44]: "In my opinion, "although in many cases the equity, to which Hughes v. Metro-"politan Railway Co.[45] gave recognition and high authority, is "satisfied by merely conforming to the terms in which Lord "Cairns (and subsequently Bowen L.J.) formulated it, there are "other cases where justice requires that the resumption of legal "rights which have been suspended for a period must be preceded "by a notification to the other party concerned specifying a fixed "period of grace during which that party can put his house in "order; and that in such cases a notification such as that will "be a condition precedent to the valid reassumption of the "owner's legal rights. Such a case was Canadian Pacific Rail-"way Co. v. The King."[46]

I must, therefore, examine closely what were the facts and what was the reason for the decision in the case last cited. The Canadian Pacific Railway had erected poles carrying telegraph wires on the roadway of a Canadian Government railway at various times ranging from 1888 to 1911. There were some negotiations between the parties as to parts of the telegraph line but at no time was any written agreement ever concluded. As to what was called the "main telegraph line" there was correspondence in the course of which a representative of the Department of Justice of Canada wrote on March 20, 1924, withdrawing offers which had been made for settling the dispute between the parties and saying that wires and poles must be removed. The letter ended: "No time has been fixed within "which you must effect this removal, but unless you agree to "act at once in the matter, a date will be fixed by the Depart-"ment of Railways and Canals." No such date was fixed nor were the wires and poles ever removed from any section of the telegraph line. Accordingly, in 1926, the Crown commenced proceedings against the Canadian Pacific Railway alleging trespass and claiming damages. The trial judge found that as to the whole line the telegraph poles were on the Crown land by the leave and licence of the Crown, but that the licence was not irrevocable. He gave leave to apply for further directions. On appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada that court found that the Canadian Pacific Railway were trespassers except as to a small section as to which they had an irrevocable licence. The Privy Council agreed with the trial judge that as to the whole line the Canadian Pacific Railway had a revocable licence, and held that it had not been determined before the commencement of the proceedings. The Board then proceeded to consider how that revocable licence could be determined. Upon the facts of the case their Lordships were unable to find any foundation for the application of any equitable doctrine in favour of the Canadian Pacific Railway nor were they able to see anything upon which to found an estoppel.[47] They went on to say[48]: "Whether any and what restrictions "exist on the power of a licensor to determine a revocable licence "must, their Lordships think, depend upon the circumstances "of each case. The general proposition would appear to be that a "licensee whose licence is revocable is entitled to reasonable "notice of revocation." They then proceeded to examine the facts of the particular case and came to the conclusion that it was "peculiarly a case in which grave injustice might ensue if the "Crown were at liberty by the mere initiation of legal pro-"ceedings to determine summarily the rights of the appellant, "and turn the appellant's occupancy into trespass. For the "appellant is not the only one concerned; the telegraph line is "part of a system in the existence and continuance of which the "public has a very considerable interest." They accordingly concluded that the case was one in which the licence could only be effectively ended after notice had been served upon the Canadian Pacific Railway to determine the licence on such a specified date in the future as would give the Canadian Pacific Railway an interval of time between the service of the notice and the specified date sufficient not only to allow the removal of the poles and wires but also to make arrangements for the continuance of the telegraph line on another site.

My Lords, I have, I think, sufficiently stated the circumstances to indicate the very considerable differences between this case and the case now before your Lordships. In the Canadian Pacific Railway case[49] the Crown had, at any rate, as regards one section, expressly stated they would name a date by which the poles and wires must be removed. Moreover, a paramount public interest was involved. In these circumstances I cannot see that the facts are so analogous that the decision can be safely taken as a sure guide in the present case.

The Canadian Pacific Railway case[49] was considered by the Court of Appeal in Minister of Health v. Bellotti,[50] where Lord Greene M.R. said that the only proposition of general application which he could extract from the Canadian Pacific Railway case[51] was to be found in the paragraph I have already cited, which reads: "Whether any and what restrictions exist on the power "of a licensor to determine a revocable licence must, their "Lordships think, depend upon the circumstances of each case." With that observation of the then Master of the Rolls I respectfully agree.

Before I turn to the circumstances of the present case, I must observe that the Canadian Pacific Railway case[52] was not determined on equitable principles. Indeed, Lord Russell of Killowen, in delivering the judgment of the Board, expressly pointed out that no equitable doctrine was involved. It is no doubt true, as Mr. Beyfus argued, that any condition or restriction affecting the power to determine a revocable licence which the law would imply would be one which equity would regard as reasonable, but before reaching a conclusion on the matter it seems desirable to look at the two cases relied upon by the Court of Appeal in the first action as laying down the principles applicable to the case.

In Hughes v. Metropolitan Railway Co.[53] the respondents sought to recover possession of premises for breach of a lessee's covenant to repair within six months after notice calling upon him to do so. That notice had been given on October 22, 1874, but in December negotiations started between the parties for the purchase by the appellant of the respondents' interest. These did not break down until December 31, 1874. On April 28, 1875, the writ in the action was issued. The repairs were completed some time in June. The question arose whether, having regard to the negotiations, they had been completed within due time. It was held in this House that the negotiations had the effect of suspending the notice and that the suspension did not cease to operate until December 31, 1874. In the course of his judgment Lord Cairns stated the equitable principle involved in these words[54]: "It was not argued at your Lordships' Bar, and it could not be "argued, that there was any right of a court of equity, or any "practice of a court of equity, to give relief in cases of this "kind, by way of mercy, or by way merely of saving property "from forfeiture, but it is the first principle upon which all "courts of equity proceed, that if parties who have entered into "definite and distinct terms involving certain legal results— "certain penalties or legal forfeiture—afterwards by their own "act or with their own consent enter upon a course of negotiation "which has the effect of leading one of the parties to suppose "that the strict rights arising under the contract will not be "enforced, or will be kept in suspense, or held in abeyance, the "person who otherwise might have enforced those rights will not "be allowed to enforce them where it would be inequitable having "regard to the dealings which have thus taken place between the "parties."

In Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London & North Western Railway Co.[55] a similar question arose, and the Court of Appeal applied the principle as laid down by Lord Cairns in the passage I have quoted. After citing it, Bowen L.J. pointed out that it had nothing to do with forfeiture, and went on[56]: "It seems to me to amount to this, that if persons who have "contractual rights against others induce by their conduct those "against whom they have such rights to believe that such rights

[56] Ibid. 286.

" will either not be enforced or will be kept in suspense or abey-
" ance for some particular time, those persons will not be allowed
" by a court of equity to enforce the rights until such time has " elapsed, without at all events placing the parties in the same " position as they were before. That is the principle to be applied.
" I will not say it is not a principle that was recognised by " courts of law as well as of equity. It is not necessary to " consider how far it was always a principle of common law."
Though he does not, in terms, say so, it is implicit in what he says that to make the principle applicable the party setting up the doctrine must show that he has acted on the belief induced by the other party, but this factor is of no importance in the instant case as it has been decided in the first action that the principle is applicable. Does this principle afford a defence to the claim in the present action?

I have already stated the findings of the Court of Appeal in the first action as to the circumstances which brought the equity into operation. These findings necessarily involve that in the present case equity required T.M.M.C. to give some form of notice to TECO before compensation would become payable. But it has never been decided that in every case notice should be given before a temporary concession ceases to operate. It might, for instance, cease automatically on the occurrence of a particular event. Still less has any case decided that where notice is necessary it must take a particular form.

Romer L.J. seems to have taken the view that the counterclaim could not be a notice because you cannot terminate an agreement by repudiating it. With all respect, the fallacy of this argument consists in treating the arrangement found to exist by the Court of Appeal in the first action as an agreement binding in law. It was not an agreement, it was a voluntary concession by T.M.M.C. which, for reasons of equity, the court held T.M.M.C. could not cease to allow without plain intimation to TECO of their intention so to do. The counterclaim seems to me a plain intimation of such change of intention operating as from June 1, 1945, and for the future. None the less, the intimation would fall short of what was required if it was the duty of T.M.M.C. to specify in the intimation the reasonable time which they would allow after receipt of the intimation to enable TECO to readjust their business to the altered conditions. I see no reason why equity should impose this burden on T.M.M.C. Having regard to the nature of the concession—a mere cessation of money payments—and to the fact that TECO were the only persons in a position to judge what time would reasonably be required to make such adjustments as were necessary, I think that TECO were sufficiently protected by the fact that if T.M.M.C. commenced proceedings before what the court should determine to be a reasonable time, the action would fail. I agree, therefore, in substance with Pearson J. on this part of the case.

Lord Cohen.

On the questions of unreasonable restraint of trade and penalty I find myself in complete agreement with Romer L.J. and I do not desire to add anything to the reasons given by him and by your Lordships for rejecting these defences.

I turn therefore to the question whether clause 5 of the agreement offends against section 38 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907. I had written some lengthy observations on this question, but since doing so I have had the opportunity of reading in print the observations of my noble and learned friend, Lord Oaksey. I find myself so completely in agreement with him that I will add no reasons of my own for rejecting this defence.

For the reasons I have given I would allow the appeal and restore the order of Pearson J.

Bankruptcy—Appeal—Certificate of misfortune—Refusal—Whether appeal against refusal to be inter partes—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 32 (2) (b)—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 59), s. 26 (4).

A bankrupt appealed ex parte against the refusal of the registrar to grant him a certificate of misfortune when ordering that he should be granted a discharge after an interval of two years. The order of discharge recited that the bankrupt had been guilty of forgery and of misconduct in company dealings:—

Held, that the facts found by the registrar showed that the bankruptcy was not caused by misfortune without any misconduct by the bankrupt and the certificate was, therefore, rightly refused.

Per curiam. An application for a certificate of misfortune, pursuant to section 32 (2) (b) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is not, properly speaking, ex parte. Where, as in the present case, it is made on the occasion of the hearing of the application for discharge, it is not necessary to make a separate substantive application for such a certificate, but if the application is refused and the applicant wishes to appeal, notice of appeal inter partes must be given and the procedure for appeals inter partes must be observed.

APPEAL from a decision of Mr. Registrar Cunliffe.

Alfred Arthur Joyce, formerly a solicitor's managing clerk, was adjudicated a bankrupt on November 11, 1953. On May 18, 1955, Mr. Registrar Cunliffe made an order granting to the debtor his discharge subject to suspension for two years from February 23, 1955. The order recited, among other things, that the debtor, with intent to defraud, had forged a certain document connected with an insurance policy, and had been guilty of misconduct in his dealings with the affairs of three companies, the Globe Hotel (King's Lynn) Ld., the Plough Hotel (Cheltenham) Ld., and John Walker (Thame) Ld. The order concluded by refusing to grant to the debtor a certificate of misfortune under section 32 (2) (b) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.[1] The debtor applied ex parte under section 26 (4) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914.[2] The court adjourned the hearing so that the official receiver might be heard, and on the second occasion the application was treated as an appeal by the direction of the court.

The debtor appeared in person.

Muir Hunter for the official receiver, the trustee in bankruptcy, as amicus curiae.

In addition to the cases referred to in the judgments, the following were cited in argument: In re Burgess[3]; In re Thompson.[4]

EVERSHED M.R. This is an appeal (under the express provisions for that purpose of section 26 (4) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914) against the refusal of the Bankruptcy Court, on the occasion of granting to the debtor his discharge, suspended for two years, to grant at that time a certificate of misfortune.

[His Lordship referred to the recitals and terms of the order, and continued:] It will be observed that the appeal is against the refusal of the certificate—no more. It does not appear to me that there has (by way of appeal) been any other challenge to the order; and, of course, if that is a correct view of the approach to the question, it is fatal to the appeal: for (without any attempt at elaboration) it is quite obvious from the recitals in the order that nobody could quarrel with the registrar's refusal to grant, on those found facts, a certificate of misfortune. But in case that be thought to be too technical a view (though I do not myself think it really is) I am still quite unpersuaded by the debtor's arguments to accept the view that the registrar wrongly refused this certificate.

[His Lordship read section 32 (2) (b) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and continued:] It seems to me that, even if full allowance is made for the explanations which the debtor has here suggested, it would still be impossible to quarrel with the exercise by the court of the discretion to withhold the certificate, on the facts as they clearly are and as the debtor really concedes them to be. But I can go further: the "misfortune" which is contemplated is, by the terms of the section, "misfortune without any misconduct"; and in the recent case, in this court, of In re Boulton Brothers & Co.,[1] Lord Hanworth M.R. quoted language of Lord Esher M.R. from In re Lord Colin Campbell[2]: "'It is impossible to give an exhaustive definition of the meaning to be attached to "misfortune." I think, however, we must hold that, when the bankruptcy is not solely the result of some accident over which, or over the direct conducing causes of which, the debtor has no control, it cannot be said to arise from "misfortune."'" Lord Hanworth M.R. went on[3]: "It appears to me that what Lord Esher meant is that we ought in considering 'misfortune' to reject active conduct on the part of the debtor from being included in the word. But I think also that we must consider 'misfortune' in relation to the purposes for which it is used—namely, the removal of a statutory disqualification. . . . Fry L.J. said: 'It appears to me that what the Legislature had in view in this proviso was, the possibility of there being cases in which a man might become a bankrupt without thereby raising the presumption of his unfitness for holding a public position.'"

I follow Lord Hanworth M.R. in making no attempt at definition. But I mention these further facts; and they are by no means the whole story. I have referred to the recitals about the forged document relating to the policy. That it was forged is not now in doubt. That it was connected with the bankruptcy seems to me clear, when it is considered that the insurance company made advances on the faith of the assignment and are now proving in the bankruptcy for a sum of which, I gather, little or nothing is likely to be recovered by them. But the debtor says: "True I may have mismanaged the affairs of these companies: that is not the same thing as misconduct." I am not prepared to accept that view. If the test which Fry L.J. indicated is applied, to say no more, it seems to me that the story of mismanagement of these companies, coupled with the fact that at all material times the debtor was a solicitor's managing clerk, provides more than ample justification for the view that the statutory disqualifications ought not to be removed.

On the merits, therefore, I am unable to accede to the application. But we have considered also the procedural aspects of this matter, and it may be right that I should say a word or two upon that. I have read all that is material from section 32 of the Act of 1883. This matter of certificates of misfortune is picked up by subsection (4) of section 26 of the Act of 1914, and although there is one other later reference to it, the whole thing is left a little casually or in the air by the Act. No clear or precise rules are laid down, or intimated, in the Act, of the procedure which was thought appropriate, particularly by the last words of subsection (4), "but a refusal to grant such a certificate "shall be subject to appeal." Thus has been raised the question, what kind of appeal is contemplated? The subsection shows that a discharge might be obtained and that with the discharge there might be coupled (as one of the qualities, so to speak, of the discharge) this certificate. There is nothing, as my brother Jenkins observed during the argument, to show that the certificate might not be granted and attached, so to say, to the discharge on the court's own motion. On the other hand, it appears from the books (including the Lord Colin Campbell case [4]) that sometimes a discharge has been obtained and then later, by some substantive application, a debtor has gone back to the Bankruptcy Court and asked to have such a certificate. In those cases, no doubt, it would be necessary for some substantive application to be made. But in the present case, and what I imagine would be the ordinary case, no separate application, I conceive, would be made: the debtor would apply, in the ordinary course, and following ordinary procedure, for his discharge, and the matter would then be gone into. As we were informed by Mr. Muir Hunter, the trustee in bankruptcy, and perhaps a creditor or creditors, would attend, if they desired to oppose; and the question of an immediate discharge or a lengthy suspension would be debated on the merits of the case. Then (and I am speaking again of the ordinary case) if things went on the whole well for the bankrupt, at the end of the day, and when the registrar intimated that he was prepared to grant to the bankrupt, then or after an interval, his discharge, the bankrupt would ask at that stage for such a certificate; and if anybody (for all the parties would be there) had anything to say, they would no doubt say it.

In the present case things did not go at all well, obviously, for the debtor, because the order recites a number of damaging findings of fact. But still, the debtor asked, as he was entitled to do, for a certificate. He got a negative answer, and he has come here, as he is also entitled to do. But he came here in the first instance by way of ex parte application, and that raised at once two difficulties. First, it seemed to us, at the time when he first mentioned this matter, that it would be desirable (and I now think it would be in most cases essential) that we should have the benefit of assistance from somebody representing the official receiver. And the second question emerges: If the proper procedure is by way of notice of appeal served on the trustee, then what of the security which a debtor, on making such an appeal, has normally to give? In the present case that difficulty was got over by treating the appeal as ex parte; and it was only adjourned in order (as has happened, to our advantage) that Mr. Muir Hunter should be instructed by the official receiver to attend and assist the court. But, having now considered the procedural aspect of the matter, although I do not in any way quarrel with the existing practice in making applications to the registrar, I think nevertheless that the right procedure, if the debtor wishes to exercise his right of appeal, is that he should do so by way of a notice of appeal inter partes in the ordinary way—particularly if the debtor desires to challenge any part of the order save merely the expression of the refusal to grant a certificate.

The argument was suggested to our minds that, since the application to the registrar was ex parte, then by virtue of R.S.C.. Ord. 58, r. 10, the appeal to this court would be ex parte; but in my judgment, an application for a certificate is not, properly speaking, ex parte at all. As I have already said, I do not think that in the average case, in nine cases out of ten, any separate substantive application would be necessary. But that is not to say that it is ex parte. The certificate is asked for as one of the things which the statute says the registrar may grant when the bankrupt obtains his discharge. But the debtor asks to have that relief at a time when the whole thing is being dealt with inter partes before the registrar; and if that is so I think it follows that Mr. Muir Hunter was right to say that appeals against a refusal should come before this court inter partes, following the appropriate procedure for that purpose. In the circumstances of this case we have not dealt with it as such and the matter has but academic relevance now; but, for future guidance, that is my view of the proper procedure. It will, of course, involve this result, that the debtor normally would have to provide the security usually required before he could sustain an appeal.

On the merits of this case I see no grounds which could possibly justify interference with the view taken by the registrar; and I think the appeal should be dismissed.

JENKINS L.J. I agree.

Husband and Wife — Justices — Maintenance — Jurisdiction — Wife's application for increase of amount — Husband's application at hearing to discharge order — No complaint made by husband — No jurisdiction to discharge without complaint.

On an application by a wife for an increase in the amount payable under an order, a court of summary jurisdiction has no power, unless proper steps by a cross-summons are taken, to entertain an application by the husband to discharge that order.

A wife applied to the justices for an increase in the maintenance payable for her and the child of her marriage under an existing order. The husband resisted her application and attempted to raise at the hearing, without having made prior complaint, a case that the order should be discharged altogether. The justices increased the order to 30s. a week for the wife and £2 for the child:—

Held, (1) that as the husband had failed to take the proper steps before the hearing the justices had no jurisdiction to investigate the question whether the order should stand or be discharged.

(2) That as the child's maintenance had been increased beyond the statutory limit the order should be varied to £2 for the wife and 30s. for the child.

Rigby v. Rigby [1944] P. 33; 60 T.L.R. 238; [1944] 1 All E.R. 336 applied.

HUSBAND'S APPEAL from an order of the justices for the borough of Reigate.

On November 11, 1954, the wife obtained an order of the justices on the ground that the husband had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for her and the child of the marriage, and the husband was ordered to pay maintenance of £1 a week for the wife and 30s. a week for the child of the marriage. A complaint of desertion was dismissed.

The wife subsequently applied for an increase in the amounts payable under the order, and on January 6, 1955, the justices varied the order on her complaint by increasing the amounts to 30s. a week for the wife and £2 for the child.

At the hearing the husband, who had made no prior complaint, attempted to assert that the wife had deserted him since the date of the original order because he had made an offer to resume cohabitation which the wife, he alleged, had unreasonably refused; and he sought to have the order discharged or at least reduced to a nominal amount.

The justices considered the evidence on the allegations made by the husband, but rejected his submissions. In his notice of appeal, and at the hearing of the appeal, the husband sought to prove that his contentions in the court below were justified, and that the order should be discharged.

TRATHAN v. TRATHAN.

Peter Boydell for the wife respondent.

LORD MERRIMAN P., after referring to the previous order and to the variation made by the justices, said: It is important in those circumstances to say at once that this appeal raises two entirely separate questions. The justices have made an order which in one respect cannot possibly be supported as regards quantum when they decided to increase the amount of the order. On the other hand, the appeal raises, apart from that, a much more serious question. It is suggested (though the notes on this topic are somewhat scanty) that the husband attempted to raise at the hearing the case that the order should be discharged altogether, or at the very least should be reduced to a purely nominal amount. I confess I do not appreciate the foundation on which, if the grounds for discharge of the order altogether are right, there could be any question of substituting a nominal order. The substance of the matter is that the husband was trying to assert at the hearing that since the making of the order the wife had deserted him, because he had made an offer to resume cohabitation which the wife was said unreasonably to have refused.

The justices apparently went into this question, at any rate to a certain extent, for they have dealt with it in one of their reasons, and save for the question of the particular point regarding amount, which I will deal with separately in a moment, the whole of this appeal is directed to the issue that the wife ought to have been held to have become a deserter, because she ought to have been held unreasonably to have refused the husband's overtures for a resumption of cohabitation, and, therefore, the order ought to have been discharged, or at the very least reduced to a nominal amount, or, alternatively, that on that ground and for those reasons—and I emphasize these words—her complaint asking for an increase ought to have been dismissed.

That raises, in my opinion, some cardinal questions. But I will deal, first of all, with the difficulty about the amount. The original order, as I have said, was for £1, plus 30s. in respect of the child. The justices have increased it to 30s. in respect of the wife, and by 10s. in respect of the child, bringing the maintenance in respect of the child to £2. That fact has only to be stated to show that they have gone wrong, and it is not suggested that there is any answer to the appeal in that respect, for, though the wife's own maintenance is well within the statutory limit, which has now been increased, the maintenance in respect of the child, of whom she was given custody, has been increased to a sum which is 10s. more than the justices have power to award, and to that there is no answer.

The question is whether, in the circumstances of this case, we can and should substitute for that form of increase another form which—with one exception—would arrive at precisely the same result, namely, that the whole of the extra £1 should be put on to the wife's own maintenance. I say with one exception. The exception, of course, is that there would be an automatic terminus ad quem as regards the remaining 30s. when the child attains the age of 16 years. But I do not think that is a matter of the slightest importance, for at any time it is open to the husband, or the wife, to get an appropriate variation in the amount of the maintenance payable directly to the wife within the statutory limit, which has never been reached so far as she is concerned. I will content myself for the moment with saying that Mr. Laughton-Scott, who this morning took up Mr. Ackner's unfinished argument very capably, did not dispute that we have power, under the rules, to substitute any order in this respect which the justices should have made; but he has raised certain considerations on the question whether we ought to do that which we are entitled to do, and I would prefer to leave that over until I have discussed, and expressed my opinion about what is the real point in this case.

It is just as well, in connexion with both these issues, to begin by saying what the wife's complaint was, and when I say "complaint" I mean complaint in the technical sense in which that word has been used for over 100 years in courts of summary jurisdiction, and is now used in the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952. Her complaint was that the original order should be varied by an order requiring the weekly payment for her maintenance to be increased on the ground that she was no longer in employment and was unable to secure further employment of a part-time nature. There was an additional complaint, dealing solely with the question of access, to which it is unnecessary to refer. It was in respect of the first complaint that the order to which I have referred was made, and made erroneously so far as the child's maintenance was concerned. But it is only right to say, by way of excuse for the justices, who have gone wrong in that matter of jurisdiction, that the wife herself, when she was giving evidence, said that she wanted another £1, and suggested that 10s. should be added for her and 10s. should be added in respect of the child; and unfortunately the justices fell into the trap. I do not mean "trap" in the offensive sense of the word: she, of course, was not laying any trap at all: but that, no doubt, is what led them into the error.

I used the word "cardinal" in connexion with the second issue. Now, in my opinion, it is of cardinal importance to discover what jurisdiction these justices had on January 6, 1955. The wife's complaint was that which I have just read. It is common ground that the husband himself made no complaint. There was no application, formal or otherwise, made by him to discharge the order. It is true that he gave evidence about his alleged offer and said that it had been refused, and the justices have given reasons for rejecting it, and it is true that no less than four of the grounds of this appeal are directed solely to that issue: "(1) That "the justices were wrong in law in failing to find that the respon- "dent in refusing to live with the appellant had deserted him; "(2) that the justices were wrong in law in finding that the " appellant was under any liability to maintain the respondent " (a ground of appeal which, of course, must be nonsense unless it means that the order ought to be set aside, for the order itself provided the liability to pay maintenance to the wife). However, the substance of the matter really is in the next ground of appeal: " (3) That the justices were wrong in law in failing to discharge " or revoke that part of the said order of November 11, 1954, " which provided for the weekly payment by the appellant of " maintenance for and to the respondent or, alternatively, to " reduce the amount of the said payments to a nominal sum." And finally: " (6) That upon the law and the evidence the justices " should have discharged or revoked that part of the said order of " November 11, 1954, which provided for the weekly payment by " the appellant of maintenance for and to the respondent, or " should have reduced to a nominal sum the said weekly sum." I am not going to refer again to the points about the nominal sum, because, when once it is apparent, as it is apparent beyond the slightest peradventure, that the substance of the husband's defence, to which he was directing his evidence, was that the wife was a deserter and should be deprived of any rights under the order at all, the question of keeping the matter alive, if that view is right, by a nominal order makes nonsense, and I do not propose to refer to it again. Discharge is one thing; dismissal of her complaint for an increase is another. But, in my opinion, there is no practical importance in considering a nominal order.

TRATHAN v. TRATHAN.

Lord Merriman P.

I have referred to the wife's complaint, and to the absence of any complaint on the part of the husband. In my opinion it is not a mere technical matter that there was no complaint raising the husband's case that this order ought to be discharged because the wife had disentitled herself to have any order for the future. It is of the essence of the justices' jurisdiction. I do not propose to go in very elaborate detail into this matter, because it seems to me that all that is necessary is to refer to the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, Part II, relating to civil jurisdiction and procedure, section 43 of which provides: " Subject to the provisions of this Act, " where a complaint is made to a justice of the peace acting for " any petty sessions area upon which a magistrates' court acting " for that area has power to make an order against any person, the " justice may issue a summons directed to that person requiring " him to appear before a magistrates' court acting for that area " to answer to the complaint." I do not think that I need read section 44, which deals with the territorial aspect of the jurisdiction to hear complaints. Section 45 directs what shall be the procedure on hearing, and contains the statement that " The " court, after hearing the evidence and the parties, shall make " the order for which the complaint is made or dismiss the " complaint "; and there are, for this aspect of the jurisdiction, forms prescribed, and in the very first form authorized under the authority of the two sections 43 and 44, and rule 4, which says that in this class of case the complaint need not be made on oath, the complaint is in this form: "The complaint in" such and such "petty sessional division of" so and so of such an address, "who upon oath or affirmation states that" so and so "on the . . . day of . . ." and so on, stating the ground of complaint, and then it is either sworn or affirmed. On that a summons in the next form, to the same effect, is issued, and there are specific directions about the formal summons, which refers back to the prescribed form; and, finally, rule 75 contains the direction that a summons requiring a person to appear before a magistrates' court to answer to an information or complaint shall state shortly the matter of the information or complaint, and shall state the time and place, and so on; and then there are the provisions as to service, etc., to which I need not refer.

That an application for discharge could have been dealt with on this occasion, had proper steps been taken, is beyond dispute. All that was necessary was for the husband to make a complaint that by reason of the wife's refusal to resume cohabitation with him unreasonably she had become a deserter, and therefore not entitled, and so on. Had that been done, and the matter heard at the same time as this, the form that these proceedings took would have been perfectly in order. As it was, in my opinion, the justices had no jurisdiction whatever to go into the question whether this order should stand or be discharged. They had no jurisdiction, in effect, to do any of the things failure to do which is made the specific subject of complaint in the notice of appeal.

Now, I agree, on the other hand, that on the issue that the amount should be increased or decreased the conduct of the parties is a relevant consideration if it is regularly before the court. To be particular in this case, if the wife had so conducted herself as to justify a reduction in the amount by reason of conduct which was relevant to the amount, there is no doubt, in my mind, that that would have entitled the justices to dismiss her complaint if the conduct was bad enough to justify them in reaching that conclusion. But that was not the point here. If that sort of point had been taken below, instead of being taken now, when it had already been pointed out (in fact, by the court, though Mr. Boydell would have pointed it out quickly enough later on) that the whole thing was misconceived, because there was no application to discharge before the court at all, I would not be disinclined to consider the matter from that point of view. But when I know that the substance of the matter was, as it unquestionably was, an attempt by the husband—but without raising the issue properly and in due form, so as to give the justices jurisdiction—to have the order discharged, I propose to deal with it on that basis, for that is the reality of the matter. With regard to that issue I will read the justices' reasons. On the question of amount they find as a fact that the first order was made when the wife was working, "but as the wife is now "unable to work we considered that the amount of the order "should be increased." That, by itself, is a finding which is not really challenged as a finding of fact, and, of course, justifies an increase in the amount. Then they go on—and this is what is complained of: "When the original order was made on "November 11, 1954, the husband had left the matrimonial "home, and the wife left the home sometime in December, "1954, to stay with her mother. During the wife's absence the "husband returned to the home on January 3, 1955. In his "evidence the husband said he was prepared to live with his "wife again. We did not consider that the mere fact that he "had returned to the home was a genuine offer to resume "cohabitation with his wife, or that his conduct had been such "that she might reasonably be expected so to regard it, and "we accordingly refused to discharge the order." It is perfectly plain, therefore, that they were dealing with it on the basis that what they were being asked to do was to discharge the order and nothing else.

TRATHAN v. TRATHAN.

Lord Merriman P.

I have referred to the statute and the rules, but this matter is not without authority, because, in my opinion, the decision of the Court of Appeal in Rigby v. Rigby [1] is authority for the proposition that this question of the foundation of jurisdiction in a magistrates' court, upon a complaint properly made, is of the essence of the matter and is not mere form. It was a curious case, and I happened to remember the circumstances, of which we have also been reminded by Mr. Laughton-Scott calling our attention to it. It was a case in which, mistakenly, the complaint actually made before the justices was of persistent cruelty which was only supported by evidence plainly treated both by the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal as a single instance of sexual intercourse when the husband knew he was suffering from venereal disease, from which it followed that the element of persistence was lacking; but this court said: "Well, there "is at any rate the other section, which appears to deal "with the same subject-matter, namely, that her husband, "while suffering from venereal disease and knowing that he was "so suffering, insisted on having sexual intercourse with her," and we then and there amended the complaint to substitute that charge for one which would not hold water, and in spite of the persuasiveness of my brother judge who is sitting with me now, the Court of Appeal would not have it. I am going to refer to one passage only in the judgment of Goddard L.J. We had acted on the rules, which were the same then as now, I think, in substance, the one then in question being rule 67. The rules have been renumbered, and what was 67 is now 71, but the terms are identical, and, indeed, they are those which govern the Court of Appeal itself—that we might draw all inferences of fact which might have been drawn in the court below, and give any judgment and make any order which ought to have been made, and so on; while subrule 5 gives leave to amend the grounds of appeal or make any other order on such terms as the court shall think just, to ensure the determination on the merits of the real question in controversy between the parties. It was with reference to that that Goddard L.J. agreed with our decision that there could not be persistent cruelty, but said [2]: "Thereupon, the Divisional "Court, acting as they said under rule 67, (5) and (6) of the "Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1937, held that they had the power "not only to amend the order of the justices, but also to amend "the proceedings by altering the complaint." I am satisfied in my own mind that when Goddard L.J. used the word "complaint" he meant the word complaint in inverted commas, that is, the "complaint" within the meaning of the Acts governing the magistrates' jurisdiction; and he went on: "I do "not think that the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1937, gave "power to the Divisional Court to alter the proceedings from "the outset and substitute a complaint which had never been "preferred by the wife."

In this case, if we were to say that the justices went wrong because they ought to have discharged this order on this evidence, we should, in my opinion, be altering the proceedings from the outset, and not substituting but importing a complaint which had never been preferred by the husband, namely, that this order should be discharged, because, since the making of it, the wife, for example, had committed adultery, or deserted her husband, etc., etc.

Mr. Ackner, in a very attractive argument (if he will allow me to say so), yesterday said that this was perfectly in order, because of the terms of section 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, which enables the magistrates' court concerne to "alter vary or discharge" any such order (which means any of the orders above mentioned, all set out in section 5 of the Act, as amended by subsequent statutes which give additional powers), "and upon any such application from time to time" enables the court to "increase or diminish the amount of any weekly "payment ordered to be made" so that the sum does not in any case exceed what was then the maximum of £2. From this it is argued, in effect, that on a complaint by a wife that on certain specified grounds she is entitled to an increase, it is open to the justices to discharge the order.

As things stand, and have stood since 1935, I think that there is, on any view of the matter, one essential fallacy in that argument, and for this reason. Since the Money Payments (Justices Procedure) Act, 1935, s. 9, which must be read, I think, first with the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1949, and now with the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, it is unnecessary, in relation to increase or diminution of quantum, to establish the complaint "upon fresh evidence," with all the limitations, which I need not go into, which the use of those words imports.

TRATHAN v. TRATHAN.

Lord Merriman P.

There would, therefore, if the argument of the husband is right, be two quite distinct issues before the justices. They would have to be satisfied that within the strict meaning of the words there was some "fresh evidence," in any given case, which entitled them to discharge the order, whereas in relation to increase or diminution they would not. That, of course, on the argument that was addressed to us about the relevance of this matter in relation to amount, if it could be brought in on that ground, would have this result, that in raising the issue as a ground for discharge the husband would, indeed, be bound by the requirement of fresh evidence, but in raising the same issue, whatever it was, in relation to amount—conduct of the parties, and so forth—he would not, because it would then be directed simply to the question of amount.

However, I do not think that I need pursue that topic any further, because, in my opinion, it is quite plain on the face of section 7 itself that, though these things are all put together in one sentence, they do, in fact, raise quite separate issues, and there must be, in my opinion, under the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, as there must have been under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, a complaint which alleges that there should be an alteration and upon what ground; or that there should be a variation and upon what ground; or that there should be a discharge, and again upon what ground, though in that case at least the ground must be based upon "fresh evidence."

The result, in my opinion, is that the whole of this discussion about facts leading to the discharge of the order was wholly beside the point. The justices had no such matter before them, and should have declined to listen to it, unless and until it was properly put before them by a complaint directed to that point, and dealt with upon the terms of the section which apply to that point. But having expressed my view that the whole of the grounds of appeal relating to this aspect of the matter are entirely misconceived, and also that the reasons given by the justices for failing to discharge the order, as it is called in the notice of appeal, in other words, for rejecting the husband's submission that circumstances had arisen which would justify them in discharging it, are all beside the point, I wish to make it clear that, in my opinion, the mere fact that these things were mistakenly discussed before the justices on January 6, 1955, ought not, on the ground that they are stale and therefore cannot be said to be fresh evidence if the matter is brought up again, to preclude the justices from hearing the matter if it is properly brought before them; and Mr. Boydell has expressly disclaimed, as one would expect, that any such point, in his view, would be open to the wife. The whole thing was a nullity—all that part of the case; there was nothing in it at all, for the reasons I have given.

If, therefore, the husband is minded to do either of two things, to try to get a reduction in the order, that is open to him at any time and always was open to him; and there he would not be bound by any matters of fresh evidence, and he would not be thrown out upon that ground, nor, in turn, would the wife, because this matter has been discussed irrelevantly; and if he wishes to make a timely application (for one has to consider what application the statutory time-limit may have, if any) to discharge the order, well and good. He will not be shut out.

That brings me back to the one remaining point: what we should do about this mistake over the application of the 10s. If I felt that there was any reason, if we put that right, why that would prejudge any issue on the real point which the husband is complaining about, I would leave things alone, and merely correct the error by taking off the 10s., about which there cannot be any doubt, from the £2 awarded for the child. But I do not think that it does make any difference. I think that we can deal with that matter quite independently. We can give effect to what was the wife's complaint, that the weekly payment for her maintenance should be increased and that she wanted £1. The fact that she rather foolishly said: " Split it between me and the " child " is neither here nor there.

I think that we are fully entitled to take the 10s. off the child and put it on to the wife. That cannot do any harm to either party. On the contrary, it may save costs if there is no further application by the husband. The weekly result will be precisely the same so far as her money is concerned. And that is what I propose we should do.

The appeal will necessarily be allowed to that extent, and that variation made in the order.

DAVIES J. I agree. As my Lord has pointed out, of the six grounds of appeal set out in the appellant's notice of appeal, four of them, that is to say Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 6, are really directed to one and the same point, viz., that the justices ought to have discharged the order which the wife had obtained. It is perfectly true that it is suggested in the alternative that the amount of the order should have been reduced to a nominal sum. But that is really the same point; for the suggestion that it should be reduced to a nominal sum was based on the allegation attempted to be made that the wife had refused to resume cohabitation with the husband, and, therefore, was entitled to nothing.

For the reasons which my Lord has given I agree that on an application by a wife for an increase of the amount payable under an order the court has no power, unless proper steps by a cross-summons are taken, to entertain an application to discharge that order. I do not think it is necessary to repeat the reasons that my Lord has given, or to examine the statutes.

I should like to add that I do not think it necessary to decide, for the purposes of this appeal, whether, on an application to increase the amount of an order, the court has power to decrease it. I do not desire to express any view about that, as I do not think it is necessary for the purposes of this decision. For we are here concerned with a case where the justices upon an application to increase have purported to entertain an application to discharge, and for the reasons that my Lord has given I am satisfied that that is wrong.

TRATHAN v. TRATHAN.

Mr. Boydell's argument was that the justices had no jurisdiction to consider evidence which went to the existence of the order; and, of course, if the court had no jurisdiction to consider the evidence, that evidence has never validly been considered. If, therefore, the husband were to apply again, by taking the proper steps, to discharge the order, even though the evidence that he might seek to adduce in support of that application would be the same as that which he purported to adduce on the previous occasion, in my view, that would not mean that that evidence would not be fresh evidence within the meaning of the statute.

I should also like to add this, that although we must not be thought to be encouraging a further application by anybody to the justices (indeed, we are told that it is thought that there is going to be a petition for dissolution by the wife on the ground of cruelty, and that may affect the practical aspect of further applications to the justices), if such an application is made, then I think that it would be desirable that the summons or summonses should be heard by a bench constituted differently from the bench from whom we are hearing the present appeal. My Lord is in agreement with me on this, I think.

The only other matter that arises from the argument of Mr. Ackner is this: he contended that the justices, as, he says, is plain from their reasons, had failed, on the application to increase, to consider the conduct of the wife. It is perfectly true that in their reasons they put the two matters in separate compartments. They appear, on the face of their reasons in paragraph 1, which concerns the increase of the amount, to be dealing only with figures. They deal with conduct in paragraph 2.

If authority were needed for the purpose of showing that conduct of the parties is material on the question of amount, it is to be found in the decision of this court in Wharton v. Wharton.[3] But it is difficult to see that that criticism on the facts of the present case really gets the husband anywhere. For when the justices do come to consider the question of conduct, in the wrong context, let it be assumed, in their paragraph 2, they find the facts against the husband; and it is impossible to see, on their findings of fact, how any of the matters alleged by the husband could have induced them to decrease the amount of the wife's order. Therefore, as I say, I do not think that this criticism, that they ignored conduct in coming to the conclusion that there ought to be a small increase in the order, is a valid one.

For these reasons, therefore, I agree with my Lord that, subject to the alteration of the order making the increase for the wife £1, and making no increase for the child, this appeal should be dismissed.

TRATHAN v. TRATHAN.

LORD MERRIMAN P. By what he has just said my brother has reminded me of something I must add to my judgment, with which I promised I would deal, and that is that in the event of the matter coming up again on the same lines it should be dealt with by an entirely fresh panel of justices. I also forgot to mention the possibility of a divorce petition, about which it is said that an application for legal aid is pending. That, of course, will be entirely a matter for consideration by the justices. If this ground for discharging the original order is put forward it will be a matter for their consideration how far, if at all, it raises the same sort of issues as are raised by the divorce petition, and they will no doubt act accordingly.

Appeal allowed to extent of variation of order only.

Landlord and Tenant—Assignment of lease—Consent—Not to be unreasonably withheld—Landlords' refusal of leave to assign last 7½ months of five-year term—Object of assignment to occupy premises and not to obtain statute-protected tenancy—Reasonableness of refusal.

The landlords of rent-controlled premises refused their consent to the assignment by a tenant of the seven-and-a-half-months' unexpired portion of his five-year lease to an assignee of admitted respectability in urgent need of accommodation. The landlords' ground for refusal was that the sole purpose of the assignment was to give the assignee at the end of the term the statutory protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts which the assignor did not want or intend to obtain for himself. The object of the assignment was not to obtain the protection of the Rent Acts for the assignee:—

Held, that the landlords' refusal of consent was unreasonable. An assignment of a period as long as seven and a half months, with the object of enabling the assignee to occupy the premises, was a normal assignment, consent to which could not reasonably be withheld by the landlords, although the result might be to give the assignee a statute-protected tenancy at the end of the term. The object of an assignment, though not necessarily decisive, was a most important element for consideration in determining the APPEAL from Judge Tudor Rees sitting at Croydon County Court.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of Denning L.J.: In July, 1950, the plaintiffs, Thomas Bookman Ld., let a flat to a tenant, Sydney Nathan, for five years beginning on August 1, 1950, at a rent of £6 14s. 9d. a month, and expiring in the ordinary course of events on August 1, 1955. In September, 1954, the tenant found a house and bought it, because he wanted other accommodation for his family. He decided to assign the remainder of his lease which at that time had 10 months to run. He looked in the newspaper and saw that one Peter Diamond was advertising for rooms. He answered the advertisement and they had an interview at which Diamond agreed to take an assignment of the remainder of the lease, and agreed to buy some of the tenant's furniture for £100. The tenant took up Diamond's references, which were all satisfactory. The lease contained a clause that the tenant was "not to assign, "transfer, underlet or part with possession of the flat without "the consent of the landlord, such consent not to be unreasonably "withheld."

On December 13, 1954, the tenant by his solicitors applied to the landlords for consent to the assignment. The reply on December 16 by the landlords was as follows: "In view of the "fact that your client's tenancy expires in a matter of a few "months, our clients are not prepared to grant their consent to "an assignment, as this would appear to be merely an attempt to "assign the 'fag-end' of a tenancy." On December 20, 1954, they repeated their contention, stating: "The sole purpose of the "assignment is to give to the assignee the statutory protection "which the assignor does not want and does not intend to get for "himself." They therefore refused their consent to the assignment. Notwithstanding the refusal, the tenant did assign to Diamond, taking the view that the landlords were unreasonably withholding their consent.

The landlords thereupon took proceedings in the county court claiming possession against the tenant and the assignee on the ground that there had been a breach of covenant by the tenant, and asking for a declaration that their consent had not been unreasonably withheld.

The county court judge, on March 31, 1955, found that when the tenant assigned to the assignee, there was no intention or object of getting a tenancy protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts, but went on to say that he was not concerned with the object, but with the consequences of the assignment, which would be that the landlords would be saddled at the end of the five-year term with a tenant who would be protected by the Rent Acts. He accordingly held that the landlords had not unreasonably withheld their consent, and made an order for possession. The assignee appealed.

Philip Panto for the assignee.
J. E. S. Ricardo for the landlords.

The following cases were cited in the argument: Swanson v. Forton *; Lee v. K. Carter Ld. †; Dollar v. Winston ‡; In re Swanson's Agreement §; Regional Properties v. Frankenschwerth ¶; Darnell v. Millwood. ‖

DENNING L.J. stated the facts and continued: The question for the court is whether the landlord was justified in withholding his consent. The important thing to notice is that at the time when the request was made for consent there were seven and a half months of the lease to run. The judge has found that when the tenant assigned to the assignee, there was no intention or object of getting a Rent Act tenancy. The simple purpose was that the assignee wanted accommodation. He was a young man recently married. He had been living in a furnished room with his wife. He parted with all his savings to get this flat and he paid full value for the furniture. He knew the lease had only seven and a half months to run, but his hope was that at the end of the term he could arrange with the landlords to give him a new tenancy.

The judge, however, said that he was not concerned with the object of the parties to the assignment, but with what the consequences were. He said that having regard to the consequences, which would be that the landlords would be saddled at the end of the term with a tenant who would be protected by the Rent Acts, the landlords did not unreasonably withhold their consent. Accordingly, he made an order for possession.

There are two reported cases which have come before the court in which a landlord has been held to be entitled to withhold his consent. In Swanson v. Forton [1] there were only 12 days to run. In Dollar v. Winston [2] there were seven weeks to run. It was held in each of those cases that the landlord was entitled to withhold his consent because the object of the assignee was to get the benefit of a statutory tenancy: and the period was so short that it was not a normal assignment, but an entirely abnormal one.

THOMAS BOOKMAN LD. v. NATHAN.
Denning L.J.

In the present case it seems to me on the judge's finding that there was a normal assignment with seven and a half months to run. The assignee had the simple purpose of entering into occupation for the seven and a half months in the hope thereafter of negotiating a new tenancy, but not with the object of getting a statutory tenancy, though that would indeed be the natural result.

I think the judge misdirected himself by saying he had not to consider the object of the parties. The object of the assignment was a most important element to consider. It may not always be decisive. I can well imagine that, if there were an assignment of the last fortnight or three weeks of a term, a landlord could reasonably withhold his consent, even though the parties had no intention in fact of creating a statutory tenancy.

Here there is a respectable tenant against whom nothing has been said. There is no reason whatsoever, so far as I can see, for withholding consent except that the landlords want to select a new tenant themselves. They did not go into the witness-box to say why they wanted the premises. They did not say that they had a waiting list or that they intended to sell the premises or anything of that kind. For aught that appears, they simply wanted to let the flat to another tenant of their own choosing. They would not be able to get any more rent from such a tenant because they would be limited to the standard rent. There seems to be no reason why they should refuse to have the assignee as tenant when he will pay the same rent as anyone else. In my judgment, the county court judge was wrong in holding that this was an abnormal assignment. I think it was a normal one, and that the landlords were not justified in refusing to assign. I would allow the appeal accordingly.

BIRKETT L.J. I am of the same opinion. The real question was whether the consent of Thomas Bookman Ld. to the assignment was unreasonably withheld? If it was, then the tenant was entitled to make this assignment without their consent. That was the only issue which was fought before the county court judge. It has been a little difficult to appreciate all that must have been in the judge's mind. On the face of it, this was a perfectly binding assignment. In the language which has been adopted in some of the cases, notably in Swanson v. Forton,[3] it was, on the face of it, a normal assignment as contrasted with an abnormal assignment. There were seven and a half months unexpired of the term to go. The tenant was anxious, having got a house, to go into his house and be rid of the unexpired portion. He had approached the landlords in that matter, though it would appear that he wanted to sell some of his furniture and the landlords were not agreeable to that. Having seen an advertisement in the paper by Diamond, the tenant got into touch with him. Diamond was newly married and particularly wanted accommodation. He was ready and willing to pay £100 for certain furniture and willing to take over the unexpired portion of the term. He went into possession. The matter was raised with the landlords and their permission asked, but it was refused. It was plain from the correspondence that the landlords were saying: "We refuse because the sole purpose of this assignment is to give "the assignee the statutory protection which the assignor does "not want." That was no doubt based on the passage which was cited in the correspondence from Megarry on the Rent Acts, 7th ed., p. 179. Mr. Megarry there deals with decided cases on the matter and says: "Where a tenancy is subject to a provision "against assignment without the landlord's consent, his refusal "of consent may be reasonable if the assignment would instil into "the contractual tenancy a capacity for producing a statutory "tenancy which did not exist before." Secondly, "A refusal of "consent to an assignment is also reasonable if the tenancy is "nearly at an end (e.g., with but twelve days to run) and it is "plain as a matter of fact, even though not of law, that in the "absence of an assignment no statutory tenancy would arise, "owing to the tenant being out of residence and most unlikely "to return." Finally, on the case decided by Roxburgh J. (Dollar v. Winston [4]): "Even if the contractual term has some "seven weeks to run when permission to assign is sought, and the "tenant is still in possession when he assigns the tenancy, the "same principle applies if 'the sole purpose of the assignment is "'to give to the assignee statutory protection which the assignor "'does not want and does not intend to get for himself.'" It is fairly plain to me that when this correspondence passed on this matter those passages from Megarry were in the writer's mind. The further note of Megarry following those passages was this: "However, where this is not the object of the assignment, it is "unreasonable to withhold consent (and there may be a with-"holding without an actual refusal) merely because the landlord "wishes the choice of tenants to lie with him and not with the "assignor, or wishes to obtain possession of the house." Then he cites two cases which have been decided on those matters. It is a little difficult to understand quite what was in the judge's mind, because he was manifestly sympathetic to Diamond and said he would like to help if he could. He then went on to say: "This was not done for the deliberate purpose of creating a "statutory tenancy, but it is not a question of intention but what "would be the consequences of such an assignment to the land-"lords and what would be just to them." Then a little later: "Without the Acts, the landlords could have got possession next "July. Is it right to penalize the landlord? How far can it go? "It is impossible for me to say. One must look at all the "circumstances and hardship to the tenant and to the landlord.

THOMAS BOOKMAN LD. v. NATHAN.
Birkett L.J.

"Look at the Swanson case.[5] The facts of this case would "warrant me to say that the landlords' refusal to prevent a "statutory tenancy arising was not unreasonable." What appears to have been in the judge's mind was that because the tenant himself was not anxious at the expiration of his term to continue there, no statutory tenancy would arise in that event, and therefore for the tenant to dispose of the seven and a half months' residue to Diamond, which would mean that at the end of the term a statutory tenancy would arise in Diamond's case, was penalizing the landlord in some way or other. That situation was really dealt with by Evershed L.J. in Swanson v. Forton when he said[6]: "It could not be suggested to be right that a landlord "may always reasonably refuse his consent to an assignment (or "an underlease) merely because his chances of dominion over his "property at the end of the lease might thereby be enhanced or "the chances of a continued right of personal occupation after "the end of the term might be thereby diminished: for otherwise a landlord would in effect be justified in refusing his "consent at any time to any assignment or any underletting of "'rent restricted' premises." Therefore I agree that the county court judge, in dealing with this matter, has treated this assignment of the seven and a half months' term as being something abnormal, and as though it had as its purpose not the mere assignment, but some further purpose either disclosed or not disclosed. I think it ought to be regarded as a perfectly normal assignment, and that, in all the circumstances, the landlords were not entitled to withhold their consent. It cannot therefore be said that they reasonably withheld their consent as the county court judge seems to have found. I would be in favour of allowing the appeal.

Romer L.J. I also agree. It seems to me that there are two distinct reasons why it cannot be said in the present case that the landlords' refusal of consent to the proposed assignment was reasonable. The first one is that the only ground on which the landlords' solicitors refused to give their consent was that contained in the letter dated December 16, 1954, in which they said that they would not grant their consent because the proposed assignment "would appear to be merely an attempt to assign "the 'fag-end' of a tenancy." That was the only ground they gave by letter, and no further ground was suggested at the trial because no evidence was called on their behalf. That ground was negatived by the judge in express terms, and, accordingly, was not a ground on which the landlords could rely. As they never suggested any other ground it appears to me that their refusal is therefore vitiated. The second ground on which I think it cannot be said that the consent was reasonably withheld was that the proposed assignment was a normal and not an abnormal assignment in the sense in which those phrases were used by Lord Greene M.R., in Swanson v. Forton,[7] when he said: "Nothing "that I have said must be taken as applying to a case of what "in the argument was sometimes referred to as 'normal' "assignment. If that phraseology be adopted, the whole basis of "fact in the present case is that the assignment proposed was "an 'abnormal' one in that it was an assignment of the tail "end of the term by the lessee not for the purpose of conferring "the right to occupy for the few remaining days of the term, "but in order to enable the assignee to occupy thereafter under "the Rent Restrictions Acts." It follows from the finding of the judge to which I have already referred, namely, that it was not the purpose of the parties to the assignment to attract the operation of the Rent Restrictions Acts, that this suggested assignment was a "normal" one within the purview of what Lord Greene said. I think the judge was in error in failing to appreciate that the assignment was a normal one having regard to the unexpired residue of the term and as to the intention of the parties. As to that, I would respectfully agree with what my Lord has said on the subject of the purpose or object that an assignor and assignee may have in mind. It seems to me that if it is established that the object of the assignment is to enable the assignee to remain in occupation under the Rent Restrictions Acts, then it will almost inevitably follow that the landlord would be justified in withholding his consent because the result of the assignment would be, and intended to be, to bring about what Tucker L.J. described in Lee v. K. Carter Ld.[8] as "a contractual relationship "pregnant with future possibilities." On the other hand, it does not seem to me that it necessarily follows that a landlord can never reasonably refuse his consent where that object or purpose is not in the mind of the proposed assignor and assignee; because, as my Lord has pointed out, if there are a tenant and a proposed assignee who know nothing about the Rent Acts, and the assignor purports to convey the mere end of a contractual term to that assignee, the result would still be the same as though their object had been to attract the operation of the Acts and the landlord would be subjected again to "a contractual relationship pregnant "with future possibilities." I think in that case the landlord might well be justified in refusing his consent even though the application of the Acts formed no part of the object of the parties to the assignment. It is further to be observed that usually it would be quite impossible for the landlord to find out, with reasonable certainty at all events, what object or purpose the assignor and the intending assignee had in mind. Therefore, it cannot always be said that the question of reasonableness or unreasonableness on the landlords' part depends on what is the object or purpose of the proposed assignment. In the present case the question does not really arise for decision, because on the two points to which I have already referred I am well satisfied that the consent here was unreasonably withheld and therefore I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Practice—Parties.

The plaintiff carried on a confectionery business in partnership with B. under the name of "Modern Confections." The business had premises both at Hinckley and at Nuneaton. The plaintiff worked at Hinckley while B. was in charge at Nuneaton. Cheques were usually collected by B. and the usual practice was for both the plaintiff and B. to indorse cheques for payment into the partnership account at the Midland Bank at Hinckley; each of them, however, had authority to indorse alone. B. appropriated nine cheques, totalling some £1,160, in respect of invoices sent out from Hinckley. The cheques were drawn in favour of Modern Confections, indorsed by B. "Modern Confections p.p. [G. B.]," and handed over by him to J., a customer of the Nuneaton branch of the defendant bank. At that time J. had three accounts with the defendant bank, namely (i) a current account, generally in credit to £150 to £200; (ii) a No. 2 account, overdrawn to the extent of £980; (iii) a No. 3 account, which had been dormant. J. indorsed and paid into his No. 3 account the cheques handed to him by B., and he also drew large sums out of this account. The manager of the defendant bank, on seeing that the cheques were made payable to "Modern Confections," asked J. for an explanation and was told that B. was the sole partner in Modern Confections, that J. was helping him with the financial side of the business with a view to going into partnership at a later date, and that B. owed J. £450. The manager made no inquiry of B. and accepted J.'s explanation. The plaintiff sued the defendant bank for damages for conversion of the cheques:—

Held, (1) that, since a co-owner who does an act in respect of joint property which can be justified only by the right to exclusive possession converts that property, by delivering partnership cheques to J. for payment into the latter's No. 3 account, which was not a partnership account, B. had converted the cheques; and that by collecting the proceeds of the cheques the bank was prima facie guilty of conversion although B., who had indorsed the cheques, had authority so to do.

A. L. Underwood Ld. v. Bank of Liverpool [1924] 1 K.B. 775; 40 T.L.R. 302 applied.

(2) That by virtue of R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 11, the plaintiff was entitled to sue for conversion in respect of his interest in the cheques without joining his partner.

Brewer v. Westminster Bank Ld. [1952] 2 T.L.R. 568; [1952] 2 All E.R. 650 distinguished.

(3) That the bank was not a holder in due course within section 29 (1) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, since, as B. had been guilty of fraud, the burden of proving that value had subsequently been given for the cheques lay on the defendant bank by section 30 (2); and the bank had not discharged that burden since J.'s explanation to the manager was quite inconsistent with his having given value for the cheques, and as the manager believed the cheques were B.'s money they could not be applied to reduce J.'s overdraft, and no agreement by the bank to honour cheques drawn before receipt of the proceeds of the partnership cheques had been proved.

(4) That the bank was not protected by section 82 of the Act of 1882, since the bank manager was careless in not making sufficient inquiries; where a bank manager failed to make the inquiries which he should have made a very heavy burden rested on him of showing that such inquiries could not have led to any action which could have protected the interests of the true owner.

ACTION.

In October, 1950, the plaintiff, Reginald Baker, started a business in partnership with one Bainbridge and one Tattersall under the name of Modern Confections. There was no written partnership agreement and the name of the firm was not registered under the Registration of Business Names Act, 1916. The manufacture of chocolate biscuits was carried on in premises at Hinckley and Nuneaton, the firm buying biscuits from biscuit manufacturers like the Valvona Biscuit Co., putting chocolate on them and then selling them to wholesalers. The three men shared equally in the profits and the partnership account was kept with the Midland Bank at Hinckley. The plaintiff worked at Hinckley, while the premises at Nuneaton were the responsibility of Bainbridge. The office work for both centres was done at Hinckley, where it was usually the plaintiff who made out invoices for all goods sold. Payment was generally made by cheque, which was usually collected by Bainbridge. The plaintiff and Bainbridge each had authority to indorse the cheques alone, but the usual practice was for both to do so; the cheques then being given to the girl employed in the Hinckley office, who paid them into the Midland Bank. Tattersall retired from the partnership early in 1951, and Bainbridge began to carry on the business at the Nuneaton premises separately from that at the Hinckley premises, sending out invoices on his own account without informing the plaintiff. Cheques in respect of these invoices were made out to Bainbridge, who indorsed them and handed them over to one Jeffcott.

Jeffcott, who carried on in Nuneaton the business of an insurance agent, had had since 1938 a current account with the Nuneaton branch of the defendant bank, where one Stanley Jones was manager. In 1946 the defendant bank allowed him to open a No. 2 account on which he was allowed to draw up to an agreed limit, the overdraft being secured by the deeds of his house. The initial overdraft was £150 and by 1951 it had increased to £980. Between 1946 and 1951 his current account was in credit to the extent usually of between £150 and £200, and had an annual turnover of between £5,000 and £6,000. On March 15, 1947, Jeffcott opened a No. 3 account which he sometimes used but which at other times lay dormant. It was in this condition at the beginning of April, 1951, showing a nominal credit of 5s. 6d., and the overdraft on his No. 2 account had increased to over £900; but on April 23 Jeffcott paid £249 6s. 2d. in cash into the No. 3 account. On April 25 he paid in a cheque for £118 19s. 6d. drawn by Thomas Hoyles & Sons Ld. and made payable to G. Bainbridge, which was indorsed both by Bainbridge and by Jeffcott. On the same day Jeffcott drew out £75 in cash from the No. 3 account, and on the next day a further £100 in cash; and on April 27 he drew on the account a cheque for £124 5s. in favour of the Valvona Biscuit Co. During May cheques amounting to £3,000 in value were paid into the account and substantial sums drawn out both in cash and by cheque. Until about the middle of May all the cheques which Jeffcott paid into this account were made payable to Bainbridge and indorsed over to Jeffcott.

In May, 1951, Bainbridge began to appropriate cheques which he had collected in respect of invoices sent out from the Hinckley premises. These cheques, which were drawn by Thomas Hoyles & Son Ld., or by a firm called William Wine, were made payable to Modern Confections and were the cheques in respect of which the plaintiff brought this action against the defendant bank. The first was a cheque dated May 19 for £131 14s., drawn by Thomas Hoyles & Son Ld. It was indorsed "Modern Confec-" tions, p.p. G. Bainbridge," and also by Jeffcott, who paid it into his No. 3 account. A total of nine cheques payable to Modern Confections and amounting in value to £1,160 16s. 6d., were indorsed by Bainbridge in this manner and paid into his No. 3 account by Jeffcott.

None of these operations attracted the bank manager's attention, until the second of the cheques made payable to Modern Confections, a cheque from William Wine, dated May 23, was paid in. He asked Jeffcott to see him. At this time the bank manager apparently knew that the No. 3 account had become active again, with substantial payments in April, but he had not investigated the matter further than that. At their interview he asked Jeffcott why he was paying into his own account a cheque in favour of Modern Confections. Jeffcott said that Bainbridge was the sole partner in Modern Confections and that, while he was a very good confectioner manufacturing chocolate biscuits, he was of little use in running his business on the financial side, and that he, Jeffcott, was helping him with the financial side, with a view to going into partnership at a later date. Jeffcott also said that Bainbridge owed him £450, and that he hoped, by running the financial side, to reimburse himself that sum. The manager saw Jeffcott from time to time after that and was assured again that Bainbridge was the sole proprietor of Modern Confections. At some interview Jeffcott told him that this confectionery business was carried on at Hinckley. At one or more interviews the manager raised with Jeffcott the point about the large sums going out in cash and Jeffcott said that the money was going to Bainbridge. The manager felt that he had no reason to distrust Jeffcott, who was a good customer and had never given any cause for anxiety before; and he felt satisfied with all these explanations. He did not ask to see Bainbridge, although he told Jeffcott on several occasions that the account should be "put on proper lines"; and in July, 1951, an account was opened in the name of Arbury Confections, on which both Jeffcott and Bainbridge had authority to draw. The bank manager did not realize that anything was wrong until October 9, 1951.

In the meantime, the plaintiff learned that Modern Confections' account with the Midland Bank was overdrawn, as money had been paid out while no cheques were paid in. He thereupon terminated the partnership and brought this action against Barclays Bank Ld. claiming damages for conversion of the nine cheques amounting in value to £1,160 16s. 6d.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 6. DEVLIN J. stated the facts and continued: If Jones had been less unsuspecting, I think that the possibility to which his mind might most naturally be expected to turn would be the possibility that Jeffcott might be defrauding Bainbridge. Of course, cheques are indorsed over to third parties, but usually for small sums and only occasionally. When the bank manager sees it happening for large sums and quite regularly, I think that he is put on inquiry. It is not uncommon in the annals of fraud to find a clerk or servant or other associate, who has been given an indorsed cheque with instructions to pay it into his principal's bank account, adding his own name on the back and paying it into his own.

Baker v. Barclays Bank Ld.

The explanation which Jones, the bank manager, received when he asked for one was not, I think, one which should have satisfied a bank manager. I appreciate the manager's confidence in Jeffcott, and I agree that allowance has to be made for what one might call the personal equation in these matters; but all the same, people of apparently complete honesty do commit frauds, and I think it is necessary for bank managers to consider the merits of the story which they are told upon occasions such as these. I do not think that the explanation given to the manager was one which should have satisfied a bank manager and caused him to refrain from making further inquiries. I think, perhaps, the trouble was that the manager had not really made a study of the position. He had not observed, as I think he should have done in the circumstances, the number of cheques that were coming in and the size of them, and he was not really concerning himself with anything more than to find out the nature of Jeffcott's association with Modern Confections. I do not think that he appreciated the significance of a number of indorsed cheques coming in one after the other, or also the significance that the payments out included substantial sums for cash. If he had, I think that he would have found Jeffcott's story less convincing, for within less than a month Bainbridge had received from people who were presumably his customers cheques amounting to £2,000 or £3,000. Surely a man whose business was on that scale and was done in cheques might have been expected to have a bank account of his own? If he had, and if he wanted Jeffcott to run the financial side of the business for him, why did he not let Jeffcott operate the bank account in Hinckley, where the business was carried on? Why cause the earnings of this business to be paid by this method of indorsement into Jeffcott's private account? The result of such an arrangement was that Jeffcott was handling large sums of money on behalf of Bainbridge, Jeffcott being either an agent or trustee, without Bainbridge being able to exercise any control, and that large sums in cash were being drawn out of what was, in effect, turned into an agency or trust account.

[His Lordship reviewed the evidence with regard to the partnership, and to the cheques indorsed by Bainbridge which had been paid by Jeffcott into his No. 3 account, and continued:] The claim is for damages for conversion of the cheques, which is the usual claim in this type of case. There are, however, two features which deserve attention. First, there is the fact that Bainbridge was not converting something in which he had no interest himself; he was converting the joint property of himself and the plaintiff; and, secondly, there is the fact that this is not a case of a forged or unauthorized indorsement. The cheque is a perfectly good instrument, but Bainbridge had no right or authority to hand it over to Jeffcott and allow it to be paid into the latter's account.

With regard to the first feature, I think it is quite clear that one co-owner can commit an act of conversion in respect of joint property. Of course, the mere fact that he takes possession of it will not be sufficient to amount to a conversion, because he is entitled to the possession of it. Neither party, however, is entitled to exclusive possession, and, if one of the two does an act which can be justified only by the right to exclusive possession, then he converts.

That proposition is illustrated by a number of cases. Wilkinson v. Haygarth [1] was cited in support of it, and I have looked also at Morgan v. Marquis [2] and Farrar v. Beswick,[3] where I think that proposition was made abundantly clear. The point is summarized in Pollock on Partnership, 15th ed., p. 155, in these words: "First, what is a fraudulent conversion of partnership "property to a partner's separate use within the meaning of the "rule? A wilfully dishonest intention, or conduct, which, in the "language of Lord Eldon, adopted by Jessel, M.R., amounts to "stealing the partnership property."

That is what I think Bainbridge was doing on the facts of the present case. In all these matters I have to draw what I consider to be the right inference from the facts as they have been proved in the evidence, bearing in mind that neither side has brought Bainbridge or Jeffcott into the witness-box to give any explanation of his conduct. I think there was some evidence that Bainbridge had disappeared.

The other point is whether the fact that this was a good indorsement makes any difference to the claim for conversion. That situation was considered in A. L. Underwood Ld. v. Bank of Liverpool,[4] which is not dissimilar to the present case. In that case the bank's customer, Underwood, who was the sole director of the plaintiff company, paid into his own private account, instead of into the company's account with another bank, cheques which were drawn on the company, and which he had indorsed on behalf of the company, as he had authority to do.

I start from the point that Underwood had converted the cheques of the company, just as I have already satisfied myself that Bainbridge had converted the cheques of the partnership in the present case. Scrutton L.J. took up the argument at that point in these terms [5]: "If, as appears to be the fact, A. L. "Underwood converted the cheques of the company, I think "the authorities show that the defendant bank by collecting "those cheques and placing the proceeds to A. L. Underwood's

" private account, converted them as against the plaintiff com" pany. There is, no doubt, considerable difficulty in defining the " limits of conversion, where servants or agents do ministerial
" acts in relation to the goods converted in good faith and on " behalf of the apparent owner. The different statements of the " law by Blackburn and Brett JJ., in advising the House of " Lords in Hollins v. Fowler,[6] are proof of this."

Scrutton L.J. then considered some of the authorities and quoted the statement by Lord Chelmsford in Hollins v. Fowler,[6] which is, I think, now generally regarded as the true statement of the position. Lord Chelmsford said[7]: " Any person who, however " innocently, obtains possession of the goods of a person who has " been fraudulently deprived of them, and disposes of them, " whether for his own benefit or that of any other person, is guilty " of a conversion." Scrutton L.J. then went on to say: " Now " bankers who collect borrow from their customers the proceeds " when collected, and in collecting exhaust the operation of the " cheque. These operations have been held to be conversion. . . ." After referring to a number of authorities, Scrutton L.J. said: " Unless therefore the defendant bank can show some excuse in " law, they are guilty of conversion. Their first line of defence " was that as Underwood was acting within his apparent authority, " the fact that he was using that authority for his own benefit was " immaterial, ' the apparent authority was the real authority ': " see per Lord Macnaghten in Bryant, Powis & Bryant v. Quebec " Bank.[8] " After considering that position Scrutton L.J. said[9]: " So in the present case, if the bank were purchasing the cheques " for value, apart from any question of the Bills of Exchange Act, " on finding from the company's documents that the sole director " had authority to indorse cheques on their behalf, it would be " immaterial whether he was using that power for his own benefit, " and privity would be created between the alleged principal and " the bank, so that the property would pass. But in the present " case A. L. Underwood in asking the bank to collect and pay the " proceeds into his private account was not purporting in this " transaction to act as agent for his company, or to create privity " between them and the bank; he was acting and purporting to " act for himself as principal. Just as you cannot ratify the act " of an agent who did not profess to act for you: Keighley, Maxsted " & Co. v. Durant,[10] so in my view you cannot rely on the apparent " authority of an agent who did not profess in dealing with you to " act as agent. This line of defence, in my opinion, fails." Scrutton L.J. then went on to consider the other line of defence under section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which protects bankers who in good faith and without negligence collect crossed cheques for a customer who has no title to them.

That statement of the law, while showing and establishing that, prima facie, the bank in the present case was guilty of a conversion, points also to two of the defences which are open to the bank on a case of this sort, and which Barclays Bank Ld. has in fact relied upon in the present case. The first is an allegation that the bank was a holder for value, or holder in due course. If that were so, since the cheque was properly indorsed—it was not a forgery and it was not a nullity—it would be immaterial that Bainbridge, through the instrumentality of Jeffcott, paid it in for his own benefit and in fraud of the partnership. As Scrutton L.J. said [11]: "in the present case, if "the bank were purchasing the cheques for value, apart from "any question of the Bills of Exchange Act, on finding from "the company's documents that the sole director had authority "to indorse cheques on their behalf, it would be immaterial "whether he was using that power for his own benefit, and "privity would be created between the alleged principal and the "bank, so that the property would pass." If, therefore, the cheques were being taken by the bank as a holder in due course, it could, in my judgment, succeed; and that is one of the three lines of defence upon which the bank relies; but, if that was not the nature of the transaction, if the cheque was being given to the bank, not so that the bank might give value for it, but so that it might collect it as agent, then the actual or apparent authority of Bainbridge to indorse is immaterial. He had no right to deliver the cheque physically to Jeffcott or to the bank. There is, therefore, a conversion, and the bank, unless it can itself set up a good title, must rely upon the defence of section 82. Those are, therefore, two of the defences which are relied upon by the bank in this case.

The third defence (and I think perhaps the one that is most convenient to consider first) is that the plaintiff, as one only of the partners, cannot in this case sue. It is contended on behalf of the bank that it is necessary that both partners should be joined. That is a different point from the one which I have been considering up to now in relation to co-ownership. Let it be assumed, as I have held, that one co-owner can convert the property of another co-owner; nevertheless, it is alleged that, as a matter of procedure, one co-owner cannot sue alone, or that one partner cannot sue alone. Either he must sue in the firm name, if there is a firm name, or, if not, then all the partners must be joined as plaintiffs.

The plaintiff submits that there is no objection to one partner, or one co-owner, suing in respect of his interest in goods—in this case the cheque. The plaintiff concedes that, where the other partner has been fraudulent and where, therefore, the bank would have on any view a good defence against Bainbridge if Bainbridge sued, neither Bainbridge nor any other partner can recover in

Baker v. Barclays Bank Ld.

Devlin J.

respect of Bainbridge's interest. Therefore, the plaintiff concedes that he can in this action recover only half the value of the cheques, but he submits that there is no objection to his recovering that half interest in which he is concerned, and that the fact that Bainbridge, his partner, has been fraudulent is for that purpose irrelevant.

In my judgment, the plaintiff's submission on this point is the right one. I will take, first, the position in relation to co-owners, for after all, the interest of partners in goods which are the partnership property is simply that it is their joint property. I will then consider whether the fact that the co-owners are also partners makes any difference. It has been settled for a very long time past that one of several co-owners of a chattel can sue for conversion, relying upon his own right to possession, and recovering damages according to his interest in the chattel. Thus, in Bloxam v. Hubbard,[12] Lord Ellenborough C.J. held that three out of four co-owners of a ship might recover three-fourths of the value of that ship, saying that each might recover according to his own interest. He said[13]: "As to the first of these objections, assuming it to be well "founded, and we think it so, it has only the effect of precluding "the plaintiffs, who are three out of the four assignees in whom "the property of the ship originally was (and until a new assign- "ment is made under the order of the Lord Chancellor, continues "to be) vested, from recovering more than their three-fourth parts "in value of the property in question. For it is now too well "settled to be any longer disputed in a court of law, that the "defendant can only avail himself of an objection of this sort, "viz. that all the several part owners in a chattel have not "joined in an action of trespass, or of tort brought in respect to "it, by plea in abatement. I will only refer to Addison v. "Overend,[14] in which most of the cases on the subject are "collected; and Sedgworth v. Overend.[15]"

I was also referred in the course of the argument to a statement by Lord Denman C.J. in Wilkinson v. Haygarth,[16] where he said: "The plaintiff can recover such damages only as are "proportionate to his interest in the property. . . ."

Bloxam v. Hubbard[17] makes it plain that the only objection that can be taken to one of several part-owners suing is the procedural objection taken by means of a plea in abatement.

Plea in abatement was a purely procedural matter which has disappeared under the Judicature Acts and has been replaced, if one can call it a replacement, by R.S.C., Order 16, r. 11, which provides: "No cause or matter shall be defeated by reason of the "misjoinder or nonjoinder of parties, and the court may in every "cause or matter deal with the matter in controversy so far as " regards the rights and interests of the parties actually before it." I think that makes it quite plain that, whereas before by plea in abatement one could require as a matter of procedure that all the relevant parties should be brought before the court, now under Order 16, r. 11, it is immaterial to the rights of the parties to the cause or action whether all the proper parties are before the court or not; no cause or matter shall be so defeated, and the court is entitled to deal with the rights and interests of the parties actually before it. The rule goes on to provide, of course, that the court may, at any stage of the proceedings, make such order as might be just with regard to striking out the names of parties who are improperly joined; and then provides that the court may order that " the names of any parties, whether plaintiffs or " defendants, who ought to have been joined, or whose presence " before the court may be necessary in order to enable the court " effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the " questions involved in the cause or matter, be added." But for this rule, no doubt it would be necessary that Bainbridge should have been joined; and, if he refused to join as plaintiff, he should have been joined as defendant. It is now quite plain, however, that it is only if the court considers that it cannot deal effectually and completely with the questions involved in the matter that the court would make an order requiring Bainbridge to be joined.

Mr. McKinnon relied upon Brewer v. Westminster Bank Ld.,[18] but that case is, in my judgment, clearly distinguishable. In that case McNair J. was not concerned with an action by one of two co-owners based on a right of property, but with an action by one of two joint contractors based on a breach of contractual duty. He held that the right under the contract was a certain joint right and, therefore, that the inability of one party to enforce it was fatal to the claim. It destroyed the right, which was indivisible. The authorities which he cited for that proposition related entirely to a claim under contract; he was not concerned with a claim based on a right of property, which is governed by the well-established principles in Bloxam v. Hubbard.[18a]

Mr. McKinnon referred me also to the recent case of Welch v. Bank of England,[19] because he rightly thought that I ought not to be invited to consider Brewer v. Westminster Bank Ld.[20] without considering the observations made on it by Harman J. in the later case. It is sufficient for the purposes of this case that I should say that Welch v. Bank of England[21] appears to be based upon a right of property. It was an action for a declaration that the Bank of England should be required to rectify its register, and it was based, therefore, upon the alleged ownership of the plaintiffs of the stock, and a requisition that the bank should rectify its register according to the true position as to the ownership of the property. It was, therefore, like the case I am now considering, an action based on a right of property.

Mr. McKinnon went on to contend that, whatever the position might be in the case of co-ownership generally, it was different if the co-owners were also partners. I can see no reason in principle why it should be. In Lindley on Partnership, 11th ed., p. 361, the right of a co-owner to sue is considered, and it is not suggested that any different rule applies in the case of a partnership. It is there stated: "An action for the recovery of goods of "the firm or for damages for their loss or injury ought to be "brought in the name of the firm or by all of its members; but if "one only sues he will be entitled to recover damages in respect of "his interest in the goods. . . ."

Mr. McKinnon relied upon the inconvenience that can be caused if one partner were allowed to sue for his own interest, and submitted that in such a case as this the plaintiff ought to have had the partnership wound up before he could proceed; but these considerations appear to me to be procedural only, and not to go to the question whether the plaintiff has a good cause of action. They are all questions which fall to be determined under Order 16, r. 11. Under that rule, the court has ample power to deal, where necessary, with this sort of action either by staying the action until partnership proceedings have been taken or by requiring the other party to be joined; and, no doubt, in the ordinary case of a flourishing partnership, if one partner suddenly took it into his head to sue in respect of his interest in some particular goods, that is the course which the court would take; but I can see no advantage in taking that course in this case. Indeed, I have not been invited to. I have been invited only to find that there is no good cause of action, but in any event I could see no advantage in taking it. There is nothing to be gained by putting the plaintiff in this case to the expense of taking partnership proceedings against Bainbridge and having the partnership wound up, and there is certainly nothing to be gained by requiring that Bainbridge should be joined as a party, since it is common ground that the bank would have a good defence to any claim in respect of Bainbridge's interest.

[His Lordship referred to an allegation that the plaintiff had failed to prove satisfactorily the dissolution of the partnership between himself, Bainbridge and Tattersall, and was therefore entitled to a one-third share only and not of half, said that he accepted evidence that such partnership had been dissolved, and continued:] That, therefore, disposes of the first line of defence; and, in my judgment, the plaintiff is entitled to sue in respect of his interest in the cheques.

I must consider now the other two contentions which were relied upon under the two sections of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. I shall take, first of all, the submission that the bank became a holder in due course. It is based on sections 29 and 30 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. Section 29 (1) defines "a holder in " due course," and reads: " a holder in due course is a holder who " has taken a bill complete and regular on the face of it under the " following conditions; namely . . . (b) That he took the bill in " good faith and for value, and that at the time the bill was " negotiated to him he had no notice of any defect in the title " of the person who negotiated it."

As to the burden of proof on that point, the bank relies upon section 30, which reads: " (1) Every party whose signature " appears on a bill is prima facie deemed to have become a party " thereto for value. (2) Every holder of a bill is prima facie " deemed to be a holder in due course; but if in an action on a " bill it is admitted or proved that the acceptance, issue, or " subsequent negotiation of the bill is affected with fraud, duress, " or force and fear, or illegality, the burden of proof is shifted, " unless and until the holder proves that, subsequent to the " alleged fraud or illegality, value has in good faith been given " for the bill." The bank contends that both Jeffcott and the bank were holders in due course. There is no evidence, apart from his own story to the bank, of how Jeffcott came into possession of the cheques, but it is submitted that, under section 30, he must be presumed to be a holder in due course, until the contrary is proved, and that the contrary has not been proved. I am not prepared, on the evidence that I have, to find that Jeffcott was a party to the fraud. He may or may not have been, and I think that is a point which is left in doubt on the evidence. It is at least possible that he was deceived by Bainbridge as much as the bank were deceived.

I shall consider, therefore, first, the question whether Jeffcott was, on the evidence, a holder in due course. I am not entirely clear how it benefits the bank to establish that he was, but I shall consider the point briefly. I do not think that he was a holder in due course. His story to the bank manager, if it is to be believed, shows that he became a holder merely for the purpose of administering Bainbridge's money, and not in order that he could claim the title to the cheques so that he could deal with the money as he liked. In short, on his own story, he is to be regarded merely as agent or trustee for Bainbridge. If his story is not to be believed, then the proper explanation of any taking by him is that he did not take in good faith. I do not think that the bank can, in the circumstances of this case, successfully rely on section 30 (2). It is, I think, clear, both from the wording of subsection (2) itself and from the authorities that were decided before 1882, that, if fraud is proved at any stage of the transaction, then the burden is shifted. Once I am satisfied, as I am, that the proper inference is that Bainbridge was fraudulent, then the burden is shifted to Jeffcott or to the bank, if it wishes to advance that contention, to prove that Jeffcott took in good faith and for value.

I am certainly not prepared in the state of the evidence to find that he did. As I have said, I do not think there is sufficient evidence in the case for me to find one way or the other as to whether Jeffcott was a party to the fraud or not. That interpretation has been given to the section since the Act in Tatam v. Haslar [22]; but I think it is worth referring to Fitch v. Jones,[23] which was decided before the Act was passed, because Lord Campbell C.J. shows what is the true position of a man in the position of Jeffcott in the present case. Lord Campbell C.J. said [24]: "The other question is one of general importance. It "is, whether in such a case as this it lies on the plaintiff to "show that there was consideration for the indorsements, or on "the defendant to show that there was none; or in other words "whether the facts proved raised a presumption that there was "no consideration. It is clear that, when there is illegality or "fraud shown in a previous holder, a presumption that there is "no consideration for the indorsements does arise; for the person "who is guilty of illegality or fraud, and knows that he cannot "sue himself, is likely to hand over the instrument to some "other person to sue for him. It is not properly that the burden "of proof as to there being consideration is shifted, but that the "defendant, on whom the burden of proof that there was no "consideration lies, has by proving fraud or illegality in the "former holder raised a prima facie presumption that the plaintiff "is agent for that holder, and has therefore, unless that presumption be rebutted, proved that there was no consideration." I think it is plain enough that, on Jeffcott's story in this case, he was a holder simply as agent for Bainbridge, and his whole story is quite inconsistent with his having given consideration.

BAKER v. BARCLAYS BANK LD.

Devlin J.

With regard to the position of the bank itself, it is not suggested that the bank did not take in good faith. It is not suggested that they had any notice of the defect in the title of the person who negotiated it, because "notice" in section 29 (1) (b) means actual notice—a very different question from that which I shall have to consider when I come to section 82 of the Act, and the question whether the bank was negligent. It is not suggested that the bank had actual notice, but merely that it was put on inquiry. What is suggested is that the bank did not give value, and the question arises whether, when a cheque is given to a bank in these circumstances, it takes the cheque giving value for it, then becoming a holder in due course, or whether the bank takes the cheque merely to collect the amount of the cheque for somebody else.

That is a question of fact. The true relationship has to be inferred from the acts of the parties. In this case the only fact which was relied upon by Mr. McKinnon as making the bank a holder in due course was the fact that there was an overdraft on Jeffcott's No. 2, or loan, account. If the accounts had been combined, Jeffcott would have been indebted to the bank and, accordingly, it is said that the bank gave value for it. Mr. McKinnon relied on M'Lean v. Clydesdale Banking Co.[25] This appears on the facts of the present case to be a misconception; since Jones believed, as he says, Jeffcott's story, he must have appreciated that the cheque represented Bainbridge's money, and as such the bank could not possibly take it in satisfaction of Jeffcott's debt. There can, therefore, have been no agreement on the part of the bank to give value by taking it as against an existing indebtedness.

The point was considered in A. L. Underwood Ld. v. Bank of Liverpool.[26] Sometimes it has been suggested that, if the bank credit the customer with the amount of the cheque in his account before it has been cleared, by so doing the bank is giving value. I think that the statement of the position which is now accepted is that made by Atkin L.J.[27] in Underwood's case, where he said that it was not enough to show merely that the bank had entered the value of the cheques on the credit side of the account on the day on which the bank received the cheques. Atkin L.J. went on to say: "To constitute value there must "be in such a case a contract between banker and customer, "express or implied, that the bank will before receipt of the "proceeds honour cheques of the customer drawn against the "cheques." I did not understand Mr. McKinnon (and I have no doubt that he was wise) to put his case on any ground of that sort. It was not suggested to the bank manager in the box that he had entered into any agreement, express or implied, of that character; and I think, indeed, that the point would necessarily have failed, because an agreement of this sort, whether or not it was made through the agency of Jeffcott, would have been an agreement between Bainbridge and the bank for the bank to give value to Bainbridge, since the bank must have regarded him as the true owner of the cheque. There is no evidence of any such agreement, and what the manager's intentions were in respect of Bainbridge's cheques, which he was allowing to be mixed with what he, presumably, supposed to be Jeffcott's own money must necessarily be obscure. I think, therefore, that that defence fails.

I pass now to the third defence, which is under section 82, which I have already summarized. I have already held that, on the facts, the manager was careless in not making inquiries; and under section 82 the burden is upon the bank to prove that the bank received the cheque without negligence; but I have also held that the natural suspicion that one would have expected to be aroused in the manager's mind was the suspicion that Jeffcott was defrauding Bainbridge. I do not think that the manager had any reason in the first instance to suspect that the true owner, or part-owner, was the plaintiff, and that Bainbridge was defrauding a partner. Does that matter when section 82 of the Act puts upon the banker the burden of proving that he took in good faith and without negligence? Must he prove that he was not careless in any respect whatsoever, or is it enough for him if he can show that, although he was careless, his carelessness did not affect the matter; in other words, that the inquiries which he might properly have been expected to make would not have unearthed the true position and would not, therefore, have protected the true owner?

BAKER v. BARCLAYS BANK LD.

Devlin J.

Mr. Brown, for the plaintiff, contended that, as soon as it was established that the bank manager was careless in his failure to make inquiries, the bank's defence under section 82 goes, and it is irrelevant to consider whether such inquiries, if made, would have protected the plaintiff's interest in the cheques. This is a point on which there does not seem to be very much authority, and, in fact, none was cited to me; but there are, I think, one or two dicta which assist Mr. Brown's argument. I refer, first, to an old dictum of Lord Romilly, which I take from A. L. Underwood Ld. v. Bank of Liverpool,[28] where it was quoted by Bankes L.J. Lord Romilly's dictum was made in Jones v. Williams,[29] where he was concerned with the inquiries that ought to be made in regard to mortgages, but Bankes L.J. took it as a general principle which was equally applicable to section 82. Lord Romilly said: "With respect to the argument, that it was unnecessary "to make any inquiry because it would have led to no result, "I think it impossible to admit the validity of this excuse. I "concur in the doctrine of Jones v. Smith,[30] that a false answer, "or a reasonable answer given to an inquiry made, may dispense "with the necessity of further inquiry, but I think it impossible, "beforehand, to come to the conclusion, that a false answer "would have been given, which would have precluded the neces- "sity of further inquiry. A more dangerous doctrine could not "be laid down, nor one involving a more unsatisfactory inquiry, "namely, a hypothetical inquiry as to what A would have said if "B had said something other than what he did say."

In Lloyds Bank Ld. v. E. B. Savory & Co.,[31] which went both to the Court of Appeal and to the House of Lords, there is a dictum by Greer L.J. in the Court of Appeal, and also another relevant dictum by Lord Wright in the House of Lords. In the Court of Appeal Greer L.J. said[32]: "It is, I think, also true to "say that a banker who has not exercised reasonable care cannot "claim the benefit of the section even though it may seem "probable that the exercise of care would not have enabled him "to discover the defective title of his customer. The protection "is given to careful bankers, and any banker who does not "exercise reasonable care is outside the section altogether, even "though he may be able to say: 'If I had exercised care the " ' fraud would not have been discovered.' " Lord Wright in the House of Lords said [33]: " Nor is it any answer to a charge under " section 82 of neglecting a proper precaution, that if it had been " taken it might have been fruitless. Nor does a precaution cease " to be proper for purposes of section 82 merely because, though " generally effective, it may in special circumstances be " ineffectual."

Mr. McKinnon submitted that, accepting (which, of course, he does not do, but on which I have already found against him) that the bank manager was careless in not making inquiries, then all the inquiries which he would have needed to have made would have been those which were necessary to allay suspicion that Jeffcott might be paying Bainbridge's cheques into his own account for the purpose of defrauding Bainbridge. For this purpose, Mr. McKinnon submits that the inquiries could have been limited to verifying that Jeffcott had Bainbridge's authority to act as he did; all that the manager would have needed to have done would have been either to ask for a written authority or to see Bainbridge, and, if he had seen Bainbridge, that is the only point that would have been discussed. It is said that, since Bainbridge himself was fraudulent, then he would obviously have taken part in hoodwinking the manager, and the manager's inquiries would necessarily, therefore, have been fruitless so far as the plaintiff's interests were concerned. But I do not think that, in the light of the dicta which I have quoted, I ought to speculate about what would have happened if the manager had asked to see Bainbridge; and, if I were to speculate, I am not at all sure that the right answer would be that the discussion would have been limited to the points which Mr. McKinnon has, so to speak, put on the agenda. Discussions of this sort may very well roam more widely.

Moreover, I am not satisfied that the only point that the manager ought to have inquired into was whether Jeffcott was acting in fraud of Bainbridge. That was the main point, no doubt, but I think one of the points which he might certainly have been expected to have inquired into, even if it was not his duty to do so (which, I think, perhaps it was), is why Bainbridge wanted to use Jeffcott's account at all. One might have expected the manager to ask whether Bainbridge had a banking account already, and, if not, why he did not create one for himself instead of obtaining his banking facilities by this means, because, after all, the effect of what was being done and what was in fact done later, when, in response to the manager's insistence, the account was put, as he called it, on a proper basis, was that a new account was being created for Bainbridge. Bainbridge was the real customer and it was his money which was being used, through the agency of Jeffcott.

Quite apart from what I should have thought to have been the irregularity of mixing Bainbridge's money with Jeffcott's money, on the story that the manager has told the position was in effect that Bainbridge was having a new banking account created for him, and he was not the bank's customer already. There is no doubt that, in such circumstances, it is either the practice or the duty of the bank to make inquiries from a prospective customer; and the manager, therefore, should have inquired into that aspect of the matter.

BAKER v. BARCLAYS BANK LD.

Devlin J.

I observe a passage in Lord Wright's speech in Lloyds Bank v. E. B. Savory & Co. in which there is a reference to that point. He said [34]: "It is now recognized to be the usual practice of bankers "not to open an account for a customer without obtaining a "reference and without inquiry as to the customer's standing; a "failure to do so at the opening of the account might well prevent "the banker from establishing his defence under section 82 if a "cheque were converted subsequently in the history of the "account." If the manager had made inquiries of that sort about Bainbridge, it is, in my judgment, impossible to say whither they might not have led. I know nothing about Bainbridge. I do not know what his capacity for deceit is and whether he would have succeeded in lulling the manager is a mere matter of speculation. He might have deceived him or he might not.

I do not think that in this case I need go so far as to hold that every failure to make proper inquiries, whether or not they appear to be material, is fatal to a defence under section 82. I do not think it is necessary that I should hold that such carelessness is fatal even if the bank can affirmatively show that the failure was immaterial; but, in my judgment, if a bank manager fails to make inquiries which he should have made, there is at the very least a heavy burden upon him to show that such inquiries could not have led to any action which could have protected the interests of the true owner; and that burden the bank has, in my judgment, failed to discharge in this case.

Accordingly, all three of the defences relied upon by the bank fail, except to the extent, which is conceded, that the amount claimed must be reduced by half. There will be judgment for the plaintiff for half the amount claimed, that is to say, for £580 8s. 3d., with costs.

Master and Servant — Employment of servant of another — Invitee or employee — Full-time hiring of lorry and driver over prolonged period—Methods of loading and unloading under supervision and control of hirer—Liability of hirer for unsafe system of unloading.

The plaintiff was a lorry driver employed by British Road Services, who paid him his wages and had the sole right of dismissing him. Over a long period of years he had been engaged in carrying loads under the control of the defendants between their various depots. The loading and unloading of his lorry was done under the supervision of the defendants, who supplied the necessary equipment, but the plaintiff had control of the actual stowing of the load upon his lorry. The plaintiff's lorry was marked with the defendants' initials, and there was no indication of its true ownership. On January 1, 1953, while unloading his lorry at one of the defendants' depots, the plaintiff was injured through the obviously unsafe system of work of the defendants:—

Held, that, in the circumstances, the plaintiff was not merely an invitee, but was entitled to the same standard of care as if he had been the defendants' employee; accordingly, the defendants were liable to the plaintiff in negligence.

London Graving Dock Co. Ld. v. Horton [1951] A.C. 737; [1951] 1 T.L.R. 949; [1951] 2 All E.R. 1 distinguished.

ACTION.

The plaintiff was a lorry driver employed by British Road Services at their depot at Kearsley. At this depot British Road Services had continued a practice originated by their predecessors which had been carried on for 12 or 14 years. A certain number of the lorries at Kearsley including the plaintiff's were occupied whole-time upon transport for the defendants, Imperial Chemical Industries Ld. The name upon these particular lorries was "I.C.I." and there was no reference upon them to their ownership by British Road Services. Nevertheless the drivers were in fact the servants of British Road Services. For a considerable time the plaintiff had been employed upon this work. Each morning on the defendants' instructions he drove his lorry from Kearsley to one of their depots where he picked up a load. The stowing of the load upon the lorry was left to the driver's discretion. He then carried the load to another depot of the defendants where he unloaded it. The nature of the load and the methods of loading and unloading were under the supervision and direction of the persons in charge at the defendants' depots.

On January 1, 1953, the plaintiff took a load of 23 drums of a chemical called terylene, manufactured by the defendants, from one of their depots to their terylene plant at Thornton-le-Fylde. Each drum weighed 300 lb. and measured approximately 3 ft.

long by 2 ft. wide. There were no handles or lugs by which to hold the drums. The drums were stowed on the plaintiff's lorry in three tiers, those in the bottom tier standing upright. For 10 years or more it had been the defendants' practice to have such drums delivered at the unloading bay of the Thornton-le-Fylde depot, where there were proper facilities for unloading, but which was nearly a quarter of a mile from the terylene plant, but later the defendants decided to have the drums delivered by British Road Services direct to the plant. On January 1, 1953, the defendants had provided unloading equipment which was rolled up to the tail of the lorry and which consisted of a mechanical platform supported upon a column. The platform could be moved up or down the column to accord with the height of the article to be moved but its maximum height was 6 ft. 2 in. above the ground. This was only a few inches above the deck of the plaintiff's lorry. Since the platform could not be raised higher, the plaintiff had to stand on it to lower drums from the two top tiers down on to himself until they reached the platform. The platform itself was 5 ft. long by 3 ft. wide so that there was insufficient room for another person to stand upon it to assist the plaintiff at this stage of the unloading. The plaintiff had manoeuvred one drum from the top tier on to the platform and was engaged in getting down a drum from the second tier, trying to hold it by the edges and to slide it down upon himself, when it "kicked" as it came down; the plaintiff fell on to the floor and the drum fell on his back and severely injured him. He claimed damages against the defendants for personal injuries arising out of their negligent method of unloading the drums.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 9. OLIVER J. stated the facts and continued: I have to decide in the circumstances whether Imperial Chemical Industries Ld., who are the only defendants, are liable for the accident. A number of questions arise. The first is whether this was a reasonably safe or a dangerous method of unloading the heavy drums, dangerous in the sense of involving anyone who was responsible for this method in negligence. Secondly, assuming that it was dangerous in this sense, are the defendants liable? What duty did they owe to the plaintiff in the circumstances? Is he, as was contended for the defendants, only an invitee, so as to come within the decision of the House of Lords in London Graving Dock Co. Ld. v. Horton,[1] or, on the facts of the present case, do the defendants owe him a larger duty than that owed to an invitee? Do they owe him the duty of an employer? I do not think that it is necessary to enlarge on what Horton's case [1] decided. It caused great doubt and difficulty in the various tribunals before which it came. It was eventually decided in that case that the only duty owed to an invitee is that, if an unusual danger exists in and about the work, he is to be warned of it unless it is obvious that he knows of it. Whatever danger there was in this case was obvious and the plaintiff knew of it. The question is whether the circumstances here fall within the principle of Horton's case.[1]

The third question is whether, on the assumption that the defendants owed the plaintiff the duty of employers in the circumstances, the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. So far as contributory negligence in the actual performance of this task is concerned, I clearly find that he was not negligent and I do not think it was really suggested that he was. An attempt to handle such a weight as 300 lb. single-handed, upon a narrow platform, without any appliances and without even handles or lugs by which to steady it, could obviously result in an accident to the man involved, in spite of his using the very best endeavours, which I have no doubt this very good workman did.

[His Lordship reviewed the evidence upon the issue whether or not the method adopted by the defendants for unloading the drums was negligent, held that it was, and continued:] The main issue is the extent of the duty owed to the plaintiff in these circumstances by the defendants. The plaintiff was not in the employ of the defendants in so far as they did not pay him, they did not engage him, and could not dismiss him. He was in fact the servant of British Road Services.

There is in this case what seems to me to be a very special set of facts, and I have come to the conclusion that these facts distinguish this case from Horton's case.[2] Here was no casual employment of a British Road Services' lorry by the defendants. For 12 or 14 years it had been the practice for a number of lorries at the Kearsley depot, including the plaintiff's lorry, to be hired by the defendants on a whole-time basis. Apparently for years the plaintiff and many other lorry drivers used to come out in the morning from the Kearsley depot and go to a depot of the defendants where they were to pick up some load and, according to the instructions of the defendants given at the time, take it to some other depot of theirs. Even the name on these lorries was "I.C.I." There was no reference upon them to the fact that they belonged to British Road Services. Whoever was in charge at the defendants' loading depot would decide what load was to be taken and the driver would load it under his supervision and direction. The driver, of course, would decide how the load was to be stowed upon his lorry and I suppose if he thought the load was so big as to be dangerous he could have refused to load. The same could be said of his ordinary employers; if they told him

O'REILLY v. IMPERIAL CHEMICAL INDUSTRIES LTD.

to do something which he thought was dangerous he could refuse to do it. Subject to that, however, he was entirely under the direction of whoever was in charge of the defendants' depot.

I come to the particular journey on which the accident took place. The plaintiff loaded the 23 drums of terylene, the ordinary load, and he used the ordinary stow. He went to the Thornton-le-Fylde depot with the load and, following the universal practice, whatever load he took there, he went first to the storeman to get instructions as to the part of the depot in which to deliver the drums.

[His Lordship described the three methods prescribed by the defendants at different times for unloading the drums of terylene, including that in use at the time of the accident, and continued:] Each of the methods of unloading, as Mr. Nelson pointed out, was inaugurated by the defendants. Just as they were in control of the loading, so they were in control of the unloading, except that the plaintiff could have said "I am not going to use that "machine; I am going to take my load back home to Kearsley," which was about 50 miles away. Had he done so the plaintiff would have wasted the day and would probably have been dismissed when he got there for not doing what the defendants had told him to do.

Mr. Forrest, on the other hand, contended that Horton's case [3] completely covered this case. He submitted that where a man was engaged, paid and was dismissible by some other employer, then, whatever the circumstances, whatever the history, he was a mere invitee. I use the phrase "mere invitee" because in the present case it seems to me to be appropriate—an invitee is in a much worse position so far as this sort of matter is concerned than an employee. How difficult is this particular tract of legal country is illustrated by Horton's case [3] itself. In that case Lynskey J., who tried it, found for the defendants on the ground that the plaintiff knew of the danger and, being an invitee and not in the defendants' employment, could not succeed. All three Lords Justices who heard the appeal [4] reversed the decision of Lynskey J. I have only to mention that the three included Tucker L.J. In the House of Lords,[5] by a majority of three to two, the judgment of Lynskey J. was restored. Thus it happened in that case, as necessarily in others, that the opinion of four judicial authorities triumphed over five, if that is the right expression. Nonetheless, the decision in the House of Lords is the law and, if I thought it applied to these facts, I would of course be bound by it.

With considerable hesitation I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is right and that in the present case, by reason of all the circumstances, the defendants owed him the same duty as regards appliances and system of work as if he had, in fact, been their own employee. They were his employers in every respect except that they did not pay him and could not dismiss him. If that be the true relation, it would be entirely wrong to say he was guilty of contributory negligence if all that he did was to try to work a negligent system devised by his employers or quasi-employers. Therefore, there must be judgment for him.

Legal Aid — Costs — Divorce — Attendance of petitioner — Petitioner's evidence disbelieved—Meaning of "vexatious"—Medical witness—Direction of area committee as to fee—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 49), s. 51—Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949 (12, 13 & 14 Geo. 6, c. 51), Sch. III—Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (S.I. 1950, No. 1359), reg. 14 (5).

After hearing the evidence given on behalf of both parties in a contested divorce suit, which lasted several days, in which each charged the other with cruelty, the prayer of the answer was rejected and the petition dismissed. The court found that the wife petitioner, an assisted person, had told a false story and deceived her solicitors. On a taxation of the wife's costs under the provisions of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, the registrar refused to allow her the expenses of her attendance. On a summons to review the taxation:—

Held, that notwithstanding the view taken of her evidence, her conduct had not been such as to disentitle her to her expenses, for she had not presented her case "vexatiously and improperly" so as to occasion "a wanton and unnecessary increase in the amount of "costs."

Observations in Allen v. Allen and D'Arcy (1860) 2 Sw. & Tr. 107 distinguished.

Bock
v.
Bock.

P. R. Hollins for the petitioner.

R. J. Harvey as amicus curiae for the Law Society.

Argument was in chambers.

Karminski J.:—This is an application by an unsuccessful wife petitioner, for a review of taxation of costs made by Mr. Registrar Townley Miller. There are three items which were queried, of which the first two relate to the doctor's fees for attendance at court and for his medical report. The third matter relates to the expenses of the petitioner herself for attending court in what turned out to be a prolonged hearing of cross-charges of cruelty.

After a long and full hearing, Mr. Commissioner Edgedale found that the parties had both failed to establish cruelty, rejected the prayer in the answer and dismissed the petition. The wife's charges of cruelty were largely though not entirely based on sexual matters. She complained that her husband had against her will indulged in the practice of flagellation and had made a number of attempts to commit sodomy upon her. Those complaints or charges were rejected by the commissioner who pointed out that they were not proved to his satisfaction and that so far as the attempted sodomy was concerned they were in substance largely uncorroborated. There was some corroboration that the husband had in his possession at one time a whip, but the commissioner had the correspondence before him which had a negative importance at least in that it made it clear that the wife at the material times was not in any way complaining of the husband's conduct.

The commissioner seems to have formed a very poor opinion of the credibility of the evidence of both parties. If possible I think that he disbelieved the wife even more than he did the husband; but in the end he came to the conclusion on the evidence that both had failed to establish their charges.

A doctor gave evidence on behalf of the wife and in accordance with the practice under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, the doctor was called and his fee approved under the regulations made by the area committee. [His Lordship referred to regulation 14 (5) [1] of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, and continued:] In this case the area committee sanctioned the payment of 10 guineas to the doctor for his attendance together with 3 guineas for the report.

[1] Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, reg. 14 (5): "Where it "appears to an assisted person's solicitor necessary for the proper conduct of the proceedings either— "(a) to obtain a report or opinion of "one or more experts or to tender "expert evidence in a case of a class "not included in any general authority under the foregoing paragraph; "or (b) in a case of a class so included, to pay a higher fee than that "stated by the Law Society or to "obtain the report or opinion of more "than one expert or to tender the "expert evidence of more than one "person, he may apply to the appropriate Area Committee for authority "so to do and if the Area Committee "give authority they shall state the "maximum number of reports or "opinions that may be obtained, or "the maximum number of persons "who may be tendered to give expert "evidence, and the maximum total "fee to be paid therefor."

At first the registrar in taxation found those figures too high, but on objection he allowed the figures claimed, namely 10 guineas and 3 guineas, so that in effect this present appeal is not concerned with the amounts which the registrar has now seen fit to allow in taxation.

When this matter came before me originally I appreciated that it might be one of some importance to the Law Society, who are charged by statute with the administration and carrying out of the Legal Aid scheme, and I therefore adjourned it so that they should have the chance if they so desired to appear here. They have taken advantage of that offer and I would like to say at once that I have had very great assistance from Mr. Harvey, who appeared as amicus curiae on the instructions of the Law Society, and who has called my attention not only to regulations which I have already mentioned but also to provisions dealing with remuneration made under the Third Schedule of the Act itself.

I say no more about this question of the amount of the doctor's fees, because in fact there is now no dispute between the petitioner and her solicitors on the one hand and the registrar on the other. But it is I think desirable, and I say no more than this, that when fees of this kind go for taxation the attention of the registrar or taxing officer should be drawn not only of course to the regulations under the Act with which he is no doubt familiar, but also to any direction made by the area committee concerned in sanctioning the attendance of medical or other expert witnesses and also stipulating the maximum fee to be paid for that professional work. I say that only for this reason: that I do not know in this case when the matter came before the registrar whether or not his attention was drawn to what had been done in pursuance of its duties by the area committee.

I now turn briefly to what I may call the live element of complaint in this summons.

The petitioner attended court throughout the hearing and was of course the most important witness on her own behalf. As the registrar pointed out, the commissioner did not accept at any rate the major part of her story, and he, the registrar, disallowed her expenses for attending the court.

It appears that when the matter was before the registrar on taxation he had not the advantage, which I have now, of being able to study a transcript of the judgment given at the trial by Mr. Commissioner Edgedale. What the commissioner found was that the petitioner had told a false story, that she had deceived her solicitors, though he did not for a moment suggest that the solicitors' conduct was in the slightest degree to be the subject of examination or criticism: nobody has suggested that they have acted throughout otherwise than perfectly properly. The registrar said that the commissioner disbelieved her, and his attention was called to a recent judgment of Havers J. on the question of taxation in Gibbs v. Gibbs.[2] Havers J. made it clear[3] that the petitioner's fee for attendance in court and expenses was a permissible item; and he referred to an older case, Harbin v. Gordon,[4] in which Buckley L.J. had pointed out[5] that the plaintiff, that being a common law action, "as a party "litigant, was not entitled to any allowance, but as a witness he "was entitled to an allowance like any other witness, and none "the less because he was also a party litigant."

In the course of his judgment in Gibbs v. Gibbs[6] Havers J. referred to Allen v. Allen and D'Arcy.[7] That was a case of very different facts from the present one. It was tried in 1859 soon after the creation of the Divorce Court. There the jury had found a wife guilty of adultery in the face of her denials, but had also found that the petitioner had been guilty of connivance, a verdict which I understand the court, consisting of the Judge Ordinary, Sir Creswell Creswell, Watson B., and Hill J. concurred. In dealing with the question of a review of taxation as to whether or not the expenses of the wife could be taxed, the Judge Ordinary pointed out that the court in which he was then presiding had only recently come into existence, and that the question of the principle on which costs are to be taxed in matrimonial suits had not yet been settled, though he apprehended that he must adopt the principles of the Ecclesiastical Courts. He added:[8] "I think that the only limit which can with pro- "priety be put upon the allowance of the costs of the different "issues raised in this court is this: where the taxing officer is "satisfied that an issue has been vexatiously and improperly put "on the record, so as to occasion a wanton and unnecessary "increase in the amount of costs, he is not to allow the costs of "that issue. The party guilty of putting such an issue on the "record must take the consequences and lose his costs; but "that is the only limit."

The registrar in the present case applied those words here, and expressed the view that the petitioner must have known that what she said was false, and thus, he says, her conduct was wanton. He also added with complete accuracy that the case had already cost the public a lot of money. In my view the cost to the public is a separate consideration which should not affect the discretion in deciding whether or not this woman was in the words of the Judge Ordinary in Allen v. Allen and D'Arcy[8] presenting her case "vexatiously and improperly"—that is, putting on the record an improper charge so as to occasion "a "wanton and unnecessary increase in the amount of costs."

I of course follow entirely that the commissioner who tried this case disbelieved the wife; and having regard to the nature of the charges it is of course quite obvious that this woman was telling a great deal less than the truth and in some matters was guilty of invention; but that I think is not the same as raising an issue wantonly and vexatiously. As Mr. Harvey pointed out, the word "vexatious" has indeed a statutory meaning: see Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, section 51, where the word "vexatious" is preceded by the words "has "habitually and persistently and without any reasonable ground "instituted vexatious legal proceedings."

BOCK v. BOCK.

KARMINSKI J.

I have come to the conclusion that the registrar here misdirected himself in expressing his view in those terms of the wife's conduct in raising these matters and in proceeding to trial on them. It is not every unsuccessful litigant in matrimonial suits who is of necessity because of his failure, "a vexatious and "wanton litigant."

I do not in any way desire to be ever thought to be criticizing the expressions which the commissioner used in respect of this woman's unreliability as a witness; I have not the slightest doubt that she was very unsatisfactory, but I do not think that this is a case where because her evidence was disbelieved on these charges she must as it were automatically be deprived of any chance of recovering costs in respect of her attendance as a witness.

I have come to the conclusion that this is a case where the registrar has gone wrong in principle. If this was only a case of an exercise of his judicial discretion I could not, nor indeed would I, interfere with it; but in my view he has misdirected himself on the question of principle and I think that the matter must go back to him or to some other registrar with a direction to review the matter and to allow such sum by way of costs on the issue here as he may think right and proper.

[His Lordship then made an order for taxation under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, in respect of the summons.]

KARMINSKI J. said that the rule should be interpreted as meaning that such ex parte applications should, in the first instance, be made to the registrar unless the matter was clearly one which merited an application to the judge direct.

Should the registrar, on an ex parte application under the rule, consider that the matter was one which should be dealt with by a judge, he had power under rule 60 of the Non-Contentious Probate Rules, 1954, so to direct.

[Reported by H. EIFION ROBERTS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

1949 (when the mother died) the brother was resident abroad and so the accused obtained probate and became responsible for administering the estate.

By 1953 the brother was dissatisfied with the accused's administration. After an earlier abortive proceeding he took out an originating summons in the Chancery Division in January, 1954. An order was made requiring the accused to lodge certain accounts and a statement as to outstanding property verified by affidavit. The accused failed to comply with the order and a writ of attachment was issued. Subsequently the attachment was discharged and a renewal order made. Again the accused failed to comply; a further writ of attachment was issued, and the accused was re-arrested on June 8, 1954.

On September 22, 1954, while still in prison, the accused swore an affidavit in which he disclosed for the first time that he had converted to his own use certain assets comprised in his mother's estate which were due to his brother.

The accused was indicted on three separate charges of fraudulent conversion contrary to section 21 of the Larceny Act, 1916, but before plea counsel on his behalf moved to quash the indictment in reliance upon section 43 (2) of the Larceny Act, 1916:—

Held, (1) that the originating summons taken out by the brother was a proceeding bona fide instituted by a person aggrieved; that the orders requiring the accused to lodge a statement as to outstanding property verified by affidavit were a "compulsory "process" within the meaning of section 43 (2), for section 43 (2) deprived him of his right to object that his evidence would tend to incriminate him; and that as the accused made his incriminating disclosure for the first time in an affidavit sworn in consequence of that compulsory process, section 43 (2) applied and the accused must be discharged.

(2) That the motion to quash the indictment was properly made before plea.

MOTION to quash indictment.

The accused was indicted on three separate charges of fraudulently converting to his own use certain property of which he was trustee, contrary to section 21 of the Larceny Act, 1916. Counsel for the accused moved to quash the indictment before plea in reliance upon section 43 (2) [1] of the Act.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment.

G. G. Lind-Smith for the Crown.

Robin David for the accused.

No cases were cited in argument other than those referred to in the judgment.

[1] Larceny Act, 1916, s. 43 (2): "No person shall be liable to be convicted of any offence against sections 6, 7 (1), 20, 21 and 22 of this Act upon any evidence whatever in respect of any act done by him, if at any time previously to his being charged with such offence he has first disclosed such act on oath, in consequence of any compulsory process of any court of law or equity in any action, suit, or proceeding which has been bona fide instituted by any person aggrieved."

REGINA v. MAYWHORT.

SELLERS J. read section 43 (2) of the Larceny Act, 1916, and continued: The procedure for bringing before the court the reliance on section 43 was discussed by counsel for the prosecution and counsel for the prisoner, and it seemed to me appropriate, although there is no clear precedent to which I have been referred, that a motion to quash could and should be taken before plea and at the outset of the case, because if this submission is correct the court would have no jurisdiction to try the case. If it were tried it would be a nullity if the plea later succeeded.

In regard to the evidence which is to be adduced, and the manner of its presentation on such an application, counsel for the accused in the present case was content to rely on the evidence in the depositions taken before the magistrates and the documents which were exhibited, but it may be, though it is not necessary to decide it in this case, that other evidence might be brought before the court on such a motion to quash because, notwithstanding anything that may have been revealed by the accused person in any proceedings such as those referred to under section 43, the charges in an indictment might well be supported by evidence independent of that, and although that is so, the section itself expressly states that the person, if he comes within the section, shall not be liable to be convicted upon any evidence whatever in respect of any act done by him.

The evidence upon which the submission is made is derived very largely from the documents, and to a minor extent from the depositions. It appears that the accused was, jointly with his brother, appointed to be an executor and trustee of his mother's will. The will was made in 1949, shortly before the testatrix died on April 20, 1949. His brother apparently was abroad and the accused, who was a solicitor, took out probate and made himself liable for administering the estate according to law. The documents showing the extent of the estate were prepared and submitted by him.

The will provided, after a legacy, that the whole of the residue of the estate both real and personal should be devised and bequeathed to the trustees upon the customary trust to call in and convert, and that the proceeds should be divided between the accused and his brother. By 1953 the brother, who was abroad, was dissatisfied with the administration of this estate and consulted a solicitor and, starting with a letter of January 14, 1953, certain correspondence followed. The brother's solicitor on January 14, 1953, wrote to the accused: "We have been instructed "by your brother to take charge of his interest so far as his "mother's estate is concerned, and will you please let us have "at once particulars of the estate and transfers to transfer one half "of the investments." Correspondence continued for some time on a very unsatisfactory basis for the brother, so much so that by August of 1953 the brother was advised to take proceedings, and on October 21, 1953, an originating summons was taken out in the Chancery Division in the customary form.

On December 23, 1953, the summons came for consideration before Upjohn J. in chambers in London, when apparently the defendant did not appear. It was then ordered that the estate of Alice Maywhort, the deceased, should be administered by the court, and some consequential orders were made directing an account to be taken by the district registrar of Manchester. Those proceedings proved unsatisfactory.

On January 14, 1954, a further summons was heard in London before Harman J. in Chancery chambers. Again the defendant did not appear, and an order dated January 19, 1954, required the defendant on or before 4 o'clock on the afternoon of Friday, February 12, to lodge at the district registry in Manchester four different accounts which were specified, and in particular, as far as this case is concerned, under heading No. 5, to lodge a statement showing what parts, if any, of the testatrix's property were outstanding or undisposed of, and where any parts of such property outstanding and undisposed of were subject to any and what encumbrances, and in each case it was ordered that it should be verified by an affidavit and all payments were to be properly vouched.

Notwithstanding that, the district registrar at Manchester had to certify that certain accounts which had been lodged had not been verified by affidavit, and on March 4, 1954, before Harman J. in London, proceedings were taken to enforce the accused to comply with the order of the court. Harman J. ordered that the plaintiff, that is, the brother, should be at liberty to issue a writ of attachment against the accused for his contempt in not having lodged the accounts and statement which he was ordered to do and, as a result of that, on March 8 the accused was arrested and put into prison. That is a step which the court is entitled and empowered to take when a man deliberately flouts his obligations to the court and fails to comply with its order.

When in prison the accused wrote a letter dated March 11, 1954, expressing his extreme regret that he had neglected to comply with the order. He undertook within one month of his release to furnish the accounts and he apologised to the court. The matter was referred back to Harman J. in London, and by an order dated March 23, 1954, the attachment of imprisonment for contempt of court was discharged and the accused was released from prison.

However, notwithstanding that experience the accused still failed to carry out his obligations and, in particular, to make an affidavit in respect of the five matters which have been specified and a renewal order in the same terms was made on April 23, 1954, by Danckwerts J. in Chancery chambers. The accused was again ordered to lodge with the court by a particular date a statement showing what property was outstanding and how it had been disposed of, and in each case to verify what he said by affidavit; and all payments were to be properly vouched. On that, apparently, some further accounts were produced, but again without the affidavit, and by June 3 the matter came back to Danckwerts J. for a second time.

REGINA v. MAYWHORT.

Sellers J.

An order was made that the brother should be at liberty to issue a writ of attachment against the accused for his contempt of court in failing to carry out that order, and on June 8 the accused was again arrested. Now that was on similar grounds to those causing his original imprisonment because in contempt of court he had failed to carry out the court's order and, in particular, to state the position of the estate which he was administering with regard to property which was outstanding or undisposed of. If he had made that statement it would have meant that he would have had to reveal what the true position was. He was arrested because he refused to make such a statement, and the arrest was to enforce compliance with the court's order.

The accused remained imprisoned under that order for a considerable time and it was not until well into September that his position was considered by the official solicitor acting on his behalf. It was thought fit to go and see him and a representative of the solicitor went along with another solicitor, who was a commissioner for oaths, with a prepared affidavit, which the accused swore on September 22, 1954. In the course of that affidavit he made what is here said to be the first disclosure of any act done by him which amounted to wrongdoing of the nature which is alleged in the indictment on which he now stands charged.

In the course of that affidavit the accused stated that he had been detained in Strangeways Prison, Manchester, for 14 weeks and upwards by order of the court of June 3; that he was sorry that he had not carried out the order and prepared in proper and suitable form the accounts ordered to be produced; but that he had no money to do that. The vital paragraph is paragraph 4, which reads: "Save that I have paid to the plaintiff sundry small sums "on account of his share in the estate of my mother, the said "Alice Maywhort, deceased, I confess that I have converted to "my own use all other assets comprised in the said estate as "aforesaid, and save the dwelling-house known as No. 10, "Swan Bank, Congleton, in the County of Chester. I am unable "to estimate the value of this dwelling-house, but I do not think "the proceeds of sale of such dwelling-house would satisfy the "share in the estate to which my brother is entitled. There are, "however, no other assets in the said estate remaining over, and "there are no other assets in the said estate to which I could "make good my brother his share."

He craved to be released from prison, saying that it was impossible in the circumstances related to comply with the order, and humbly submitting that, as he had appropriated to his own use such assets as he had, in all the circumstances such accounts prepared would be needless expense, and that as he was personally unable to meet them he should be released.

That was subsequently brought before the court but the accused remained in prison. He was seen on October 14, still in prison, by a detective sergeant who was then investigating the charges which have given rise to this indictment; and as late as October 21 he was still in prison. On March 29, 1955, he was charged before the magistrates with these offences and he comes before the court on bail.

It has been admitted by counsel for the prosecution that the affidavit of September 22, 1954, did disclose for the first time that the accused had converted to his own use the property which was due to his brother, and the question arises whether section 43 has the effect which it is submitted it has by counsel for the accused. Was this disclosure in that affidavit "in "consequence of any compulsory process of any court of law or "equity in any action, suit, or proceeding, which has been bona "fide instituted by any person aggrieved"? The originating summons to which I have referred was certainly a proceeding which was bona fide instituted by the brother who was a person aggrieved. Was the disclosure in consequence of the orders to which I have referred, particularly the final order, which gave rise to his second term of imprisonment? In those proceedings there was that order in which the accused was required to give information on affidavit. The information which was ordered by the court could, but for the special provisions of section 43 and the fact that he was a trustee, have been refused.

In the ordinary way a party to a cause can refuse to give evidence which would tend to incriminate him if he can satisfy the court that that would be a possible or likely effect of his answer. It is quite clear here that this evidence would have incriminated him, but for section 43 (2) which effectively deprived him of the right to take objection that it would do so. He was, therefore, bound because of section 43 (2) to answer the order made by the court and the judge could not excuse him and say that he was not bound because he was protected by the general rule of law and he himself could make no claim to such protection.

The object of this very special section, which may serve to let a party who has committed a fraud escape criminal punishment, would appear to be to benefit beneficiaries and persons aggrieved.

A trustee cannot hide behind any privilege of non-disclosure of incriminating evidence. The section, in effect, makes it obligatory upon him to disclose the true facts. If he refuses to do that it leaves power in the court to enforce their production by imprisonment, of which this case is a striking example, because on two occasions the court (which only does this when it is forced to by the action of a party) had to invoke its supreme powers of placing the accused in custody. The fact that the court could do so seems to me to be due to this provision that he was bound to disclose that which would, and in the result did, incriminate him.

REGINA v. MAYWHORT.

Sellers J.

Therefore, it seems to me, on the face of it, that this section, having operated in that way so that the accused was compelled to disclose to the court his wrongdoing, can be invoked so as to protect him from being liable to conviction on the matters which he then first disclosed. That is dependent on the interpretation of section 43, which states that the disclosure on oath which is relied on must be in consequence of any compulsory process of any court of law or equity. It was submitted by counsel for the prosecution that the disclosure on the affidavit to which I have referred was not in consequence of any compulsory process. There certainly was a compulsory process. I know of no greater compulsory process which is in the hands of the civil court than to do what was done here. The accused was ordered to comply with the five matters in the order made against him. Because he did not do that he was imprisoned.

It is true that he could have stayed in prison but if he wanted to get out of prison he had to make some submission to the court in order to be released and it is customarily made by affidavit, as was done here. He was imprisoned in order to compel him to comply with the order. His affidavit was in consequence of that compulsory process which was imposed upon him. Its purpose, no doubt its main motive, was that he should be released from prison; but it was in consequence of his imprisonment and the fact that in order to get out he had to show good grounds that he then did reveal for the first time what the true position was.

I think it would be hair-splitting to accept the argument that there was a difference between that affidavit which he put in to escape the burden under which he was suffering and the position which would have obtained if he had at the same time made the same disclosure in an affidavit in strict compliance with the order. I think in either case they should be held to be in consequence of the heavy compulsion which the court found it necessary to impose upon him.

Counsel for the prosecution took a second point that what was disclosed was not " any act done by him " as contemplated by section 43 (2), because it was only a general statement of the accused's wrongdoing and did not show it in particularity. I do not think that is a submission which can stand. It may be that what has been disclosed—which really shows that the whole of the estate has gone to the accused except for those small items at the outset paid to his brother—may not give sufficient evidence for those interested in the brother's share to follow, if they can, the proceeds of the sale of the shares of the estate. That can, perhaps, be ascertained in a different way.

Section 43 (2) was obviously invoked in order to justify the imprisonment for contempt of court (the defendant having no ground for refusing to comply with the court order), and I think its counter-effect is that it can be invoked now to defeat these present charges because it provides that " no person shall be liable " to be convicted for any offence under section 21," if he has disclosed for the first time the matters which give rise to the charge in circumstances to which the section applies.

[His Lordship discharged the accused.]

I think I ought to make reference to two cases which counsel for the defendant submitted were both distinguishable. I think they clearly are. Rex v. Noel[1] arose under different circumstances. A trustee who came within the provisions of the section of the Act then existing, which was to the same effect, gave evidence in a civil action brought against him, and in the course of the cross-examination he did, apparently for the first time, reveal criminal conduct, and the similar section was sought to be invoked, both at the trial and in the Court of Criminal Appeal, to make the proceedings ineffective. The headnote of the case reads thus: " When an act done by a person is first disclosed by " him without making any objection during cross-examination in " a civil action, it is not disclosed by him ' in consequence of any " ' compulsory process ' of a court of law, within the meaning of " section 85 of the Larceny Act, 1861, and he is liable to be " convicted. . . ."

The basis of the decision given by Ridley J. on behalf of the whole court is that the accused man was a voluntary witness. " It seems to us " he said,[2] " that the expression ' compulsory " ' process,' in section 85, signifies something more than the mere " putting of a question to a witness which he may not wish to " answer. If there were a compulsory examination, as in bank- " ruptcy, or by interrogatories, or by a bill of equity, that would " be a compulsory process of a court of law or equity." But in the course of his judgment Ridley J. said[2]; " Also, possibly, " if a witness claims the privilege of refusing to answer a question " because his answer may tend to criminate him, and the court " orders him to answer the question, that may be a ' compulsory " ' process ' of the court within the meaning of section 85. We " do not, however, desire to decide that point, as it is not necessary " to do so in the present case. In this case no such privilege " was claimed, and it is not necessary for us to go further than " to say that, where evidence is given voluntarily by a witness in " proceedings in a court of law or equity, it is not given ' in " ' consequence of any compulsory process of a court of law or " ' equity,' within the meaning of section 85." That question was not decided. The decision in the case was on a narrow ground, because it would appear that where the then section 85 and the present section 43 (2) apply, a witness could take no objection that an answer would criminate him. It would not be a valid objection. The appropriate section rules it out. Neither would it be within the compass of the judge, who so often does give a warning, to give a witness any warning that he need not give an answer which would incriminate him.

REGINA v. MAYWHORT.

Sellers J.

In the present case, of course, the accused person did all he could in the proceedings to avoid answering. It was only under the experience of imprisonment that he made any answer at all.

In Rex v. Tuttle[3] a similar point was taken in a case of fraudulent conversion. The answer in that case, as appears from the judgment of Avory J., who gave the judgment of the court, was that so far from the evidence of the accused person disclosing an act which rendered him liable to be charged with a criminal offence, the matter that was relied on was to the contrary: he sought to justify what he did and suggested that he had invested the money with the approval of his co-trustee and beneficiary. In the second submission it was also put that this was a matter which was not made under any compulsion at all.[4] "Quite apart "from the question whether there was in fact any disclosure "within the meaning of that section, it seems clear also that "it was not a disclosure in consequence of any compulsory "process of any court of law. It was a voluntary statement made "by the accused on affidavit, in answer to the allegation which "was made against him. There was no compulsion upon him to "file any affidavit at all, and no compulsion upon him to make "any statement at that stage, in regard to what had become of "this money."

Counsel for the prosecution in the present case says that there was no compulsion on the accused to make any affidavit, and in a sense he is right. If the accused had wanted to stay in prison for the rest of his life he is right but I do not think that that helps his submission. Those two cases are distinguishable and I have discharged the accused.

*REGINA v. McCARTHY.

Criminal Law—Sentence—Corrective training—Corrective training a form of imprisonment—Petty offence—Breach of probation order—Sentence of three years' corrective training—Term of three years too severe in relation to offence—Sentence of eighteen months' imprisonment substituted.

Corrective training is in substance a form of imprisonment and in passing a sentence of corrective training it is necessary to bear in mind that it is a sentence of imprisonment and to consider whether it is a sentence of the right length.

Where, therefore, an appellant, aged 28, with three previous convictions, stole a shirt and trousers while he was on probation and was sentenced to three years' corrective training:—

Held, that, had a court been considering the sentence before 1948, it would have come to the conclusion that a sentence of 18 months' imprisonment should be imposed, and that the disparity between 18 months and three years made corrective training too severe a sentence, and that, in the circumstances, a sentence of 18 months' imprisonment should be substituted.

APPEAL against sentence.

In March, 1952, the appellant was convicted of larceny and was sentenced to three months' imprisonment. In June, 1954, a fine of £5 or one month's imprisonment was imposed on him for larceny. In February, 1955, he pleaded guilty to stealing a bicycle and was convicted of possessing housebreaking implements by night and the deputy chairman of Middlesex Quarter Sessions made a probation order for three years, telling the appellant that he was being treated with exceptional leniency and that if he broke the probation order he would have to be dealt with severely. Two months later, on May 2, the appellant pleaded guilty before the Uxbridge justices to stealing a shirt and trousers and for that offence was committed to Middlesex Quarter Sessions for sentence. Quarter sessions sentenced the appellant, then aged 28, to three years' corrective training, and he appealed against that sentence.

The appellant did not appear and was not represented.

DEVLIN J. stated the appellant's previous record set out above and continued: The appellant said that he had been sleeping rough for a week and he wanted a clean shirt and trousers to look respectable for a job, and that he went to a bakery where he found the shirt and trousers in a locker and took them. Of course, if he had been endeavouring to take any advantage of the probation which had been given to him he would have asked the probation officer, who would, no doubt, have helped him and put him in touch with someone who would provide him with the clothes, but the probation officer says that he was bad at reporting and was not taking advantage of the opportunity he had been given. He is qualified for corrective training and it is not surprising that the deputy chairman came to the conclusion that corrective training was the right course, because it is quite clear that he deserved a substantial sentence of imprisonment.

What has caused this court to intervene is this: corrective training, although it provides a system of training from which men who are suitable can benefit, and which gives them an advantage in that way over and above the ordinary forms of imprisonment, is in substance a form of imprisonment. It is, therefore, necessary when passing a sentence of three years' corrective training to bear in mind that it is a sentence of three years' imprisonment and to consider whether that is the right

C. C. A.

REGINA v. MCCARTHY.

length. In this particular case the appellant had previously had only three months' imprisonment. It was his third offence and he was a young man. Had a court been considering the matter before 1948, we think that the court would have come to the conclusion that a sentence of 18 months' imprisonment ought to be imposed. That means that with good behaviour the appellant would be in prison for 12 months, which is a substantial period. The court on the whole has come to the conclusion that that is the right sentence in this case, and that where there is a disparity between 18 months and three years, it makes corrective training too severe a sentence. Accordingly, the court will substitute the sentence of 18 months' imprisonment. To mark the fact that the gist of the wrongdoing here was the breach of the probation rather than the comparatively petty offence of stealing the shirt and trousers, that sentence of 18 months will be a sentence imposed for breach of the probation; and in respect of the offence committed in February, 1955, there will be a sentence of three months for stealing, which will run concurrently, so that he will serve 18 months in all.

Sentence varied.

Children and Young Persons—Sentence for offence—Imprisonment.

By the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 17 (1) (as replaced by the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, s. 107 (2)), a magistrates' court shall not impose imprisonment on any person under 17.

By section 17 (2): "No court shall impose imprisonment on a "person under 21 years of age unless the court is of opinion that "no other method of dealing with him is appropriate; . . ."

A youth aged 20, who had been repeatedly fined for motoring offences, took a motor-car without the consent of the owner, and drove it uninsured while he was disqualified from holding a licence. Imposing sentence of imprisonment on him under section 7 (4) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930 (by which imprisonment must be imposed in the absence of special reasons), justices were of opinion that that section "was not superseded by section 17 of the Criminal "Justice Act, 1948, and further that . . . no method of dealing "with the appellant other than imprisonment was appropriate "having regard to his previous convictions, the circumstances, and "the serious nature" of his offences on the day in question:—

Held, that if the justices meant that they could ignore section 17 of the Act of 1948 they were wrong; but they had applied their minds to the provisions of section 17 (2), and accordingly they were right in sentencing the youth to imprisonment.

CASE STATED by Wareham justices.

On September 13, 1954, the appellant, Geoffrey Ayscough Duncan Davidson-Houston, was charged by the respondent, William Lanning, a police inspector, that he on September 12, 1954, at Bovington Camp, Dorset: (1) took and drove away a Citroen motor-car the property of Michael John Pittock, without the consent of the owner, contrary to section 28 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930; (2) used the motor-car without there being in force in relation to its user a policy of insurance in respect of third party risks, contrary to section 35 of the Act; (3) being disqualified from holding a licence, drove the car on the road contrary to section 7 of the Act.

The following facts were proved or admitted: The appellant reached the age of 20 on July 15, 1954. He was a trooper stationed at Bovington Camp, and on the point of completing his National Service. On October 30, 1953, he was convicted by the Eastbourne magistrates for using a car without insurance, for which he was fined £5 and disqualified from driving for 12 months, and for driving without a road fund licence he was fined £1. On November 12, 1953, he was convicted by the Camberley magistrates for failing to report an accident on August 9, 1953, for which he was fined £1, and for driving without a driving licence he was discharged absolutely. On November 18, 1953, he was convicted by the Cranbrook magistrates for driving without reasonable consideration, for which he was fined £20 and costs and his licence was indorsed. He was also fined £5 for failing to stop when required to do so by the police, and for an offence under section 35 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, namely, for using a motor-car without insurance, he was fined £10 and disqualified from driving for 12 months. On May 3, 1954, he applied to the Eastbourne magistrates for the removal of the disqualification they had imposed in October, 1953, and they granted the application as from May 19, 1954; and on May 19, 1954, he made a similar application to the Cranbrook magistrates who refused the application.

The motor-car unlawfully driven by the appellant on September 12, 1954, belonged to an acquaintance of the appellant's, one Pittock, at Bovington Camp. The appellant had asked Pittock to take him into Bournemouth, but Pittock, not wanting the appellant's company, had removed the main jet from his car, and had told the appellant that the car was out of order; and, in the appellant's presence, Pittock had locked both the doors of the car and the doors of the garage in which the car was. The appellant had then asked Pittock to leave the keys of the car with him, but Pittock knowing that the appellant was disqualified from holding a driving licence, told the appellant that he could have neither the keys nor the car. Pittock then left for Bournemouth in another car. After Pittock's departure the appellant broke into Pittock's garage, succeeding in starting the car, and then drove it, without a main jet, into Bournemouth, where he handed it over to Pittock.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that section 17 (2) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, was an overriding enactment which superseded section 7 (4) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and that the justices were not required by law to pass a sentence of imprisonment in respect of the offence under section 7. It was further contended that the justices were not permitted by law to pass a sentence of imprisonment on an offender under the age of 21 unless he had exhibited such unruliness or depravity as rendered any other method of dealing with him inappropriate.

The justices were of opinion that section 7 (4) of the Act of 1930 was not superseded by section 17 (2) of the Act of 1948 and further that, even if it was, no method of dealing with the appellant other than imprisonment was appropriate having regard to his previous convictions, the circumstances and the serious nature of the offences committed by him on September 12, 1954.

S. A. Morton for the respondent.

No cases were cited in argument.

LORD GODDARD C.J. This is a case stated by justices for the county of Dorset, before whom the appellant, who is aged 20 and at the material time a trooper stationed at Bovington Camp on the point of completing his National Service, was charged with three offences, taking a vehicle without consent, using the vehicle when uninsured and driving it when disqualified. The justices fined him £3 on the first charge, which was a very moderate fine; sentenced him to one month's imprisonment and disqualified him for 12 months on the second; and sentenced him to three months' imprisonment on the third charge.

The first point to remember is, that under section 7 (4) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, the offence of driving when disqualified is not an offence in respect of which justices can do anything except send a person to prison, unless they can find special reasons. Section 7 (4) is peremptory, as this court has had to point out. It is also to be regretted that all courts do not understand how serious an offence driving when uninsured can be. A man driving when uninsured may meet with an accident, perhaps killing somebody or injuring them for life, and then that person may have no opportunity of getting any damages because the uninsured person may not have any money. The fact that he only drives a little way ought never to influence justices. I have often quoted a case in which a young man drove a vehicle a few hundred yards and in that space injured one man for life, another seriously, and broke a plate glass window worth £100.

[His Lordship stated the facts found by the justices and continued:] The point taken on behalf of the appellant was that the justices were debarred from sending him to prison by reason of the provisions with regard to young offenders in the Criminal Justice Act, 1948. The justices said that they were of opinion "that section 7 (4) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, was not superseded by section 17 (2) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, and "further that, even if this were so, no method of dealing with the "appellant other than imprisonment was appropriate having "regard to his previous convictions, the circumstances, and the "serious nature of the offences committed by him on September 12, 1954." If the justices meant that they could in any case ignore the provisions of the Criminal Justice Act, section 17, they were wrong, but I do not think that that is what they meant. I think that they were dealing with it in accordance with this particular case. Section 17 (1), which is now replaced, as regards magistrates' courts, by section 107 (2) of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, prohibits a magistrates' court from imposing imprisonment on a person under 17 years of age. The appellant was not under 17; he was 20. Section 17 (2) of the Act of 1948 provides: "No court shall impose imprisonment on a person under 21 years "of age unless the court is of opinion that no other method of "dealing with him is appropriate; and for the purpose of determining whether any other method of dealing with any such "person is appropriate the court shall obtain and consider "information about the circumstances, and shall take into "account any information before the court which is relevant to "his character and his physical and mental condition."

That subsection is as binding on a judge as it is on justices sitting in a court of summary jurisdiction. The only difference is that a court of summary jurisdiction or quarter sessions have to state their reasons why they think there is no other method of dealing with him and a judge need not. I do not think that the justices could have thought that section 107 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, did not supersede the provision in the Road Traffic Act, 1930, so far as it affected a boy under 17, but with regard to a boy over 17, the justices have to apply their minds to the provisions of section 17 (2) of the Act of 1948, and by their finding in the case they show that they have done so. They have said: "That having regard to the fines imposed upon the appellant for the previous convictions, followed by the circumstances "of, and the apparent determination of, the appellant to carry "out his intention of committing the serious offences on September 12, 1954, the only course we could take to enable the "appellant to realize the seriousness of the offences was to "sentence him to imprisonment." I do not see what else the justices could have done unless they sent him to quarter sessions with a view to sending him to Borstal. But, of course, this is not a Borstal case at all; it is the case of a young man who will not obey the law. His service in the Army has not instilled discipline in him, and I think the justices were perfectly right in passing a sentence of imprisonment. This appeal is dismissed with costs.

Company—Winding up—Costs—Taxation in Companies Winding-Up Department — Whether chief clerk has jurisdiction to conduct taxation—Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1949 (S.I. 1949, No. 330 (L. 4)), rr. 1, 4 (3).

The chief clerk to the registrar of the Companies Winding-Up Department has no jurisdiction to conduct taxations of costs; and a certificate in respect of a taxation so conducted may be taken off the file.

There is no "Companies Court" separate and distinct from the Chancery Division of the High Court; the phrase is only a convenient way of describing the Chancery Division when exercising jurisdiction under the Companies Act, 1948.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

The company, a mutual insurance company, purported to go into voluntary liquidation on January 13, 1949. In the course of the liquidation a doubt arose as to whether, having regard to certain provisions in the articles of association, there were any members at the date of the liquidation, and, therefore, whether the company had validly gone into liquidation. On July 11, 1951, Wynn-Parry J. made an order for the compulsory winding-up of the company, and the official receiver became, and remained, liquidator of the company. On May 18, 1953, an originating summons was issued by the official receiver, joining as respondents, in representative capacities, persons who might, according to what should be the true construction of the relevant articles of association, be properly regarded as shareholders of the company at the date of the voluntary liquidation, and also the Treasury Solicitor, in whose interest it was to contend that there were no shareholders at all and therefore that the Crown was entitled to the available assets, a fund of approximately £20,000, as bona vacantia. On February 11, 1954, Wynn-Parry J. made an order on that summons declaring that the surplus assets were divisible between the persons who were entered on the register of members on January 13, 1949, the date of the voluntary liquidation, in certain proportions. The order directed that the costs of the official receiver, as applicant, and of the respondents should be taxed as between solicitor and client and paid out of the assets of the company.

In due course a bill of costs was lodged with the Companies Winding-Up Department on behalf of the applicants to the present summons, who were the respondents to the originating summons on which the order of February 11, 1954, was made, other than one of the then respondents and the Treasury Solicitor. The taxation was conducted by the chief clerk to the registrar in the Companies Winding-Up Department, and on the occasion of an attendance before him on December 16, 1954, the applicants' solicitors intimated that they proposed to challenge the jurisdiction of the chief clerk to conduct the taxation, having regard to the relevant rules.[1] The chief clerk indicated that such a point should be taken as a preliminary point, but in the event the taxation proceeded de bene esse.

Certain items in the bill of costs were disallowed, either wholly or partially: objections were lodged by the applicants and answered by the registrar, who made his certificate on March 15, 1955, in which he stated: "I have reviewed my taxation with "reference to the said objections and the grounds of my decision "are stated thereon." The matter was, however, argued before Wynn-Parry J. on the basis that the taxation was conducted by the chief clerk, and it was common ground that it had been the practice in the Companies Winding-Up Department for upwards of 60 years for the chief clerk to conduct taxations of costs.

On March 28, 1955, the present summons was issued on behalf of the applicants, asking (as amended) (a) that the registrar's certificate be taken off the file as invalid, or alternatively (b) that the objections of the applicants be allowed. At the hearing it was accepted that argument should be heard and judgment given on the question of jurisdiction, and that the rest of the summons should stand over to await that judgment.

Case cited in argument not referred to in the judgment: Fenton v. Crickett.[2]

Cur. adv. vult.

July 8. Wynn-Parry J., reading his judgment, stated the facts and continued: Mr. Fox, for the official receiver (who is the respondent to the present summons) took a preliminary point as to the procedure adopted by the applicants. His point is put thus. If, as the applicants say, there has in fact been no valid taxation, then they should present their bill for taxation to the person who they say is the proper officer, namely, the registrar in the Companies Winding-Up Department. He, says Mr. Fox, would no doubt refuse the request that he should tax. Then the applicants should apply for a writ of mandamus directing him to conduct the taxation. Such a procedure, says Mr. Fox, would have procedural advantages. The official receiver, as respondent, is placed in an embarrassing position in having to conduct an argument on a point involving the practice of the Companies Winding-Up Department. If the suggested procedure had been adopted, the registrar would have been represented by the official solicitor, and thus he could have been adequately heard in defence of the long-established practice of the Companies Winding-Up Department. Further, says Mr. Fox, the result of the present procedure must be that if the applicants succeed on the question of jurisdiction there cannot be an appeal, because, as I understand him, the official receiver could not properly be pressed to appeal on such a question as this.

I think that Mr. Fox's objections are more apparent than real. Although he appeared for the official receiver, I had the advantage of a full argument from him in support of the validity of the present practice, and whatever embarrassment may have been felt by the official receiver because of the procedure adopted, it did not communicate itself to Mr. Fox. Mr. Fox was unable to cite any authority in support of his submission that the wrong procedure was adopted: on the other hand, in my view Silkstone and Haigh Moor Coal Company v. Edey[1] appears to me to indicate that the applicants are entitled to proceed as they have done. The headnote to that case reads as follows: " Under " an order directing the taxing master to tax the plaintiffs' costs

" of an action, including the remuneration of the receivers and " managers appointed in the action, and to certify the balance " after deducting certain costs of the defendants the taxing master " has no power to make a separate certificate for the costs alone." It was argued that that was a case where a person, namely the taxing master, clearly had jurisdiction to conduct the taxation; his fault was merely that he exercised that jurisdiction otherwise than in accordance with the established practice. But the judgment proceeded on the basis that he had no power, which to my mind is the same in the context as jurisdiction, and the court, taking this view, ordered that the certificate be taken off the file. I therefore overrule the preliminary objection and turn to consider the challenge to the jurisdiction.

In his opening, Mr. Lindon, for the applicants, was at pains to say, and I myself desire to emphasize, that no criticism whatever can be levelled at the registrar or his chief clerk for taking the course which they did in this matter. In doing so they were doing no more than following a long-established practice: a practice which, as I have said, has obtained for upwards of 60 years. Indeed, I cannot see that they could have acted otherwise than they have. But as the jurisdiction of the chief clerk to conduct a taxation of costs is challenged I must investigate the challenge. It does not matter that, as was recognised by the Royal Commission on the Civil Service in its 6th Report, published in 1915, " in the Lunacy Masters' Office and " the Companies Department the whole work of taxation is per- " formed by clerks, and, on the information before us, quite satis- " factorily "; nor is it material that the practice has continued for so long. If no authority for the practice can be found in the relevant statute or statutory instrument, then there is no legal basis for it and the applicants must succeed.

As in the case of the jurisdiction in bankruptcy, the jurisdiction in the case of companies is entirely statutory and is to be found either in the relevant Companies Act or the Winding-up Rules made pursuant thereto. For present purposes the relevant provisions are to be found in the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1949, made pursuant to the Companies Act, 1948. Rule 1 contains the following definitions: " ' Judge ' means in " the High Court the judge who for the time being exercises the " jurisdiction of the High Court to wind up companies, and in " any county court the judge thereof." " ' Registrar ' means " in the High Court any of the registrars in bankruptcy of the " High Court, and any person who shall be appointed to fill the " office of registrar under these rules." " ' Taxing officer ' " means the officer of the court whose duty it is to tax costs in " the proceedings of the court under its ordinary jurisdiction." These definitions are followed by this paragraph: " Unless the " context otherwise requires words or expressions contained in " these rules shall bear the same meaning as in the Act or any " statutory modification thereof." Rule 4 (3) reads: " In every

" cause or matter within the jurisdiction of the judge, whether " by virtue of the Act, or by transfer, or otherwise, the registrar " shall, in addition to his powers and duties under the rules, have " all the powers and duties of a master, registrar, or taxing " master." Rules 183 to 193 deal with taxation of costs, and provide in effect that taxation of costs is to be conducted by the taxing officer as defined in rule 1. It may be observed that under rule 188 it is the taxing officer who, on completion of the taxation, is to issue his certificate.

Before proceeding to construe the relevant provisions of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1949, it will be desirable to consider quite shortly the previous history relating to the jurisdiction to conduct a taxation in the winding up of companies. Rule 72 of the General Order and Rules made under the Companies Act, 1862, provides as follows: " Where an order is made in court or " chambers for payment of any costs, the order shall direct the " taxation thereof by the taxing master; except in cases where a " gross sum in lieu of taxed costs is fixed by the order, in accord- " ance with the 37th rule of the 40th of the Consolidated General " Orders." There is no rule corresponding to rule 4 (3) of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1949. It is clear, therefore, that under the General Order and Rules made under the Companies Act, 1862, the taxing masters had exclusive jurisdiction to conduct a taxation of costs in the liquidation of a company. It may be observed in passing that a taxing master has no power to delegate the conduct of a taxation, subject to the provisions of an order of the Lord Chancellor dated April 1, 1930,[2] by which a very limited jurisdiction was conferred on principal clerks of the Supreme Court taxation office.

Rule 1 of the Companies Winding-up Rules, 1890, introduced for the first time the definition " taxing officer," which is in the same terms as in the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1949. These rules, however, contained no provision similar to rule 4 (3) of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1949, giving the registrar the same powers as a taxing master: nor did the Companies Winding-up Rules, 1892, so provide. The first mention that the registrar is to have all the powers and duties of a taxing master occurs in the Companies Winding-up Rules of August, 1892, the validity of which may be said to be doubtful, because they were not signed by the President of the Board of Trade.

In December, 1901, a rule of the Supreme Court was introduced, paragraph 1 of which reads as follows: " There shall be " amalgamated with the Central Office the following offices, " namely: the Chancery Taxing Office; the Bankruptcy Taxing " Office; the Taxing Department of the Office of the Masters in " Lunacy; the Taxing Department of the Office of the Registrar " in Companies Winding-Up "; and paragraph 3 says: " The two " preceding rules shall come into operation as regards the " Chancery Division on January 11, 1902, and as regards the " other officers mentioned at the dates hereafter prescribed by " rules to be made under the Acts applicable to those officers." The attempted amalgamation was abortive because the necessary rule under paragraph 3 was never made. The Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1903, however, contain the definitions which I have read from the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1949, and Rule 4 (3) of the 1903 and 1949 Rules are the same. Thereafter all the Companies Winding-up Rules which have from time to time been promulgated up to the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1949, have contained similar definitions and have expressly conferred on the registrar the powers and duties of a taxing master.

It is against that historical background that I now turn to consider what will be seen to be a comparatively short question of construction, namely, what is the meaning of the phrase " taxing officer " in rule 1 of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1949. He is defined as " the officer of the court whose duty it " is to tax costs in the proceedings of the court under its " ordinary jurisdiction." The word " court " in that definition means, in my view, the Chancery Division of the High Court. This conclusion I think must follow from the provision at the end of the rule the effect of which is that the word " court " in the rule is to have the same meaning as in the Companies Act, 1948. Section 455 defines " the court " as the court having jurisdiction to wind up the company. Section 218 (1) provides that the High Court shall have jurisdiction to wind up any company registered in England; and that jurisdiction is exercisable by the judges of the Chancery Division of the High Court.

It was argued by Mr. Fox that " court " in rule 1 meant the Companies Court. The phrase " Companies Court " is a modern term introduced into the forms made pursuant to the Companies Act, 1929, in place of the phrase in the previous forms " Com- " panies Winding-up," in order to soothe the susceptibilities of those who desired to apply to the court for some relief in the case of entirely solvent companies (as, for instance, confirmation of the reduction of the capital of a company by the return of surplus capital to its members) and who disliked that the title to the necessary proceedings should contain a reference to winding up. There is in fact no Companies Court separate and distinct from the court, namely the High Court, on which jurisdiction in winding-up matters is conferred by the Companies Act, 1948. The phrase is only a convenient way of describing the relevant division of the High Court when exercising a particular jurisdiction, namely, the jurisdiction conferred on it by the Companies Act, 1948. This phrase " the Companies Court " was unknown when the earlier Winding-up Rules were introduced containing the definition of " taxing officer " in the same language as in rule 1 of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1949, and in my view no argument can be founded on it.

There is a further objection to Mr. Fox's argument on this point which he himself very fairly realized, and that is created by the qualification "whose duty it is to tax costs in the proceedings of the court under its ordinary jurisdiction." The words "under its ordinary jurisdiction" point a contrast between that jurisdiction and the jurisdiction conferred by the Companies Act, 1948; but once that is appreciated it must follow that "court" cannot mean "Companies Court" or any court whose sole jurisdiction arises under the Companies Act, 1948.

WOOL TEXTILE EMPLOYERS MUTUAL INSURANCE CO. LD., In re.

Now in the case of the High Court the person whose duty it is to tax costs in the proceedings of the court under its ordinary jurisdiction can only be one of the taxing masters of the taxing office. The registrar is not included in the definition "taxing officer"; but by rule 4 (3) he is given the powers and duties of a taxing master, so that in effect for all purposes of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1949, he is, or is in the position of, a taxing officer. (See In re Defiant Cycle Co. Ld.[3]) But I can find no ground for holding that he or any of his clerks have any greater jurisdiction than the taxing masters and their principal clerks in the matter of conducting taxations. It follows, therefore, that no legal basis exists for the practice which has for so long obtained in the Companies Winding-Up Department.

I come to this conclusion with regret. The practice had apparently worked well up to 1915, and so far as I know (and I speak, if I may say so, with considerable experience, both at the Bar and on the Bench, of the working of the department) the practice has worked well ever since: but what is to happen for the future is a matter of policy with which I am not concerned. If it is desired to validate and perpetuate the practice, no doubt that can be done by an appropriate statutory instrument. All I have to do is to decide the dry question of jurisdiction; and for the reasons which I have given I decide in favour of the applicants, and, following the course taken by Byrne J. in Silkstone and Haigh Moor Coal Company v. Edey,[4] I direct that the certificate of March 15, 1955, be taken off the file.

[An order was made referring the taxation to one of the taxing masters of the taxing office.]

Order accordingly.

1955 July 6.

Lord Goddard C.J.

Insurance—Motor-vehicle—"Loss"—Sale of motor-vehicle induced by fraud of purchaser—Delivery of motor-vehicle in exchange for cheque—Worthless cheque—No intention by purchaser to pay for motor-vehicle—Motor-vehicle obtained by false pretences—Not a "loss" within meaning of insurance policy.

The claimant owned a motor-car which was insured under a policy indemnifying him against "loss of or damage . . . to" the car. He advertised the car for sale and a man came to see it, and having had a trial run in it, persuaded the claimant to let him take it away at once and to accept a cheque in payment. The claimant gave the man the registration book of the car and considered that from that moment he had ceased to be, and the purchaser had become, the owner of the car. The purchaser never had any intention of paying for the car and his cheque proved worthless. The claimant, alleging that he had suffered a "loss" of the car, claimed against the insurers under the policy:—

Held that, since the purchaser had obtained the car by false pretences and the property in it had passed, the claimant had lost, not the car, but the proceeds of sale, accordingly there had not been a "loss" within the meaning of the policy.

CASE STATED by an arbitrator.

By a policy of insurance issued by the General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation Ld. to the claimant, the corporation agreed to indemnify the claimant against, inter alia, the loss of a Ford Zephyr motor-car in the sum of £650 subject to the conditions contained in the policy. The material terms of the insurance policy were as follows: "Section 1. Loss of or damage "to insured motor-car. The corporation will indemnify the policy "holder against loss of or damage to any motor-car described in "the schedule . . . [the Ford Zephyr motor-car] and/or its "accessories and spare parts whilst thereon . . ."

The following were among the facts found by the arbitrator relevant to this report. The claimant and his wife were both Austrian by birth and became British subjects shortly after the last war. In June or July, 1952, he bought the car in question for £730. In July, 1953, the claimant decided to sell the motor-car. He therefore advertised it for sale in an evening newspaper on August 6 and 7, 1953, asking £740 for the car.

On August 7, 1953, a man using the name of Gordon Henson opened an account at the Old Street branch of Barclays Bank by depositing £20 in cash; he gave a false address and obtained a cheque book. On Saturday, August 8, Henson telephoned the claimant and then visited the claimant's premises. He had a trial run in the motor-car and adroitly persuaded the claimant and his wife to allow him to take the motor-car at once and to accept a cheque for £745. He gave persuasive reasons why he needed the car before the week-end, and the price included £5 to reimburse the claimant for expenses that he would incur through giving immediate delivery. The claimant's wife had doubts about accepting a cheque, but no reference to the bank could be made at that time on a Saturday, and Henson so impressed the claimant and his wife with his personality, appearance and conversation that they were quite taken in by him. The claimant's wife came to the conclusion that expensive articles were dealt with by cheques and not cash, and the claimant came to the conclusion that Henson's cheque was "as good as money." The claimant gave Henson the registration book of the car; he never expected to see or to have anything to do with it again, and considered that from that moment he had ceased to be, and that Henson had become, the owner of the car. Henson drove the car away, and within one hour had bought another car in a similar manner for a similar price using the same cheque book. Henson never had any intention of paying for the claimant's car. On Monday, August 10, 1953, the claimant learnt from his bank that the cheque was valueless.

Police inquiries revealed that Henson had sold the car to one Smith, who in turn sold it to a firm of car dealers. The police had not been able to obtain any evidence that any of the purchasers were tainted with knowledge of Henson's fraud and to obtain such evidence, if any, would be difficult and costly. The claimant, having been advised by his solicitor and by counsel not to sue any of the purchasers, claimed against the corporation, contending that on the true construction of the policy and on the facts above there had been a loss of the motor-car covered by section 1 of the policy, and that he was not in breach of any condition and that, therefore, the corporation were liable to pay him £650.

The corporation contended, inter alia, that there had been no loss of the motor-car covered by the policy or at all, and that, therefore, they were not liable to pay the claimant any sum.

The arbitrator held that on August 8, 1953, the claimant had parted with possession of the motor-car to Henson, and at the same time transferred to him the property in it in exchange for the cheque; that the transaction was induced by the fraud of Henson (the consent of the claimant being a real consent induced by fraud and not an appearance of consent produced by a trick); that the transaction amounted to the offence by Henson of obtaining the motor-car by false pretences and not that of larceny by a trick; and that, in the result, the loss occasioned to the claimant by Henson was the loss of the value of the cheque, and not the loss of the motor-car (since he considered that the parting with the property as well as the possession in the motor-car distinguished the case from Webster v. General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation.[1] He awarded that the claimant was not entitled to recover any sum from the corporation.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether upon the true construction of the policy and upon the facts found there was a loss of the motor-car within the meaning of the policy.

Felix Denny for the claimant.

Stephen Chapman Q.C. and Bernard Caulfield for the corporation.

The following cases were referred to in argument: Webster v. General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation Ld.[2] and London and Provincial Leather Processes Ld. v. Hudson.[3]

LORD GODDARD C.J. This is a most unfortunate case for the claimant, and I am very sorry for him. The question here is whether or not there has been a "loss" within the meaning of that word in the policy of insurance under which the claimant insured his motor-car. The policy provides: "The corporation "will indemnify the policy holder against loss of or damage . . . "to any motor-car described in the schedule hereto." Has there been a loss of the motor-car?

The claimant sold this motor-car to a man who did not pay for it. The man was, no doubt, a rogue and a swindler, and having possessed himself of a cheque book, he gave the claimant a cheque for £745. The claimant's wife did not want him to accept it. A woman's intuition in these cases is very often right, and she thought that it might be a worthless cheque, as it turned out to be. Nevertheless, the claimant went on with the transaction and sold the car. It is a clear case of obtaining a car by false pretences. But that passed the property in the car. You cannot say that the claimant has lost the car; what he has lost is the proceeds of sale. He has lost the price which the man promised to pay him, and purported to pay him by a worthless cheque. I cannot hold that that is a "loss" within the meaning of the policy. I think that the arbitrator was right in his judgment, and I must uphold the award.

Judgment accordingly.

Landlord and Tenant—Act of 1954 (Repairs and rent)—Housing trust—"Houses for persons . . . in fact members of the working classes"—Charitable trust providing houses for lower income group—Modern meaning of "working classes"—Tenancies not controlled—Housing Act, 1936 (26 Geo. 5 & 1 Edw. 8, c. 51), s. 188—Housing Repairs and Rents Act, 1954 (2 & 3 Eliz. 2, c. 53), s. 33 (1) (9).
Housing.

A corporation required to devote the whole of its funds to charitable purposes, which was subject to the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners, in fact devoted its funds to the provision of houses for persons the majority of whom fell within the lower income group. The corporation, relying on section 33 (1) (d) of the Housing Repairs and Rents Act, 1954,[1] claimed possession of premises owned by it:—

Held, that the trust was a "housing trust" within the meaning of section 33 (9), since, though the definition in section 33 (9), incorporating by reference the definition in section 188 of the Housing Act, 1936, required that a housing trust must be a corporation bound to devote its funds to charitable purposes which in fact restricted its purposes wholly or substantially to "the provision of houses for persons the majority of whom are "in fact members of the working classes," the words "working "classes" in an Act of 1954 were properly to be construed as persons in the lower income group; and that accordingly the corporation was entitled to possession.

APPEAL from Judge Sir Gerald Hargreaves sitting at West London County Court.

[1] Housing Repairs and Rents Act, 1954, s. 33: "(1) A tenancy where— "(a) the interest of the landlord "... (d) ... belongs to any housing "trust which is subject to the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners, shall not be a controlled "tenancy ..."

"(9) In this section the expression 'housing trust' means a housing trust as defined by the Housing "Act, 1936, or a corporation or body "of persons which, being required "by the terms of its constituent "instrument to devote the whole or "substantially the whole of its funds "to charitable purposes, would be a "housing trust as so defined if the "purposes to which it is so required "to devote its funds were restricted "to those to which it in fact devotes "the whole or substantially the whole "thereof."

Housing Act, 1936, s. 188: "... "'Housing trust' means a corporation or body of persons which by "the terms of its constituent instrument, is required to devote the "whole of its funds, including any "surplus which may arise from its "operations, to the provision of "houses for persons the majority of "whom are in fact members of the "working classes, and to other purposes incidental thereto."

By a trust deed made on February 4, 1890, it was recited: "Whereas the said Sir Edward Guinness, having long felt the "gravity of the evils which result from the insanitary and insufficient accommodation supplied to large numbers of the poorer "of the working classes, in the dwellings now inhabited by them, "on November 18 last addressed a communication to the trustees "requesting them to undertake the administration of a fund "amounting to £200,000 which he proposed to establish with the "object of endeavouring in those and other respects to ameliorate "the condition of the labouring poor of London and of their modes "and manner of living, by the provision of improved dwellings; "by giving them facilities, should the trustees think it desirable "in any or all cases to do so, for obtaining means of subsistence "and the necessaries and decencies of life; and by such other "means as the trustees may in their uncontrolled discretion think "fit."

In two actions, the plaintiffs, the Guinness Trust (London Fund) Founded 1890, Registered 1902, set up under the trust deed, brought proceedings in the county court claiming as landlords that they were entitled to possession of certain rooms in premises at 32 Cadogan Street, S.W.3, let by the trust to the defendants, Miss A. Green and Mrs. M. H. Cope; that the tenancies were duly determined by notice to quit, but that the defendants wrongfully remained in possession. They claimed further that they were a housing trust as defined by section 33 (9) of the Housing Repairs and Rents Act, 1954, by reason of which the tenancies were not controlled under the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restriction) Acts, 1920–1939; and they asked for possession of the premises.

By their defences the tenants denied that the plaintiffs were a housing trust as defined by section 33 (9) of the Act of 1954, and claimed that the tenancies were controlled under the Rent Restriction Acts. Section 33 (9) of the Act of 1954 incorporates by reference the definition of "housing trust" contained in section 188 of the Housing Act, 1936.

It was agreed that the trust was subject to the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners. The county court judge found that the trust was a housing trust, and that the objects of the trust were in fact carried out, because the dwellings administered by the trust were for the poorer classes of the working population. On the question whether the plaintiffs did in fact devote the whole or substantially the whole of their funds to the objects of the trust, he found in favour of the plaintiffs that they did in fact build houses which were intended for the occupation of the working class. The plaintiffs were accordingly within the terms of section 33 (1) (d) and the tenants' tenancies were not controlled. The county court judge made the order for possession asked for.

The tenants appealed and their appeals were heard at the same time.

The following cases were cited in argument: London County Council v. Davis [2]; White v. St. Marylebone Borough Council [3]; Arlidge v. Tottenham Urban District Council [4]; Green (H. E.) & Sons v. Minister of Health. [5]

DENNING L.J. The only defence which is raised is that the tenants are protected by the Rent Restriction Acts. So, indeed, they were until 1954, but in that year an Act of Parliament was passed which decontrolled houses where the landlords' interest belongs to a housing trust which is subject to the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners. The question which has been raised in this appeal is whether the Guinness Trust is a housing trust within the meaning of the Act. That depends on whether it is a corporation which, being bound to devote its money to charitable purposes, nevertheless in fact restricts its purposes wholly or substantially to housing members of the working classes. That summarizes, I think, section 33 of the Act of 1954, which refers back to section 188 of the Housing Act of 1936.

It is therefore necessary to consider the nature of the Guinness Trust, whether it is a charitable trust or not, and the nature of its operations. We have before us the trust deed under which the trusts were set up some 64 years ago. A fund was set aside by Sir Edward Guinness for "the amelioration of the condition of "the poorer classes of the working population of London and of "their modes and manner of living, by the provision of improved "dwellings; by giving them facilities, should the trustees think "it desirable in any or all cases to do so, for obtaining means of "subsistence and the necessaries and decencies of life; and by "such other means as the trustees may in their uncontrolled dis-"cretion think fit." The trust, beyond doubt, is required by the terms of its constitution to devote the whole or substantially the whole of its funds to charitable purposes. So the first part of the definition is satisfied. The trust is certainly subject to the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners. Both those points are common ground. The point which is taken before us is this: Is the trust in fact devoting its funds wholly or substantially to the provision of houses for members of the working classes? It is quite clear from the annual reports which we have seen, and from the evidence, that the great majority of the buildings owned by the Guinness Trust are houses for poor people. There is, it is true, also a residential home for old people and a holiday home at Newhaven for tenants, but those homes do not seem to me to derogate from the nature of the work as a whole which is providing houses for people who are not well-to-do.

But Mr. Tuck says that the people who are housed are not members of the "working classes" or at any rate that a great many of them are not. Some years ago in H. E. Green & Sons v. Minister of Health,[1] I said that the phrase "working classes" was quite inappropriate in modern conditions. Fifty years ago the phrase was well understood to mean people who worked with their hands, whether on the land or on the railways or in mines. Such people in those days earned wages which, on the whole, were much less than the rest of the community. But nowadays the phrase is quite inapplicable. People who work on the land or in factories often earn more than people who work in offices or shops. Craftsmen earn as much or more than clergymen or teachers. Yet we still have to apply the test whether a house is provided for the working classes. The only way to do it, I think, is to ask whether the house is provided for people in the lower income range, or, in other words, for people whose circumstances are such that they are deserving of support from a charitable institution in their housing needs. Applying this test, I am quite satisfied that the Guinness Trust does provide houses for such people. The majority of them do fall within the lower income group and they are deserving of support by this charitable institution. The people in the buildings provided by the trust include dockers from Bermondsey, railway workers at Vauxhall, office cleaners and dustmen in Chelsea, and furniture hands in Shoreditch. There can be no doubt to my mind that this trust in fact provides houses for people who, in the old days, would have been called members of the working class, and who, today, are properly described as falling within the lower income group. That being so, in my judgment, the Guinness Trust is a housing trust within the meaning of the Act of 1954, and the judge was quite right in his conclusion.

Mr. Tuck pointed out that some of the statements made by the judge did not precisely cover the matters required by the definition; but I am quite clear, having read the argument, evidence and judgment, that these are mere verbal criticisms. The judge had all the matters before him and intended to find that the facts were such as to render the Guinness Trust a housing trust within the meaning of the Act. It follows that Mrs. Cope and Miss Green are no longer protected by the Act and the Guinness Trust are entitled to possession. I think that the appeal must be dismissed.

BIRKETT L.J. I am of the same opinion. The real difficulty in the case arises from the fact that in the year 1955 we have to consider a trust which was created some 65 years ago. Quite naturally the social revolution which has taken place in our lifetime makes language which was appropriate 65 years ago a little inappropriate now. For example, in the trustee deed which was made on February 4, 1890, it was recited: "Whereas the said Sir

Birkett L.J.

" Edward Guinness, having long felt the gravity of the evils " which result from the insanitary and insufficient accommodation " supplied to large numbers of the poorer of the working classes, in " the dwellings now inhabited by them, on November 18 last " addressed a communication to the trustees requesting them to " undertake the administration of a fund amounting to £200,000 " which he proposed to establish with the object of endeavouring " in those and other respects to ameliorate the condition of the " labouring poor of London." Since 1890 there has been a long succession of Housing Acts under which local authorities and public authorities in general have done something, at any rate, to deal with that situation described in the language of the deed of 1890.

Mr. Tuck says that when one looks at section 33 (9) of the Act of 1954, it must be remembered that one is still concerned with this phrase " working class," which is introduced by the reference to the Housing Act of 1936. I agree with what my Lord said in H. E. Green & Sons v. Minister of Health,[1] and what he has said here today. In 1890, when the term " working class " was used it had a fairly well-known significance, but as the years have passed that early significance has altered. The true way to look at this matter is to take this section of the Act and apply it to the work done by this trust to see whether in substance the work which is done complies with the trust deed. The county court judge who heard the evidence on this matter was satisfied on the facts that it did, that the trust was really employed in erecting and repairing houses which were for people of comparatively small incomes. The other day we had in this court the case of an unskilled labourer, who, in 1890, would certainly have qualified as one of the working class, who was working on one of the underground tubes in London and was earning over £20 a week—a thing which was unheard of in 1890. That I mention merely as an illustration of the complete revolution which has taken place since this deed first came into being. The language of the deed must be looked at quite generally to see whether in substance work has been carried out and houses erected and maintained for people of lower income. When one reads the trust report for 1953 and sees the kind of figures there given of the average weekly rent of the rooms, and then turns to the balance sheet and the income and expenditure account and sees how the income is expended, it seems clear that there was abundant evidence on which the judge could find as he did. I would dismiss the appeal.

ROMER L.J. I quite agree, and will only add one word on the question of the meaning of the words " working class." In the old days the expression was probably well understood in the sense which my Lord has indicated. I agree that that test no longer affords any real assistance in ascertaining what the expression means. The working classes in this country are now generally known as the lower income group of people who earn their living regardless of the social level, whatever it may be, to which they belong. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR EASTERN AFRICA.

East Africa (Kenya)—Landlord and Tenant—Rent restriction—Sublease—Claim to possession—Premises sublet without consent of landlord—Landlord's right against "occupier" whether or not a "lawful sub-"tenant"—Increase of Rent (Restriction) Ordinance, 1949, (Kenya), s. 16 (1) (i), (2) (6).

Landlord and Tenant—Rent restriction.

By section 16 (1) of the Kenya Increase of Rent (Restriction) Ordinance, 1949, a landlord is entitled to obtain an order for possession if "(i) . . . at any time after the commencement of "this ordinance, [the tenant] has, without the consent in writing of "the landlord, assigned, sublet or parted with the possession of the "premises or any part thereof.

"A landlord who wishes to obtain an ejectment order on this "ground may have the option of obtaining a similar order against "the occupier or having the occupier as his direct tenant."

By section 16 (6): "An order against a tenant for the recovery "of possession of any premises . . . shall not affect the right of "any subtenant, to whom the premises . . . have been lawfully "sublet . . . to retain possession under the provisions of this "section or be in any way operative against any such subtenant."

The respondent, the owner of premises to which the Ordinance applied and which had been sublet by the tenant without the respondent's consent to the appellant, sought the recovery of possession of the premises from the appellant:—

Held, on the assumption, without deciding, that the provisions of section 16 (6) were applicable and that the premises were "lawfully sublet" to the appellant, that the terms of the second paragraph of section 16 (1) (i), which were satisfied in this case, governed the situation and authorized the making of an order for possession against the appellant. There was nothing in section 16 (6) which was capable of displacing the ostensible meaning of the option clause; that clause was a specific statutory power annexed only to subhead (i) of the various subheads of section 16 (1), and it would be an impossible method of construction to allow the general saving which subsection (6) made in respect of all orders for possession obtained under any subhead of subsection (1) to overrule the particular and explicit option which the Ordinance conferred on a landlord in a case which fell under subhead (i).

Judgment of the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa affirmed.

APPEAL (No. 24 of 1954) from a judgment of the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa (May 14, 1953) affirming a judgment of the Supreme Court of Kenya (June 9, 1952) which in turn had affirmed a decision of the Rent Control Board at Nairobi (January 29, 1951).

1955. May 16, 17, 18, 19. Michael Albery Q.C. and Paul V. Baker for the appellant.

Dingle Foot Q.C., Ralph Millner and J. R. Bisschop for the respondent.

July 13. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD RADCLIFFE. This appeal from a judgment dated May 14, 1953, of the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa arises out of proceedings on the part of the respondent to obtain possession from the appellant of certain premises in Nairobi consisting of a bakery and shop on plot No. 230–3, Race Course Road.

The respondent is the owner of the premises in dispute and it is common ground that at all times material to this appeal they were capable of being within the protection of the Increase of Rent (Restriction) Ordinance, 1949 (hereinafter referred to as "the Ordinance"). The dispute turns on the question whether that Ordinance accords to the appellant, who has been in occupation of the premises since the autumn of 1942, the right to retain possession against the respondent.

The latter has been trying to recover possession since December, 1946. It is convenient at this stage to make a short statement as to the original letting of the premises and the previous proceedings concerned with their recovery. As will be seen later those proceedings had some bearing on the matters to be considered in this appeal.

By a written agreement dated June 10, 1941, the respondent leased the premises to one Sidi Bilal for five years from July 1, 1941, at a monthly rent. There was no restriction upon subletting. Sidi Bilal went into possession and carried on the business of a baker in the premises until September/October, 1942, when he went to India leaving the appellant in occupation and in charge of the business. It appears that some time later the appellant took over the business and ran it on his own account.

In December, 1946, the respondent sued Sidi Bilal and the appellant for possession of the premises on the ground that the lease had expired by effluxion of time. Those proceedings were begun in the Resident Magistrate's Court at Nairobi: the first outcome was that they reached the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa, which decided that the written agreement was void for want of registration, pursuant to section 107 of the Indian Transfer of Property Act, 1882, and ordered a retrial before the Resident Magistrate. The second outcome was that, after the Magistrate on retrial had made an order for possession, the Supreme Court of Kenya, on appeal, set this order aside by judgment dated November 19, 1948, holding that Sidi Bilal was entitled to a yearly tenancy which had not been lawfully determined and that the appellant was his licensee; and on April 11, 1949, the Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal by the respondent from this judgment.

By a letter dated December 1, 1948, the respondent's solicitors gave notice on his behalf to Sidi Bilal determining the latter's tenancy on July 1, 1949, in the form appropriate to a notice to quit for a tenant from year to year. This notice was thus given after the Supreme Court judgment and before the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

By a sublease in writing dated January 25, 1949, Sidi Bilal sublet the premises to the appellant from January 1, 1949, up to and including July 1, 1949, "determinable thereafter as the "law shall permit." Thus the sublease was granted after the notice to quit had been given, but before the expiry of the period of the notice: after legal proceedings for possession had been taken by the respondent against the appellant, but before the legal proceedings were begun, which are the subject of the present appeal. These legal proceedings were begun on February 4, 1950, by an application in writing by the respondent to the Rent Control Board at Nairobi, asking for an order against Sidi Bilal and the appellant for recovery of possession of the premises and consequential relief. Sidi Bilal did not defend the proceedings and his part in the matter does not require further notice.

To understand the course of the suit up to the present appeal to their Lordships it is necessary at this stage to make some reference to the provisions of the Ordinance upon the true construction and effect of which must turn the questions to be decided in the appeal.

The Ordinance enacts a system of rent control for Kenya upon the general lines that have become familiar in the system of the United Kingdom. The Kenya system did not originate with the Ordinance, which itself repealed an earlier Ordinance of 1940 and seven supplementary and amending Ordinances made since that date. The Ordinance now in question came into operation on September 6, 1949; it has been amended more than once during the currency of the present proceedings, but the citations from it are from the text as originally enacted, unless otherwise stated.

The section of which the effect is directly in dispute is section 16, entitled "Restriction on Right to Possession." The purport of subsection (1) of this section is first to impose a general prohibition on the right of a landlord to obtain from the court an order for recovery of possession of any premises to which the Ordinance applies or for the ejectment of a tenant therefrom, and then to define a series of circumstances or occasions the existence of which will nevertheless entitle the landlord to obtain an order.

There is nothing in the section to create rights to resume possession against contractual tenants unless those rights exist at common law; its aim is to prescribe the conditions under which such rights, if they exist, can be enforced. The circumstances or occasions so defined are very various, some depending on a failure of the tenant to observe conditions of the tenancy, some depending on objective facts bearing on the state or user of the premises, some depending on the landlord's own needs or claims. Subsection (1) (i) of section 16 contains the following definition of one of those circumstances:—

"(i) the tenant has, without the consent in writing of the "landlord, at any time between the 1st day of December, 1941, "or the prescribed date, whichever is the later, and the com- "mencement of this Ordinance, assigned or sublet the whole "of the premises, the remainder being already sublet; or, at "any time after the commencement of this Ordinance, has, "without the consent in writing of the landlord, assigned, "sublet or parted with the possession of the premises or any "part thereof.

"A landlord who wishes to obtain an ejectment order on this "ground may have the option of obtaining a similar order "against the occupier or having the occupier as his direct "tenant."

Section 5 of a later Ordinance of 1949 added to this subsection the words "or sublet part of the premises" before the words "the remainder being already sublet," thereby correcting what seems to have been an obvious slip in the original text.

The remainder of section 16, after subsection (1), contains a number of separate provisions bearing upon the circumstances in which or the conditions under which an order for possession can be obtained. Of these it is only necessary to set out two.

"(2) In any case arising under subsection (1) of this section "no order for the recovery of possession of premises shall be "made unless the Central Board, the Coast Board, or the court, "as the case may be, considers it reasonable to make such an "order."

"(6) An order against a tenant for the recovery of possession "of any premises or ejectment therefrom under the provisions "of this section shall not affect the right of any subtenant, to

" whom the premises or any part thereof have been lawfully " sublet before proceedings for recovery of possession or eject- " ment were commenced, to retain possession under the pro- " visions of this section, or be in any way operative against any " such subtenant."

It is in the light of those provisions and of other provisions that will be noticed later that the respective claims of the respondent and the appellant have been dealt with by the courts in Kenya. The course of decision has been, briefly, as follows:—

(1) The Board of Control gave judgment on January 29, 1951, holding the respondent entitled to an order for possession. In their view the appellant was not entitled to any protection under section 16 (6) because (a), the landlord not having given his consent to the subletting, the premises had not been " lawfully sublet " to the appellant within the meaning of the subsection, and (b) the subletting had been made after " proceedings for recovery of possession . . . were commenced," since the notice to quit, which was given before the date of the sublease, ought to be regarded as the commencement of proceedings for this purpose. As the landlord had given no consent to the subletting, section 16 (1) (i) had been satisfied.

(2) The Supreme Court of Kenya gave judgment on June 9, 1952, affirming the board's order for recovery of possession but allowing the appellant an appeal against part of the consequential relief which related to liability for mesne profits. The court (Bourke J.) rested its decision on the ground that the premises had not been lawfully sublet to the appellant in the absence of any consent on the part of the landlord. No decision was given on the issue whether the subletting had been made before proceedings for recovery of possession were commenced, since that question would be of no moment if the subletting were not lawful anyway.

(3) The appellant then appealed to the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa (Nihill P., Worley V.-P. and Mahon J.). His appeal was dismissed by the judgment of that court delivered on May 14, 1953. The grounds on which the court based its decision were different from those which had supported the decisions in the lower courts. While it was held that the subletting was not unlawful for the purposes of subsection (6), since it was not made in breach of any covenant against subletting or any legal prohibition of such a subletting, and it was further held that the notice to quit of December, 1948, could not be treated as a commencement of proceedings, the court was disposed to favour the view that the subletting was nevertheless made after the commencement of proceedings, because the original proceedings which were begun in 1946 had not been finally disposed of at the date of the sublease. But the main ground on which the judgment rested was that the " occupier " referred to in the second paragraph of section 16 (1) (i) could be a person who was at the same time a lawful subtenant within the meaning of section 16 (6) and that there was nothing in the provisions of the latter subsection or in any other of the various sections of the Ordinance which prevented the court from making an order for possession against such a subtenant if the landlord could prove that the conditions of section 16 (1) (i) had been satisfied in the sense that the subletting had taken place without his written consent.

The view of the matter which has been referred to as the main ground of the Court of Appeal's judgment commends itself to their Lordships as being clearly right, and it is the one upon which their own advice to Her Majesty will rest. A decision upon it adverse to the appellant renders it unnecessary to consider the further questions which bear upon the application of the words of section 16 (6) to this situation. Of such questions, one, the meaning of "before proceedings . . . were "commenced," was argued on the appeal, but their Lordships express no view upon it. The other, whether the premises were "lawfully sublet," was not argued on the appeal, because the respondent's counsel did not desire to contest the decision of the Court of Appeal on the point, a decision which is certainly supported by more than one judgment in courts outside Kenya which have had to deal with analogous provisions in other rent control legislation. Upon this, too, their Lordships express no view. For the purpose of this judgment, therefore, they assume, without deciding, that the provisions of section 16 (6) are applicable to the appellant's case and that the premises were "lawfully sublet" to him in January, 1949.

Let them be so. It is still difficult to see why the terms of the second paragraph of section 16 (1) (i), a paragraph which has been spoken of as "the option clause," do not govern the situation and authorize the making of an order against him. This option clause appears to be peculiar to the legislation of Kenya and does not find a counterpart in the legislation of the United Kingdom. But what it envisages is that there has been a subletting or assignment of controlled premises, without the written consent of the landlord, within the dates and under the conditions that are specified: and that the landlord may choose between having an order for possession against the actual occupier at the same time as he obtains one against his own tenant and having the actual occupier remain on in possession as his direct tenant for the future. As there was a subletting of the whole of the premises without the consent, and the premises were in the appellant's occupation, the respondent's right to ask for an order against him would seem to be clearly established, subject to any point arising as to "reasonableness" under section 16 (2).

The argument on which the appellant seeks to rely in resisting this claim consists of two propositions interdependent upon each other. First, he says that there is a conflict between the option clause and subsection (6) of section 16 wherever there is found to exist a "lawful subtenant" within the meaning of that subsection, and that the conflict can only be reconciled by treating such "lawful subtenants" as a class whose rights to possession are not to be subject to the exercise of any landlord's option under the option clause. Secondly, he says that the true meaning of section 16 (6), when read in conjunction with the meanings attributable by section 2 to such words as "let," "tenant" and "tenancy," and with section 23 (3), a subsection which prescribes that "where the interest of a tenant of any "premises is determined, either as the result of an order for "possession or ejectment or for any other reason, any subtenant "to whom the premises or any part thereof have been lawfully "sublet shall, subject to the provisions of this Ordinance, be "deemed to become the tenant of the landlord on the same "terms as he would have held from the tenant if the tenancy "had continued," is that a landlord cannot rely on a subletting without consent by his tenant as the ground for an order for possession against a "lawful subtenant." If he wishes to get him out under section 16 (1) (i) he must prove against him a separate ground of possession consisting of a new subletting or assignment by him without the required consent.

The second branch of this argument attributes to a provision such as section 16 (6) a very far-reaching effect. It is not a construction which their Lordships are prepared to adopt. This is not the first occasion upon which it has been necessary for courts of law to consider the significance of such a provision when related to the rest of a rent control scheme of legislation, and the current of authority is not in favour of the appellant's argument. If that argument receives some support from Ward v. Larkins,[1] it is directly in conflict with Lord Hylton v. Heal,[2] which contains illuminating judgments by Rowlatt and Bailhache JJ. on this point, with Enniskillen U. D. C. v. Bartley,[3] and with the decision of the Court of Appeal in England in Regional Properties Co. Ld. v. Frankenschwerth & Chapman.[4] The purport of those latter decisions, in so far as they bear upon the present issue, is to treat a provision such as section 16 (6) as being in essence procedural. It secures to a "lawful subtenant" the certainty that an order for possession or ejectment against his immediate sublessor will not destroy his own right to possession by destroying the tenancy out of which it arises and that, accordingly, a similar order must be made against him directly if he is to be put out; and before such an order can be made against him the court is bound to consider any circumstances which may make it reasonable that he personally should not be deprived of possession. But these authorities are against the view that subsection (6) has any such effect as to give the "lawful subtenant" a right to possession independent of the circumstances, such as subletting without consent, which have brought about the order for possession against the landlord's direct tenant, so that to get possession against him the landlord must find a new ground of possession.

Their Lordships do not think it necessary for the purposes of this decision to arrive at any final view on the question whether section 16 (6) gives the "lawful subtenant" any further right than that of being heard as to "reasonableness" under section 16 (2). It would be unsatisfactory to do so, in any event, unless it were possible to consider at the same time what is the precise meaning of a "lawful" subletting in this connexion; and that has not been an issue in the present appeal. Even if the subsection does not secure to the subtenant anything more than the assurance that he is not to be bound by an order for possession made against his own lessor, it cannot be said that such an assurance is not worth legislating for if the ground upon which possession is obtained against the direct tenant is also to serve as a good ground of possession against the subtenant once he has been brought before the court. For regard must be paid to the fact that, under English procedure, the writ of possession which issues upon a judgment for possession is a "real" writ and in effect is a court order in favour of the plaintiff which is valid against possessors generally. Their Lordships were rightly reminded that there are significant differences in this respect between English procedure and Kenya procedure (which is derived from the code of British India). But for all that it would be deliberate blindness not to recognize that section 16 (6) of the Ordinance is a reproduction of an English model—see, for instance, Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 5 (5)—and its purport must be understood in the light of its English origin.

However that may be, their Lordships are satisfied that there is nothing in section 16 (6) which is capable of displacing the ostensible meaning of the option clause. And, if that is so, the appellant's case must fail. First, the range of subsection (6), however wide, cannot extend beyond a saving in favour of a subtenant in respect of an order for possession made against a tenant. Such a saving does not bear upon what is in question under the option clause, which is the making of an order against the occupier himself in supplement to any order made against the landlord's direct tenant. Secondly, the option clause is a specific statutory power annexed only to subhead (i) of the various subheads which are listed in section 16 (1). It is obviously intended to deal with the particular situation which arises when the landlord's consent has not been obtained to a subletting, assignment or parting with possession and, whether a subtenant who has got in in those circumstances is truly a "lawful" subtenant or not, it would be an impossible method of construction to allow the general saving which subsection (6) makes in respect of all orders for possession obtained under any subhead of subsection (1) to overrule the particular and explicit option which the Ordinance confers on a landlord in a case which falls under subhead (i).

Trust and trustee—Breach of trust—Rate of interest.

A partnership in equal shares between the plaintiff (who was resident in Hungary) and the defendant (who was resident in the United Kingdom) was dissolved in 1941 by the extension of the provisions of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, to Hungary.

In 1943 the defendant sold the partnership assets, then consisting of 100 shares of £1 each in A. Ld., registered in the name of the defendant, to H. Ld. in consideration of the allotment to the defendant of 13,333 fully paid shares of £1 each in H. Ld. In 1952 the plaintiff brought a partnership action against the defendant, and Danckwerts J. by order declared that the plaintiff was beneficially entitled to one moiety of the 100 shares in A. Ld. "and that the defendant is accountable to the plaintiff for one "moiety of the consideration which was payable to the defendant "upon the sale by him of the said 100 shares" . . . to H. Ld. Inquiries were directed and it emerged from the master's certificate that, following the allotment to the defendant of the 13,333 shares in H. Ld., he had sold 6,667 of such shares for cash at par and had spent the proceeds for his own purposes. The remaining 6,666 shares had been retained by the defendant:—

Held, (1) that the effect of Danckwerts J.'s declaration, on its true construction, was that the defendant was a trustee of one moiety of the 100 shares in A. Ld. for the plaintiff; and that, accordingly, the defendant was accountable to the plaintiff, not only for a moiety of the shares in H. Ld. which the defendant had retained and for a moiety of the cash which he had received, but also for interest on the moiety of the cash from the date of its receipt by the defendant.

Decision of Roxburgh J. affirmed.

APPEAL from Roxburgh J.

In 1938, the plaintiff and the defendant, both of whom were then resident in Hungary, entered into a partnership in equal shares for the exploitation of inventions in plastics of the defendant.

The defendant came to London to negotiate for the exploitation of the inventions, and continued to reside in the United Kingdom. The plaintiff, apart from a visit to the United Kingdom between January and March, 1939, continued to reside in Hungary.

On November 17, 1939, the defendant made an agreement with an English syndicate for the formation of a company to take over and develop his inventions in plastics on terms (inter alia) that one-third of the capital of such company should be allotted to the defendant.

On February 24, 1940, a company called Aerolectric Mouldings Ld. was formed pursuant to the agreement of the previous November, with a capital of £300 in shares of £1 each, of which 100 were allotted to the defendant credited as fully paid.

On April 8, 1941, the provisions of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, were extended to Hungary,[1] and war was declared against Hungary on December 7, 1941.

In 1942 the defendant assigned certain further inventions which he had made to Aerolectric Mouldings Ld. pursuant to the terms of the agreement of November 17, 1939. One of the further inventions so assigned proved later to be of considerable value.

On September 24, 1943, the defendant and the other shareholders in Aerolectric Mouldings Ld. entered into an agreement to sell all the 300 shares in that company to a company called Holoplast Ld. in consideration of the allotment to the vendors of 40,000 shares of £1 each in Holoplast Ld. credited as fully paid up. Pursuant to this agreement the defendant was allotted 13,333 fully paid shares of £1 each in Holoplast Ld.

After the war the plaintiff requested the defendant to account for the plaintiff's share in the partnership assets, but the defendant denied that anything had come of the inventions in which the plaintiff had an interest.

In August, 1952, the Administrator of Hungarian property released his charge on any interest of the plaintiff in these matters.

In September, 1952, the plaintiff commenced an action in the Chancery Division against the defendant, and by his statement of claim alleged that the partnership extended to all the inventions of the defendant which had been assigned to Aerolectric Mouldings Ld. The defendant contended that the partnership extended only to his inventions in moulded plastics and did not cover his inventions in laminated plastics, which were the only inventions which had proved to be of any value. This was the main issue of fact at the trial of the action which was heard by Danckwerts J., who decided this issue in favour of the plaintiff.[2] Evidence was adduced at the trial of advances to or for the purposes of the partnership by the plaintiff, but there was no evidence of any advances by the defendant, or that there were any other liabilities of the partnership.

The order of Danckwerts J., dated January 26, 1954, contained the usual preliminary paragraph including the words "upon "reading the pleadings," and proceeded to declare that the plaintiff was upon the allotment to the defendant of 100 shares of £1 each in Aerolectric Mouldings Ld. pursuant to the agreement of November 17, 1939, beneficially entitled to one moiety of the said 100 shares, and that the defendant was accountable to the plaintiff for one moiety of the consideration which was payable to or receivable by the defendant upon the sale by him of the said 100 shares to Holoplast Ld. under the agreement of September 24, 1943. The order directed that inquiries should be made what was the consideration so payable to or receivable by the defendant, and what had become of the said consideration and of any moneys, shares or other property of which the same consisted, and what payments or distributions by way of interest, dividend or bonus had been made upon any of the said moneys, shares or other property, and that these inquiries were to be conducted on the footing that all the material inventions of the defendant fell within the ambit of the partnership agreement. The order also directed that the plaintiff was to be at liberty to apply for such further inquiries or accounts and for such order for payment or transfer by the defendant to the plaintiff, or as the plaintiff might direct, as might be necessary or proper to give effect to the aforesaid declaration and to the findings on the aforesaid inquiries.

When the inquiries directed by the order of Danckwerts J. were made, it transpired that the defendant had, immediately after the allotment to him of 13,333 fully paid shares of £1 each in Holoplast Ld. pursuant to the agreement of September 24, 1943, sold 6,667 of such shares for cash at par and had spent the proceeds. The remaining 6,666 shares had been retained by the defendant, who had received one dividend on them.

On further inquiries directed on November 16, 1954, by Roxburgh J., it was certified that no part of the £6,667 cash received by the defendant had been expended in discharging debts or liabilities of the partnership. After these further inquiries had been made, Roxburgh J. on February 23, 1955, ordered that the defendant should pay £1,871 6s. 6d., being interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on £3,333 10s. (one moiety of the £6,667 cash proceeds received by the defendant) from the date of receipt by the defendant until payment to the plaintiff. He had previously ordered that the defendant should transfer and pay to the plaintiff one moiety of (a) the 6,666 retained shares in Holoplast Ld., (b) the dividend on those shares which had been received by the defendant and (c) the £6,667 cash.

The defendant appealed against the order of Roxburgh J. directing payment of £1,871 6s. 6d. interest.

K. E. Shelley Q.C. and D. W. Falconer for the defendant. This was a partnership action. The pleadings were read into Danckwerts J.'s order, and that order should, therefore, be construed by reference to the pleadings. A partner is not a trustee for his co-partner, nor is he a trustee for the firm. See Halsbury's Laws of England, 2nd ed., vol. 24, p. 396, Pollock's Law of Partnership, 14th ed., p. 119, Piddocke v. Burt,[3] Knox v. Gye.[4]

The order of Danckwerts J. made no provision for payment of interest as ordered by Roxburgh J., though it did direct an inquiry "what payments or distributions by way of interest dividend or "bonus have been made"—upon any of the moneys, shares or property of which the consideration received by the defendant from Holoplast Ld. consisted. There was no such payment of interest, and in view of that express reference to interest in the order, there is no room for implying a right in the plaintiff to any other interest.

In any event 5 per cent. is too high a rate. It should be 4 per cent.

J. G. Strangman Q.C. and G. B. H. Dillon for the plaintiff. The order of Dankwerts J. is plain and unambiguous. The declaration in this order that the plaintiff was beneficially entitled to a moiety of the "Aerolectric" shares allotted to the defendant meant, of necessity, that the defendant held one moiety of those shares as trustee for the plaintiff.

This order was proper and appropriate to the facts of the case since (a) it was never suggested at any time during the trial that any advances had been made by the defendant to the partnership, or that there were any debts of the partnership outstanding at the time of the allotment to the defendant of the "Aerolectric" shares, or at any other material time, and (b) on the other hand there was evidence of substantial advances by the plaintiff for which he would have been entitled to credit on the taking of full partnership accounts. Such accounts could, therefore, only have enured to the benefit of the plaintiff, and he was prepared to forgo this benefit by limiting his claim to a beneficial interest in a moiety of the 100 "Aerolectric" shares and to accounts and relief on this footing.

On any view the defendant received and held the 100 "Aerolectric" shares as trustee for the partnership: Clegg v. Edmondson[5]; Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick[6]; Hugh Stevenson & Sons Ltd. v. Aktiengesellschaft für Carton-nagen-Industrie.[7]

The master in answering the inquiries directed by the order of Danckwerts J. and the further inquiries directed by the order of Roxburgh J. has found, in effect, that the defendant converted to his own use the £6,667 cash which he received on the sale by him of 6,667 "Holoplast" shares. This conversion and breach of trust having been revealed only in the course of the inquiries, it is competent for the court to charge the defendant with interest on the moiety of the £6,667 for which he is accountable to the plaintiff: see In re Barclay.[8]

It is still the rule that 5 per cent. is the appropriate rate of interest to charge against a trustee who borrows trust moneys or converts them to his own use in circumstances where he will only be charged with simple interest. In re Davis[9] applies today as it did in 1902. EVERSHED M.R.. This is an appeal from an order of Roxburgh J. made on further hearing of an application, which was in turn made in pursuance of the directions given by an earlier order at the trial of the action. [His Lordship referred to the terms of the order of February 23, 1955, and continued:]

As Mr. Shelley has stated in the course of his argument, and particularly in his reply, the whole question undoubtedly turns on the true meaning and effect of the first order dated January 26, 1954, and made by Danckwerts J. [His Lordship read the terms of that order and continued:] The order which Roxburgh J. made arose out of the exercise by the plaintiff of the liberty to apply contained in the order of Danckwerts J., the summons which I have mentioned being a summons in exercise of that liberty, following upon the results of the earlier inquiries. It will be necessary for me to expand and explain the judgment, but, reverting again to the main question as formulated by Mr. Shelley: What does the order of Danckwerts J. mean?

GORDON v. GONDA.
Evershed M.R.

At first sight it would appear to me plain that the effect of that order was to declare the defendant to have been a trustee for the plaintiff of a moiety of the 100 shares, in Aerolectric Mouldings Ld. which were issued to or allotted to the defendant pursuant to the agreement mentioned in the order. To state, as the order states, that the plaintiff was upon the allotment of those shares beneficially entitled to a moiety of them is to my mind exactly the same thing as to say that the defendant, upon the shares being allotted to him, was a trustee as to a moiety of them for the plaintiff, the beneficial owner. If that view is right (as I shall, I hope, show), everything else seems to me to follow; but, as Roxburgh J. observed, the form of the order of Danckwerts J. is, in a sense, an unexpected form of order when regard is had to the pleadings in the action which are themselves read into the order. As Roxburgh J. observed at the very opening of the judgment appealed from: "I looked at "a transcript of the judgment of Danckwerts J. . . . Having "done so I am quite unable to ascertain the precise circum- "stances under which this partnership action became converted "into something else, but converted into something else it "certainly was, and the order [of Danckwerts J.] certainly is "not such an order as would normally be made in a partnership "action." From that circumstance, with which I concur, I think have flowed the present tears. I turn, therefore, to the pleadings. The statement of claim, which was considerably amended, I think may be sufficiently summarized as amounting to an allegation that at a date in August, 1938, the plaintiff and the defendant, who were both Hungarian nationals, entered into a partnership agreement in the Hungarian language, the purpose of the partnership being that the firm, the two of them, should exploit and turn to account certain inventions with which the defendant had been busying himself and for which the plaintiff was willing to provide finance. The partnership agreement, or a translation of it, is set out in full in the judgment of Danckwerts J.[1] I do not propose to refer further to it, because for present purposes I think my summary will suffice; but the statement of claim goes on to set out a considerable subsequent history to the effect that the defendant added further inventions to those with which he had originally been concerned and to relate also the circumstances of the war which had caused the plaintiff and the defendant to be separated from each other. At the end of the body of the claim the prayer was thus expressed by amendment: first, "A declaration that the defendant is accountable "to the plaintiff for one-half of all shares or other property or "assets moneys or other benefits obtained by the defendant "under or as a result of or in any way arising out of the . . . "agreement of November 17, 1939," that being the agreement which resulted in the allotment of the "Aerolectric" shares;

then, alternatively, a declaration that there had been a partnership, for dissolution of the partnership, and accounts and inquiries and so forth.

I think it is quite true to say that, notwithstanding the first form of declaration prayed for, the whole substance of the statement of claim was an allegation that there had been a partnership between the plaintiff and the defendant and, moreover, that certain later inventions or developments of the original invention made by the defendant had been the subject of or comprehended within the partnership agreement; and, indeed, as Mr. Strangman agreed at the trial before Danckwerts J., the only real matter of fact which fell to be determined, and which was determined in favour of the plaintiff, was: Did the partnership agreement, did the joint venture (as Mr. Strangman preferred to call it) comprise, or did it not comprise, the later and, as it turned out, successful inventions of the defendant? On that issue the judge, who took plainly a somewhat strong adverse view of the defendant as a witness, found in the plaintiff's favour.

[His Lordship referred to the history of the case down to the incorporation of Aerolectric Mouldings Ld. on February 24, 1940, and continued:]

Assuming that the statement of claim is established (as I think it was), these two persons are at this date in 1940 still partners together, the partnership agreement comprehending the exploitation of the defendant's inventions. The defendant has, acting within the scope (as I assume) of his authority as a partner, transferred to Aerolectric Mouldings Ld. the existing patents in consideration of 100 "Aerolectric" shares, which would be at this stage partnership assets. Then occurs an important event, namely, that on April 8, 1941, the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, was extended to Hungary, which became an enemy country, war being declared between Great Britain and Hungary later in the same year. The effect of the extension of the Trading with the Enemy Act was that the partnership thereupon came to an end; but, of course, the defendant remained in possession at this stage of the 100 shares which had been partnership assets. Then the defendant, having made further inventions, proceeded to assign to Aerolectric Mouldings Ld., under the terms of the agreement he had previously made with that company, these later inventions, and one of them turned out indeed to be of great value. As I have said, the real question of fact at the trial was: Were those later inventions (whatever may have been the position between the defendant and Aerolectric Mouldings Ld.) comprehended by the original partnership agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant?—and that question Danckwerts J. answered affirmatively.

The next date is September 24, 1943, being the date of an agreement between Aerolectric Mouldings Ld. and Holoplast Ld.

1955
Evershed M.R.

The effect of it was that the "Aerolectric" shares were transferred to Holoplast Ld., and Holoplast Ld. issued, in consideration for them, 40,000 of its own shares, of which the defendant, as holder of one-third of the "Aerolectric" shares, received a third, namely, 13,333. It will follow that if, as the order of Danckwerts J. appears to have declared, the defendant was a trustee for the plaintiff (for I have so construed the order upon its face), if that is the effect of it, then the defendant will equally hold the 13,333 "Holoplast" shares which he received in exchange, as to one moiety, for the plaintiff. What happened was, though this did not emerge until a later date, that on the allotment the defendant sold half the "Holoplast" shares at par and received therefor £6,667, retaining the remaining 6,666. The great value of the last of the defendant's inventions may be assessed from the circumstance that, whereas originally the defendant had held 100 shares in Aerolectric Mouldings Ld., which may have been of very doubtful value, he had now been able to sell at par 6,667 "Holoplast" shares and to retain another 6,666 like shares.

Hostilities in due course determined, and in 1947 the plaintiff and the defendant (who had been separated owing to the state of affairs on the continent of Europe) came together again. As Mr. Shelley observed, the plaintiff's claim to know what had happened about these inventions and what the defendant had done with the plaintiff's interest in them was not at first put forward with any great resolution or despatch, but in 1952 the plaintiff did start the proceedings, the statement of claim in which I have already mentioned.

The claim on the face of it was a claim for relief on the ground that the plaintiff and defendant had been partners, and since, as I have also pointed out, the effect of the extension of the Trading with the Enemy legislation to Hungary was to determine that partnership, the form of order which one would have expected would, I think, have been somewhat to this effect (notwithstanding the form of the first declaration in the prayer of the statement of claim): It would have contained a declaration that the plaintiff and defendant had been partners in respect of the inventions and would no doubt have gone on to make clear that the partnership covered the later and valuable invention; it would have declared that the partnership was dissolved on April 8, 1941, and would then have directed accounts and inquiries in order to show of what the partnership assets consisted at that date and what, if any, were its liabilities, and also an inquiry of what had become of the assets of the former partnership since that date. As I shall show, I hope, I am by no means satisfied that if the order had taken that form it would, in the end of all, have made any difference; but the order did take a different form. In the language of Roxburgh J. the action appears to have been converted from an ordinary partnership action, which would have resulted in relief in the common form I have indicated, into something else. The question is: When regard is had to the pleadings and to the history which I have stated and to the fact that the pleadings were read in this order and the evidence was referred to, does the declaration in the order assume some different aspect? Is what I have called its prima facie meaning thereby altered? I cannot think that it is. I cannot myself think that the fact that one is entitled to look at the pleadings and entitled to have regard to the circumstances that I have mentioned can in any way qualify the plain meaning of the words which follow: "This court doth declare "that the plaintiff was . . . beneficially entitled to one moiety "of the 100 shares" allotted to the defendant; and (as I have said earlier) that is, to my way of thinking, necessarily the same thing as saying, if it had been put the other way round, that the defendant was a trustee for the plaintiff in respect of one moiety of the 100 shares.

Before I come back to make good what I said a little time ago (namely, that I doubt whether it would have made any difference in the end if the order had been in the form strictly appropriate to a partnership action), I will continue the story since the order of January 26, because inaccuracy in one of the later documents [2] has perhaps added still further to the feeling which I confess formed itself in my mind as Mr. Shelley opened the case, that the result to the plaintiff is perhaps unduly fortunate for him.

[Having referred to the further stages in the proceedings, his Lordship continued:] The argument for the defendant, shortly, was, both before Roxburgh J. and in this court, that, notwithstanding the form of the order, the true substance and intent of it was a decree appropriate in a partnership action; and Mr. Shelley said that, as between partners in the ordinary way, when accounts are taken, no question of the one being regarded as a trustee for the other properly arises. For that proposition, Mr. Shelley has referred us to textbooks, Halsbury's Laws of England, 2nd ed., vol. 24, p. 396, Pollock's Law of Partnership, which passage in the 14th edition (1944) is at p. 119, but the passage reproduces exactly what was said in the earlier edition edited by Sir Frederick Pollock himself, and to certain cases, notably Piddocke v. Burt [3] and Knox v. Gye.[4]

As to Knox v. Gye,[4] I will say something in a moment, but the passage in Pollock is to this effect: "A surviving partner "has sometimes been said to be a trustee for the deceased "partner's representatives in respect of his interest in the part-"nership; but this is a metaphorical and inaccurate expression. "The claim of the representatives against the surviving partner "is in the nature of a simple contract debt, and is subject to the "Statute of Limitations." In Halsbury it is said, at p. 396: "The relation between partners is not that of debtor and creditor, [2] This was a reference to an inaccuracy in the master's first certificate.

"unless and until the partnership accounts have been finally "taken after dissolution and a balance has been ascertained to "be owing from one to another. Nor are the partners, as such, "trustees for each other or for their firm."

Knox v. Gye [4] was a case of great complication, in which the matter arose between the representatives of a deceased partner and a surviving partner, the business having ceased. According to the majority opinion of the House of Lords, it was held that the claim of the representatives of the deceased partner was barred by the Statute of Limitations, and that depended upon the view that, on the facts of that case, the surviving partner could not be treated as having been a trustee for the representatives of the deceased partner, not in respect of some particular asset, but in respect of his (the deceased partner's) share in the partnership assets. Of course, so long certainly as a partnership continues and until it has been wound up, one partner has no specific interest in any particular asset; but it seems to me that where, as in the present case, the partnership has been dissolved by the impact of the Trading with the Enemy legislation and where, as it appears, the active partner in this country has used partnership assets in this way, that he has exchanged them for some other asset which had been vested in his name, it would be going very much too far to say that the partner who so acts is not a trustee for the partnership of the asset which has come into his hands in exchange for the assets of the partnership which he gave for it. One could well imagine examples when it would (I should have thought) be impossible to resist the view that a partner who, by using partnership moneys or partnership assets, acquired some asset in his name, would not be held to be a trustee for the firm—that is, for himself and his co-partner —of the asset which he had thus obtained. Indeed, the case referred to by Mr. Strangman of Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick [5] is an example of such a result, a case which has been followed consistently since and, particularly, was referred to by Lord Atkinson in his speech in Hugh Stevenson & Sons Ld. v. Aktiengesellschaft für Carton-nagen-Industrie.[6] Mr. Strangman referred particularly to the passage in Lord Atkinson's opinion,[7] where it is to be noted that the noble Lord referred, when mentioning Knox v. Gye [8] to the dissenting opinion of Lord Hatherley without, indeed, observing that it was a dissenting opinion and without further reference to any of the other opinions.

However that may be, it is quite unnecessary in this case for the court to express any view as to the limitations or scope of the decisions in such cases as Knox v. Gye [8] on the one hand and Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick [9] on the other. I have only made such reference to them as I have in order to make good a point which I earlier indicated. In my judgment, even though the form of the order of Danckwerts J. had been one appropriate strictly to a partnership action, declaring that the partnership had been dissolved and directing the usual inquiries, it is by no means clear to me that it would not have inevitably followed, either on the first inquiry or at least at some other stage, that the asset which the defendant had obtained when he disposed of the partnership assets (to wit, the patents) was held by him as trustee for the partnership; and in the events (namely, that the partnership had ceased operations and had no debts or liabilities to discharge) that the defendant thereupon held that asset as a trustee as to one half for himself and as to the other half for the plaintiff. So the result would have been in the end the same. But, however that may be, I return to the order we are called upon to construe, that is, Danckwerts J.'s order of January 26, 1954. I repeat that, bearing all the relevant matters in mind and paying regard to the cases to which we have been referred, it still remains clear to me that the effect of the declaration was (as I have many times said) that the defendant was held to be a trustee as to one half of the 100 "Aerolectric" shares for the plaintiff. The defendant did not appeal from the order which is, accordingly, not now capable of challenge by him. And in my judgment it follows from the terms of the order and the declaration which it contained that the defendant was a trustee for the plaintiff as to one half of what the defendant got in exchange for the "Aerolectric" shares, namely, 13,333 "Holoplast" shares; and, being a trustee of one half of those shares for the plaintiff, it equally follows that he was a trustee for the plaintiff of the money he received upon a sale by him of half the "Holoplast" shares.

What, then, is the right conclusion? The master certified that the £6,667 was wholly spent by the defendant. Roxburgh J. required further investigation into that matter, and it may now be taken that in fact the defendant put that money (stating the matter in popular language) in his pocket. He used it for his own purposes, in discharging his own liabilities, or otherwise for his own requirements. Seeing that, as to one half, it was trust money, it follows that the defendant must be regarded as having converted one half of the cash consideration to his own use. What, then, is the result? It is true that the thought of this interest claim may have dawned somewhat late upon the plaintiff or his advisers, but none the less it was, in my judgment, as a consequence and a necessary consequence of the premises I have stated, a just claim which they could make. The trustee, having converted part of the cash consideration he received for trust property to his own use, must be accountable to the beneficiary, not only for the sum he received, but for interest on it.

No point was taken, and I assume it never could have been taken, that there was here any possible limitation of the period during which interest would run from the date when the money was received and spent in September, 1943, to the date when the principal figure of £3,333 10s. was paid over in December, 1954; nor does it appear that any great point was taken as to the rate of interest. It did appear to me, when I first looked at the matter, that 5 per cent. was, in these days, a somewhat high figure, and I was further troubled in this matter because Roxburgh J. seemed to reject the alternative of 4 per cent. on grounds which I could not, for my part, entirely understand. He said: "If it were so applied . . ."—that is, if the principal sum were applied in payment or the discharge of partnership liabilities—"I should not charge the defendant with more than "4 per cent. It is a very special case . . ."; but if that had been what had happened, "I should not charge him more than "4 per cent. On the other hand, if he has spent it on purchases "wholly unconnected with the partnership, . . . I cannot see "why he should not pay 5 per cent." I cannot help thinking that the judge, with all respect, must have made a slip, because if he had in fact spent the £3,000 odd in the discharge of partnership debts or liabilities, he would not appear to have been chargeable with any interest at all, or indeed with the capital. But since he is to be treated as having, as I say, converted it to his own use, then I think that it is too late now, in the circumstances certainly of this case, in which the question never really was gone into below, for us to depart from the ordinary rule which has undoubtedly been applicable for a great many years—the rule that where a trustee is chargeable with interest as for breach of trust, the rate of interest with which he is charged is 5 per cent., unless his conduct is such (as is not the case here) that he is made to pay compound interest. That rule as to interest dates back to cases like Burdick v. Garrick [10] and In re Davis,[11] and it may be said to be supported in the present case by the circumstance that in certain sections of the Partnership Act itself (see section 24 (3) and section 42) a partner is liable to pay interest at 5 per cent. in respect of that for which he may be found accountable to a co-partner. Whether, having regard to the change in money rates, at some stage it may have to be considered whether that rate ought to be varied, is not, I think, a question for us to decide in this case. The ruling is well established; and, in all the circumstances, therefore, I can see no grounds which would justify us departing from the rule, given the premises which I have stated.

The result, therefore, is that the defendant ought, in my judgment, on the face of the order which was made in January, 1954, to pay interest and to pay it at the rate as stated by Roxburgh J. of 5 per cent. In other words, in my judgment, this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

HODSON L.J. I entirely agree and have nothing to add.

[10] (1870) 5 Ch.App. 233.

[11] [1902] 2 Ch. 314.

ROMER L.J. I agree and have very little to add.

Inasmuch as the defendant never appealed against the order of Danckwerts J. which was made on January 26, 1954, it is clear that he is bound by the provisions of that order, whatever those provisions might be. For the reasons which the Master of the Rolls has stated, it appears to me to be clear that the order proceeded upon the footing of a trusteeship of the defendant of the original 100 shares which were allotted to him and on the corresponding footing that the plaintiff was the cestui que trust of one half of those shares. If that is the meaning of the order, then cadit quaestio, because the defendant never appealed against it. It is only if the order is open to some other construction, that it is ambiguous in its terms, that it appears to me to admit of the argument which Mr. Shelley addressed to us, that in the circumstances which existed, namely, the pleadings in the action and the acceptance by the judge of the view that there was a partnership and in view also of the general law which is applicable as between partners, the judge cannot have intended to hold that the defendant was a trustee of the shares which were allotted to him. In my opinion, there is no such ambiguity as to render that argument permissible, because this order, as I have already said, proceeds (and, in my opinion, proceeds only) upon the footing of a trusteeship. But even if there was such an ambiguity as Mr. Shelley suggested and upon which he founded his attempt to show that the conception of a trusteeship was not one which ought to be accepted, nevertheless it seems to me that if one looks to the observations that Sir William Grant made in Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick [12] and to Lord Atkinson's judgment in the Hugh Stevenson case [13] to which the Master of the Rolls has referred, there was material—one need say no more—upon which Danckwerts J. could find, as in my opinion he did find, that there was a trusteeship.

There is only one other point I should like to mention; that is, that Mr. Shelley said that this order only intended to effect what it expressed and one looks to the order in vain for any indication that the defendant was to be held liable for interest on any part of the money which came into his hands in respect of the sale of these shares. That, of course, is true, but at the time when this order was made, although the defendant knew or presumably knew what he received as consideration for the shares and what he did with it, the plaintiff did not know. Accordingly, all the plaintiff could ask for is what he did ask for, namely, an order for a common account against a person who was in the position of a trustee. When, in the course of working that order out, or any order such as that, it transpires that the trustee has converted trust property to his own use, or applied it to purposes that he had no right to apply it to, the mere fact that the original order was an order for a common account does not and cannot preclude a cestui que trust from subsequently saying: "Now we know what the facts are, we are "entitled to what the court has always allowed to a beneficiary "as a remedy against a trustee who has wrongfully applied trust "property, namely, not only restoration of the property, but "interest at the appropriate rate." Therefore, it seems to me that that point which Mr. Shelley took is no answer to the summons which the plaintiff issued after the certificate, asking for interest on the footing of a trusteeship.

In my judgment, Roxburgh J. was quite right in ordering interest, having regard to the construction of the order and the common practice; and I agree with the Master of the Rolls that there is no ground shown for altering the rate of such interest which has prevailed for many years, namely, 5 per cent. I, accordingly, agree that the appeal fails.

ACTION.

The plaintiffs' vessel, the Brixton, was in collision with the defendants' vessel, the Planter, in the River Thames on February 6, 1954. The plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendants, who put in a defence and counterclaim. There was a dispute as to the angle of blow and at the summons under R.S.C., Ord. XXX, before the action came on for hearing, it was ordered that each side be at liberty to call one surveyor on terms that statements of proposed evidence be exchanged 14 days before trial. Statements of the proposed evidence of the surveyors for each side were exchanged, but not the plans and documents in connexion therewith. These plans and documents were produced at the trial and, as a result of their not having been exchanged with the statements, the court was occupied for a substantial time with the evidence of the surveyors.

HILL
MINISTER OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL INSURANCE.

In December, 1952, a mother, who had been deserted by her husband, and her three children were admitted by the London County Council into residential accommodation under Part III of the National Assistance Act, 1948. In April, 1953, after they had lived in the accommodation as a family for some months the county council received the two eldest children into its care under the provisions of section 1 of the Children Act, 1948, transferring them to residential schools. In May, 1953, the mother and the youngest child, who had remained with her, were discharged by the London County Council to private accommodation. The Minister of Pensions and National Insurance decided that the mother was not entitled to include the two eldest children in her family for the purposes of family allowances in respect of any period after May, 1953, on the ground that they were neither living with her, nor was she contributing to the cost of providing for them at the rate of at least eight shillings a week in cash or in kind. The mother appealed:—

Held, that the Act contemplated the payment of family allowance to a family living together or being maintained as a family, and section 21 (7), on its true construction, made provision for the case of a child who was at a boarding school but who would return home for the holidays or if ill, not that of a child living at a school which had taken it over altogether. It followed that the two eldest children could not be said to be living with the mother in any sense contemplated by the Act, nor could they be deemed under section 21 (7) not to have ceased to live with her, for their absence was not due to the fact that they were at school, but because the county council, exercising their powers under section 1 of the Children Act, 1945, had taken over the care and maintenance of them themselves. Accordingly the mother was not entitled to receive family allowance.

CASE STATED by a referee.

The appellant, Mabel Jane Hill, was in receipt of a family allowance in respect of a family which included three children, Alan Charles, born on April 1, 1947; Jean Margaret, born on January 1, 1949; and Leslie Arthur, born on February 9, 1952. On December 18, 1953, the Minister of Pensions and National Insurance decided that the appellant was not entitled to include the two children Alan Charles and Jean Margaret in her family for family allowance purposes in respect of any period after May 4, 1953, on the ground that they had neither been living with her nor had she been contributing towards the cost of providing for them at the rate of at least 8s. weekly for each of them in cash or kind. The appellant was dissatisfied with the Minister's decision and the question was referred to a referee under section 5 (2) of the Family Allowances Act, 1945.

The following facts were admitted or proved before the referee. On December 10, 1952, the appellant and her three children were admitted by the London County Council into residential accommodation at Newington Lodge under Part III of the National Assistance Act, 1948, where they lived together as a family until April 2, 1953. On April 2, 1953, the girl, Jean Margaret, was transferred to Oakdale Nursery, a residential nursery and a school within the meaning of section 114 of the Education Act, 1944, and on the same date she was taken into care by the London County Council under the provisions of section 1 of the Children Act, 1948. From April 3, 1953, until April 20, 1953, the appellant and the remaining two children continued to live together at Newington Lodge as a family. On April 20 the boy, Alan Charles, was transferred to Ashford Residential School, a school within the meaning of section 114 of the Education Act, 1944, and on the same date he was taken into care by the London County Council under section 1 of the Children Act, 1948. On May 6, 1953, the appellant and the remaining child, Leslie Arthur, who had never been parted from her, were discharged by the London County Council from Newington Lodge to private accommodation. On June 6, the girl, Jean Margaret, was discharged by the London County Council from Oakdale Nursery to the appellant, whom she joined in private accommodation. At the date of the hearing before the referee, July 7, 1954, the boy, Alan Charles, was still at the Ashford Residential School. Such contributions as had been made by the appellant towards the cost of providing for either of the two children, Jean Margaret and Alan Charles, while at the nursery and residential school respectively, had not at any time amounted to as much as 8s. weekly in cash or in kind.

On behalf of the Minister it was argued (1) that as the appellant had not contributed towards the cost of providing for the children at the rate of at least 8s. weekly since April 2, 1953, the children could only be included in her family for family allowances purposes after that date for such time as they could be said to be living with her; (2) that while Jean Margaret was in the nursery and Alan Charles in the residential school they were not living with the appellant in fact, and their absence from her ought not to be treated as absence at a school for the purposes of section 21 (7) of the Family Allowances Act, 1945,[1] so as to

[1] Family Allowances Act, 1945 (as amended by the Family Allowances Act, 1952, s. 52), s. 1: "Subject to the provisions of this Act, there shall be paid by the Minister, out of moneys provided by Parliament, for every family which includes two or more children and for the benefit of the family as a whole, an allowance in respect of each child in the family other than the elder or eldest at the rate of [eight shillings] a week."

S. 3: "(1) . . . each of the following shall be treated for the purposes of this Act as constituting a family, that is to say—(a) a man and his wife living together, any child or children being issue of theirs, his or hers, and any child or children being maintained by them; (b) a man not having a wife or not living together with his wife, any child or children being issue of his, and any child or children being maintained by him; and (c) a woman not having a husband or not living together with her husband, any child or children being issue of hers, and any child or children being maintained by her . . . (2) It shall be a condition of the child's being treated as included in a family . . . of the man and his wife or one of them, of the man, or of the woman . . . that the child is living with them, with him or with her, as the case may be, or, if not, that the cost of providing for the child is contributed to by them . . . by him, or by her . . . at the rate of [eight shillings] a week or more."

S. 21 (7): "A child shall not be deemed for the purposes of this Act to have ceased to live with a person by reason of any temporary absence, and in particular by reason of entitle them not to be deemed for the purposes of the Act to have ceased to live with her during that absence, because (a) for the duration of that absence they were taken into care by the London County Council under section 1 of the Children Act, 1948, and the act of taking them into care involved the assumption by the London County Council of the duty, which would otherwise have remained with the appellant, of providing for their proper accommodation, maintenance and upbringing, and it was not the appellant but the London County Council who sent them to school so that while they were at school their absence at school was an absence from the London County Council and not from the appellant; and (b) the words "absence at school" in section 21 (7) must mean something more than mere lack of presence with the parent and must be an absence from a parent for the purposes of education, and not predominantly for some other purpose such as relieving the parent of the duty of maintenance or the provision of accommodation, and the absence must be temporary so that the absence of a child who had gone away from his parent to live in an institution was excluded; (3) that the general intention of the Family Allowances Act, 1945, was not to maintain payments of allowances where the child concerned had in fact been removed from the parent and the parent did not retain his or her duties and liabilities in respect of the child.

On behalf of the appellant it was argued (1) that the language of sections 3 (2) and 21 (7) of the Family Allowances Act, 1945, was perfectly clear and the word "temporary" in section 27 (7) did not in any way qualify the expression "absence at any "school," and, since absence at school was expressly excluded from the provision in section 21 (7) for the making of rules to determine what absences from a parent might be treated as temporary for the purposes of the Act, it was an absence from a parent of a kind which was not limited by any of the rules made under that subsection contained in Part IV of the Family Allowances (Qualifications) Regulations, 1946 (S.R. & O., 1946, No. 138); (2) that section 21 (7) in no way qualified the type of school nor the circumstances in which a child might be sent to school and once it was established that the child was absent from the parent at a school such absence must be disregarded and the child must not be deemed to have ceased to live with the parent; (3) that there was nothing in the Family Allowances Act, 1945, which prevented a child who had been taken into care under section 1 of the Children Act, 1948, from being included in the family of his parent for family allowances purposes; section 11 of the Act was amended by section 52 of the Children Act, 1948, so as to exclude from any family for family allowances purposes a child in respect of whom a resolution of a local authority had been passed under section 2 of the Children Act, 1948, vesting in themselves all the rights and powers of the parents of that child, but no restriction had been placed on the inclusion in a family of a child who had been merely taken into care under section 1 of the Children Act, 1948.

"absence at any school . . . and "the question whether any such "absence (other than at a school) . . . "is or is not to be treated as temporary . . . shall be determined by "reference to such rules as may be "prescribed."

The referee considered that the children could only be included in the family of the appellant during the time in which she and they were in fact separated if they could then be deemed to be living with her, and that the children could not be deemed to be living with her during their absence at the residential schools, but could be included in her family as follows: Jean Margaret up to April 2, 1953, and after June 6, 1954, and Alan Charles up to April 20, 1953, and that to that extent the appeal should succeed.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the effect of sections 3 and 21 (7) of the Family Allowances Act, 1945, precluded the Minister from deeming that the children had ceased to live with the appellant during their absence from her.

Duncan Wallace for the appellant.
Rodger Winn for the Minister.

No cases were cited in argument.

LORD GODDARD C.J. This is a special case stated by a referee appointed by the Minister of Pensions under section 5 (2) of the Family Allowances Act, 1945, which provides that "If any "person is dissatisfied by the award or decision of the Minister "in respect of an allowance . . . the question shall, on applica- "tion being made in such manner and within such time as "may be prescribed, be referred to one or more referees selected "from a panel, and the decision of the referee or referees shall "be final." Provision is made for the referee to state an award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court, as the referee has done in this case, and the effect of his award is in favour of the Minister and against the appellant. The court has had the advantage of a very clear and careful argument from Mr. Wallace, on behalf of the appellant, but I have come to the conclusion, without any hesitation, except upon one point, that the award of the referee is clearly right.

The appellant, Mrs. Hill, through no fault of her own, but having been deserted by her husband and left with three small children, was for the time being taken into one of the homes which the London County Council provide for what I may call destitute or homeless people who would not be properly sent to what used to be called the Poor Law Institution. While they were there two of the children, the little girl then about four years old, and one of the boys who was about six years old, were taken from the home by the county council, and the little girl was put into a nursery school and the boy into another school

v.
MINISTER OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL INSURANCE.

appropriate to his case. The smallest child remained with the mother.

Section 1 of the Children Act, 1948, provides: "(1) Where "it appears to a local authority with respect to a child in their "area appearing to them to be under the age of seventeen— . . . "(b) that his parents or guardian are, for the time being . . . "prevented by reason of . . . infirmity or other incapacity or any "other circumstances from providing for his proper accommoda- "tion, maintenance and upbringing; and (c) in either case, that "the intervention of the local authority under this section is "necessary in the interests of the welfare of the child, it shall "be the duty of the local authority to receive the child into their "care under this section." There can be no question but that the local authority, the London County Council, having placed the mother and the children in the home, and thinking that it was right that the two eldest children should be put to a school, were acting pursuant to their powers under that section when they put the two children into appropriate schools. But it is perfectly true, as Mr. Wallace has pointed out, that under that section the mother does not lose parental rights, and that she can require the local authority to return the children to her unless the local authority, for good reasons (which are set out in section 2), pass a resolution under which they will assume parental rights over the child. That, generally speaking, apart from illness or mental or physical incapacity, is where the parent has shown himself or herself to be incapable or improper to look after the child.

The result of the children having been sent to the schools by the local authority is that the appellant is relieved, so long as they are in the care of the local authority, of the obligation of maintaining and supporting them. The maintenance has to be done by the local authority. They may be able to recover something from the appellant, but the case discloses that they have not recovered anything like 8s. a week, which is what I may call the zero figure under the Family Allowances Act, 1945, for a person who is paying somebody else for the maintenance of one of his or her children. But there is no question here whether the appellant has paid or been required by the county council to pay as much as 8s. a week, so we may take it that it is as though she has paid nothing. She contends, however, that, although the maintenance is entirely in the hands of the county council, she is still entitled to claim family allowance for these two children, although they were being maintained in the schools by the county council.

I do not think that any court would be astute to construe the Act to produce that result, which one could say was certainly extravagant so far as the taxpayers (who have to find the money for the family allowances) are concerned, and would seem to be contrary to the intention of the Act.

[His Lordship read the Family Allowances Act, 1945, ss. 1 and 3 (1) and (2) and continued:] Section 2 provides that a person is to be treated as a child who is "under the upper limit of the "compulsory school age. . ." Obviously those sections are considering what is, in common parlance, a family living together or being maintained as a family. When we come to section 21 (7), we find that Parliament has dealt with certain absences, because it is realized that children are not always living at home. As I mentioned in the course of the argument, this Act is one of which every person can take advantage. There is no means test. It is not what I may call a Poor Law provision. It is a provision which gives anybody, whatever their means, whether they are millionaires or whether they are paupers, provided that they have more than one child, the right to receive 8s. a week in respect of each child other than the first. Section 21 (7) provides: "A "child shall not be deemed for the purposes of this Act to have "ceased to live with a person by reason of any temporary "absence, and in particular by reason of absence at any school, "and a person who has been contributing at any rate to the cost "of providing for a child, or has been maintaining a child shall "not be treated as having ceased so to contribute, or to maintain "the child, by reason of any temporary interruption or reduction "of his contribution to the cost of providing for the child, and "the question whether any such absence (other than at school), "interruption or reduction is or is not to be treated as temporary "for the said purposes shall be determined by reference to such "rules as may be prescribed." The rules that have been prescribed under the Act provide that any interruption shall be treated as temporary for the first four weeks. In other words, a child can be away from its parents for four weeks and the allowance will continue to be paid. Absence at school, however, is a different matter. There is no need to prescribe rules for that because any absence at school is not to be regarded as a break. But it seems to me that section 21 (7) (on its plain construction) does not mean that, when a child has gone to live away from its parents and has ceased to be a member of the family, so to speak, and, so far as residence is concerned has ceased to live with its parent (which is the effect of living at a school which has taken it over altogether), that does not amount to a break and that the parent is entitled to draw the money just the same. The subsection provides: "A child shall not be deemed for the purposes "of this Act to cease to live with a person by reason . . . in "particular . . . of absence at any school"; it does not say that when the child is at school it is still in any circumstances deemed to be living with the parents. The plain meaning of the section is that if the child is at school in the sense that it will always go home for its holidays, or if the child is ill, the schoolmaster may send it home then the child is still living with its parents although its physical residence for certain periods of the year is at the school. I think that it is simply dealing with the case of a child who is sent to a boarding school. As I say, the people who are entitled to receive these allowances are people of any means, great or small. The child may be sent to boarding school because people of enough means do send their children to boarding school, and for a child under the age of 16 years the parent can still draw the allowances.

HILL v. MINISTER OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL INSURANCE.

I hold, as a matter of interpretation of that section, that these two children were not living with their mother in any sense whatever. The London County Council have taken over their care and maintenance, and I do not see how I can say that they were living with their mother. That they were not living with the mother is not due to the fact that they were children at a school, but because the county council deemed it their duty to exercise the powers which the Children Act, 1948, has placed upon them in respect of these children, and have undertaken the care and maintenance of them themselves.

The only doubt that I have had in this case is that under section 11 (1) of the Family Allowances Act, 1945, special provision is made for children at an approved school under the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933. Section 11 (2) of the Act of 1945 provides: "A child shall not, for the purposes of this Act, be "treated as included in any family as respects any period during "which there is in force an order under the Children and Young "Persons Act, 1933, committing him or her to the care of a "local authority." Section 11 (3) dealt with a child in respect of whom there was in force a resolution under section 52 (1) of the Poor Law Act, 1930; that was amended by section 52 of the Children Act, 1948, and subsection (3) now reads: "A child in "respect of whom there is in force a resolution of a local "authority passed under subsection (1) of section 2 of the "Children Act, 1948, shall not, for the purposes of this Act, be "treated as included in any family: Provided that this subsection "shall not have effect as respects any period during which under "the provisions of section 3 or section 4 of the said Act of 1948 "the child is allowed by the local authority to be, either for a "fixed period or otherwise, under the control of a parent, "guardian, relative or friend of the child." That is a reference to a child in respect of whom, by a resolution, the local authority, having taken the child under their care, have resolved to stand in loco parentis to the child and deprive the parents of parental rights over the child, at any rate for the time being, and themselves to exercise parental rights over the child. It may be said that, since special provision has been made by section 11 with regard to a child in respect of whom a resolution under section 2 of the Children Act, 1948, has been passed it is curious that some construction other than that which I have made should not be placed on section 21 (7) with regard to a child coming under the care of the local authority under section 1 of the Children Act, 1948. But I cannot bring myself to think that section 11 in any way destroys what seems to me to be the main intention of the Act, that is, that before family allowances may be obtained the child must be living with its parents, and that absence at school is not to count as living at the school rather than living with the parents. I think it may be that section 11 was put in ex abundanti cautela. It may have been put in because in the two cases which are expressly mentioned in the Act a child can be taken out of the care of its parents against their wishes and a parent might be able to say "Why should I "be deprived of my family allowance because the child has been "taken away from me? I am perfectly prepared to go on looking "after the child, but I am not allowed to do it by the court or by "the local authority." Whatever the reason, I do not think that the presence of those two provisions in section 11 is enough to destroy what I think is the clear meaning of subsection (7) of section 21.

HILL v. MINISTER OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL INSURANCE.

Lord Goddard C.J.

For that reason, I uphold the award of the referee and answer the question submitted in the negative.

Judgment accordingly.

Rates and Rating—Science or fine art—Exemption—Society to promote folk dancing, folk songs and other folk music—Whether instituted for purposes of the fine arts exclusively—Whether supported wholly or in part by voluntary contributions—Scientific Societies Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 36), s. 1.

The memorandum of association of a society showed its objects to be, inter alia, the preservation, propagation and encouragement of the practice in their traditional forms of English folk dancing, folk songs and music, including singing games. The society claimed that a hereditament which it owned and occupied for such purposes should be exempt from rates under section 1[1] of the Scientific Societies Act, 1843, as premises belonging to a society "instituted "for the purposes of science . . . or the fine arts exclusively" and "supported wholly or in part by annual voluntary contribu-"tions":—

Held, that although the expression "fine arts" was not now confined to the plastic arts alone, any addition would have to be an activity showing a true analogy to the primary instances of painting, sculpture and architecture; that music was included, and some forms of drama and of dancing, such as ballet, might be regarded as analogous to the primary instances, but it did not follow that all dancing was a fine art; and that the performance of the old traditional folk dances, which were recreational dances and not ones involving an artistic exhibition of skill, was not a fine art, and, accordingly, that the objects of the society were not exclusively those of the fine arts within the meaning of section 1 of the Act.

Appeal by case stated from a decision of the Lands Tribunal affirming a decision of the local valuation court for North-East London.

The respondents, the English Folk Dance and Song Society, owned and occupied a hereditament described in the valuation list as hall, offices, library, rooms, caretaker's lower ground floor flat, premises and appurtenances known as Cecil Sharp House, situated at 2, Regent's Park Road in the Metropolitan Borough of St. Pancras rating area. On September 29, 1952, the valuation officer made a proposal that the hereditament should not be exempt under the Scientific Societies Act, 1843,[1] but that it should be assessed at gross value £1,300, rateable value £1,080. On October 3, 1952, the society gave notice of objection to that proposal, and notice of appeal to the local valuation court was given by the valuation officer on October 8, 1952. The local valuation court heard and dismissed the appeal on January 27, 1953. The valuation officer appealed to the Lands Tribunal which on July 16 and 17, heard and dismissed his appeal. The valuation officer appealed.

The case stated set out the facts which were proved or admitted before the Lands Tribunal thus: By paragraph 9 (ii) The objects of the society as set out in its memorandum of association . . . are (inter alia): (a) To preserve English folk dances and songs and other folk music (including singing games), to make them known and to encourage the practice of them in their traditional forms. (b) To promote the knowledge and practice of English folk dances, songs and music by means of schools, classes, examinations, lectures, demonstrations, festivals and other like methods. (c) To promote and encourage research into and study of the origins, development and traditional practice of English folk dances, songs and music and their relationship with those of other countries. (d) In furtherance of the above objects to promote, and co-operate in, demonstrations, festivals, and other like performance of folk dances, songs and music of other countries, whether held in England or elsewhere. (e) Also in furtherance of the above objects to prepare and publish, issue and make use of, for sale, performance or otherwise, such books, journals, records, reports, and other literature, and means and apparatus for the visual and mechanical reproduction of folk dances, songs and music as may seem desirable. (f) To make, obtain and distribute, by sale or otherwise, instruments and other articles of whatever description requisite for the practice of folk dances, songs and music in accordance with the above objects. (g) To solicit and receive subscriptions and gifts of all kinds, whether absolute or conditional, for the purposes of the society. (iii) The said hereditament is occupied by the society for the transaction of its business and for carrying into effect its purposes. (iv) The society does not and by its laws may not make any dividend gift division or bonus unto or between any of its members. (v) The society was at all material times in possession of a certificate of the registrar of Friendly Societies as required by section 1 of the Scientific Societies Act, 1843.

[1] Scientific Societies Act, 1843, s. 1: "No person or persons shall be "assessed or rated . . . in respect of "any land, houses, or buildings . . . "belonging to any society instituted "for purposes of science, literature, "or the fine arts exclusively, either "as tenant or as owner . . . provided "that such society shall be supported "wholly or in part by annual voluntary contributions. . . ."

10. At March 31, 1953, the society had 3,600 full members, 7,350 associates and about 95 donor members or contributors, of whom rather over one-third are also full members. Each year a full member or a donor member subscribes 25s., and an associate 7s. 6d. The privileges . . . to which members are entitled are:—

Full members. 1. Free copies of the annual journal and bi-monthly magazine which together cost 5s. per annum to produce and distribute; sales to non-members are negligible. 2. The opportunity to obtain back numbers of the journal at 5s.; non-members are charged 10s. 6d. 3. Participation in certain functions organized by the society at favourable rates. . . . The oral evidence showed that for all functions where members and non-members pay different rates the rates are calculated so as to show a profit if the event is fully attended, even on the assumption that tickets are bought only by members. The extra amount charged to non-members is thus additional profit and these functions in fact are run at a profit, but if for all these events members paid the same amount as guests or non-members the profit would be very much larger. As to events restricted to members or to members and their guests, the accounts up to March 31, 1952, show a loss of £55 in London and a profit of £80 in the provinces. Thus the subscriptions and donations are not devoted in any way to subsidizing members' events. . . .

Associates. Associate members are entitled to some, but not all, of the advantages of full members. Distribution of the magazine to them costs approximately 2s. 3d. per annum.

Donor members . . . They have none of the rights, privileges or facilities of full members or associates.

11. The society's activities include the following: (a) Examinations are held and certificates awarded by the society to members and others for proficiency in folk song and dance. (b) Publications, records and films about folk song and dance are made, and sold and hired by the society to members and others at a net profit of approximately 33⅓ per cent. The amount of net income received in respect of these items is shown in the society's accounts for the year ended March 31, 1952, as: Sales of books, music, records, etc. (less cost), £1,481. Hire of music, costumes, films and properties (less expenses), £89. Royalties, £173. [Total] £1,743. The society owns the copyright in respect of some of these items, but makes no charge for reproduction except where commercial concerns are interested. . . . (c) The society employs teachers who hold classes at which folk dance and songs are taught; these teachers also adjudicate at competitions organized by the society. . . . (d) At Cecil Sharp House and elsewhere the following events are promoted and organized. . . . (1) Dances of various sorts (some of which are open to members and non-members and others only to members and their guests), namely country dances (Playford and traditional), men's Morris and sword dances, community dances, square dances. (2) "At homes." These are open only to full members (or in some cases also to associate members) and their guests and are occasions on which members can meet the director and each other and practise rather more advanced and complicated dances, such as Playford, under the instruction of the director or some other expert; there are one or more interludes in the dancing during which performances of dance or song are given by experts, or one of the society's films is shown, and there is a short interval for refreshments. (3) Holiday courses in folk dancing and song. (4) Exhibitions of films of English and foreign folk dancing. (5) Lectures and classes in folk dancing, folk song and music and folk lore. (6) Demonstrations of folk dancing, including demonstrations by folk dancers from abroad. (7) Recitals of folk songs and folk music. (8) Festivals promoted by the society alone or in conjunction with local authorities and others.

Events organized by the society in the provinces are similar to those at Cecil Sharp House but not nearly so numerous. Cecil Sharp House accommodates only 250 dancers, and members attending the dances there almost invariably bring guests. (e) The society keeps a library at Cecil Sharp House. . . . There is no other comparable library in England and evidence was given that there was not such another in Europe. (f) The society has rescued from oblivion many ancient folk songs and dances and through its journal and magazine encourages research into their origins. It has published the index of English songs. . . . The Royal Anthropological Society has had papers read to it on comparative music, while on one or two occasions anthropologists have contributed articles to the society's journal. (g) Members of the society have competed in folk dancing events at the Eisteddfod. The society has promoted and encouraged international conferences of folk song and dances, and was largely responsible for the formation of the International Folk Music council which now meets every year and at which different countries are represented by teams of national folk dancers.

12. The following is a summary of the events which were advertised to be held at Cecil Sharp House (unless otherwise stated) in the Autumn and Summer sessions of the year 1952–53.

(a) Autumn

. . . (i) Members only and a guest. "At home." Monthly. Members free. Guests 3s. 6d. Country dances. Twice monthly. Playford dances. Monthly. (Members 4s. Double, 2s. 6d. single. Guests 3s. 6d. single. Members' children's Christmas party. Price of tickets did not appear for the evidence.

(ii) Members, associates and guests. "At homes." Twice monthly. Members 2s. Associates 2s. 6d. Guests 3s. 6d. Festivals "At homes." Two. Members and associates free. Guests 3s. 6d. December 21, 1952, carol evening. Free, silver collection. December 5, Lecture by the director and a film. Members 2s. 6d. Associates 3s. Guests 3s. 6d.

(iii) Members and non-members. Men's Morris and sword. Monthly. Members 2s. 6d., Non-members 3s. 6d. Square dances. Five times monthly except Christmas week and January 9 and 10. Members 4s. double, 2s. 6d. single. Others 6s., double, 3s. 6d. single. Square dances at Albany Street drill hall. Monthly. 3s. 6d., double; 2s. 6d., single for all.

(iv) Miscellaneous. December 31, 1952. January 6, 1953. Two Christmas holiday courses, one for callers, leaders, and players of folk dance and music, and one for students. January 8. Festival ball. January 9 and 10. Folk dance festival (Royal Albert Hall). Square dances were held at the Lyceum, Strand, London; these were to be discontinued because of lack of public support.

(b) Summer (April to July except where otherwise stated). . . .

(i) Members only and a guest. Two "At homes." May and July, members free; guests 3s. 6d. Six country dances. Members 4s. double, 2s. 6d. single, guests 3s. 6d. Members and non-members. 19 square dances, 4 country dances; members 4s. double, 2s. 6d. single. Others 6s. double, 3s. 6d. single. (August) 4 community dances 4s. double, 2s. 6d. single for all.

(ii) Coronation Week . . . Community dances. Folk song recitals and demonstrations by visiting Morris teams. Members and associates free, guests 3s. 6d. Anglo-Scottish ball, organized jointly with the Royal Scottish country dance society. Members only 4s. double, 2s. 6d. single. In addition the society organized four children's and four adults' dances at the Geffrye Museum, London, E.2.

(iii) Courses . . . 11 ten-week courses were held in country, Morris and sword dancing of varying grades; folk songs; square dancing and callers' practice. Charges were variously £1 10s., £1 5s. and £1 for non-members and for the same classes

£1 5s., £1 or £1 1s. and 15s. for members. In some courses there was a reduced price for a double entry which was the same for members as for non-members.

(iv) Miscellaneous . . . April 15. Evening of folk songs. Members free. Others 2s. 6d. May 15. Folk song recital. Members and associates free. Others 2s. 6d. May 18. Illustrated talk on Indian stick dances. Members 1s., associates 1s. 6d. Others 2s. June 8. Display by South African folk dancers. Tickets 3s. 6d. for all. June 15. Films of Mexican Pole and Californian square dances. Members 2s. Others 3s. June 20 and 27. In conjunction with the London County Council public performances were given in two public parks. Members and non-members paid the same rates. July 25, to August 1. Summer holiday course at Bangor. Members £2. Others £2 5s. Bookings were about 30 members and 90 to 100 non-members. August 1 to 15. Stratford-upon-Avon festival under the society's direction, August 15 to 29 Anglo-American folk dance course at Barford, Warwickshire; members and non-members paid the same rates.

13. The provincial events appear to be the same in principle as those listed in paragraph 12 though they were not held so frequently.

14. Folk dancing has its origin either in the spontaneous expression of emotion on the part of the folk—that is, the whole population in a primitive community—or in some sort of ritual or religious act, or in both. In Europe it is mainly of religious pre-Christian origin and ritualistic in character, but most of it has changed gradually through the ages from a religious meaning into an art form. Its performance in its traditional form ought to be unselfconscious. Its technique is best acquired by repetition over a long period until in the words of Mr. Douglas Kennedy "the mind as it were, is knocked silly and the body assumes its "own status and responsibility for its actual behaviour." The reason for this is that, again in Mr. Kennedy's words, folk dancing "depends for its finest expression on a bodily capacity to "express, and one of the factors which operates most directly "against this freedom of bodily expression is a conscious "knowledge, or a conscious attempt at knowledge, of what the "body is doing." Folk dancing differs from ballet dancing in that the latter is almost impossible without a conscious technical appreciation of what is to be done, so that the ballet dancer does not depend on spontaneity but on disciplined capacity.

15. Folk dances include Morris dances, sword dances and country dances (Playford and traditional). The term "square "dance" is the American equivalent of the English "country "dance." The round country dance is thought to derive either from the maypole round or (in the form of a chain dance) from the pre-Christian carol, and the square dance has grown out of the round or chain. The founder of the society, Cecil Sharp, first encountered the American square dance in 1917 as a traditional dance of the mountains of Kentucky. Its origin is believed to be British though its precise provenance has been the subject of controversy in the society's magazine. . . . The society includes, and has for some time included, American square dances in the subject-matter of its activities, and before the war of 1939–1945 used to add to its repertoire by annual visits to the United States. As a result of the attendance of Her Majesty the Queen (then Princess Elizabeth) at a square dance party in Canada in 1951, square dances became immediately popular in England and in many cases were commercialized. The society does its best to stick to the traditional forms, but is not always completely successful, because to some extent there is an overlap. The square dances practised by the society can, however, be quite recognizably distinguished from the rather more flashy square dances which have appeared on television, and which have been mainly of the variety danced (for example) at holiday camps. The society could not persuade the B.B.C. to show its variety on television, as the latter considered the society "stuffy." For some years the society co-operated with the B.B.C. on sound programmes connected with folk dancing, but recently the society has refused to continue this co-operation since in its view the broadcast programmes have concentrated too much on the purely entertainment value of folk dancing. Among the general public there has been a certain amount of confusion as to what is meant by the square dance, and the society's square dances are not what the ordinary person in the street would expect as a square dance. Since the recent popular fashion referred to above the society's dances have been attended by a large mass of the public that is ephemeral. Such visitors are a little disappointed when they find that the dances performed differ from the commercialized versions of square dances and how staid the society's dances are. A few go off in haste, but most of them stay and have their money's worth, and have an evening when they can enjoy and learn something. A proportion (estimated as between 10 per cent. and 50 per cent. in London) become permanently interested in the society. Occasionally the society has had to refund money to people who have come to its square dances, and complained that the dancing was not "square dancing at all." Community dances are country dances similar to square dances. Better known examples of square or country or community dances, some of which have appeared in the ballroom in a commercialized form, are the Virginia Reel, "Strip the willow" (which is the Scottish version of the English country dance "Drops of Brandy"), "Sir Roger de Coverley," "The Dashing White Sergeant" and certain versions of the quadrille and "The Lancers."

16. Singing games originated from the pre-Christian carol and usually contained a mixture of the drama, the mime, the playing of a game and a certain amount of dancing. They are part of folk tradition and were originally performed by grown-up people; but only fragments have survived, mainly preserved by children, of which fragments "Roman soldiers," "Gathering nuts in "May" and "Here we go round the mulberry bush" are examples. The society regards singing games as being of great interest as representing survivals of old rituals; in its early days it did a great deal of work in collecting them, and included them in its courses of instruction, particularly for school teachers at primary schools. It does not now itself teach singing games, but it has records of them and its teachers advise and help school teachers in connexion with their teaching.

O'SULLIVAN (VALUATION OFFICER) v. ENGLISH FOLK DANCE AND SONG SOCIETY.

17. The only method of preserving folk dances is by demonstration and teaching; for there is no simple method of notation of dances comparable to a musical score. No doubt those who attend the society's dances enjoy them, but the instructional element is always present, although the society naturally endeavours to make it as unobtrusive as possible and its events are most successful when this is done. Although the words "social events" are used in the accounts the evidence showed that this description was used as a generic term to cover all the dances and similar functions held at Cecil Sharp House and that the only one of the society's activities which can properly be described as a purely social event was the members' children's Christmas party.

18. Folk song and folk dancing are very closely inter-related. Evidence was given that folk song and folk dance airs form one of the principal sources of all music and have served as an inspiration to many composers past and present. Reference was made in particular to the music of Dr. Vaughan Williams, the president of the society. This would not apply to folk dancing, but one or two choreographers have used folk dance forms in ballet. Massine was cited as an example.

19. The society's total income as shown by the accounts for the year ending March 31, 1952 . . . was £32,667. This figure included a grant of £750 from the Arts Council of Great Britain to cover the cost of performance of "Folk Dances of the British "Isles" given by the society in the Royal Albert Hall during the Festival of Britain. The Arts Council was incorporated in or about 1946. According to its charter, it was founded "for the "purpose of developing a greater knowledge, understanding and "practice of the fine arts exclusively," and the deputy secretary of the council, who conceded that he was not an artistic expert, expressed the view that this precluded it from helping any society that practised anything other than the fine arts. During the years 1940–1941 to 1945–1946 inclusive the council's predecessor, the council for the encouragement of music and the arts (which in 1945 changed its name to "the Arts Council of "Great Britain," but was not then incorporated), made annual grants of £500 to the general funds of the society. In 1946 the society received its first direct government grant, from the Ministry of Education; as a result of financial help to the society being taken over by the Ministry, the council's predecessor made no further grants to the general funds of the society, and the council has made no such grants since its incorporation. It has, however, made three grants for specific purposes; besides the grant of £750 referred to above, there was a grant of £850 in 1950 towards the cost of a mural painting at Cecil Sharp House and a grant of £500 in 1952 towards the expenses of an international conference on folk music for which the society acted as hosts in this country.

The conclusions of the Lands Tribunal were stated as follows: 23. On the evidence before us we came to the conclusion that there was no reason why dancing, which is a form of expression similar to music, drama and painting, could not qualify for inclusion within the term "fine art," and we were of opinion that the activities of the society as enjoined by the memorandum of association and as carried out by them were devoted to the purposes of the "fine arts" exclusively.

24. We were further of the opinion that although the members of the society had certain privileges vis-à-vis non-members, this can be said of most learned societies. We considered that these privileges were only incidental to the main purposes of the society and did not debar it from claiming exemption under the section.

25. Finally we came to the conclusion that the amount of £7,000 odd out of total income of £32,000 odd in 1952 was represented by subscriptions and donations of members and that this was sufficient to enable us to come to the conclusion that the society conformed to the requirements of the provisions of section 1 of the aforesaid Act in that it was in part supported by annual voluntary contributions.

The tribunal accordingly dismissed the appeal.

Evershed M.R.

the Lands Tribunal and the local valuation court, entitled to exemption from rates in respect of the premises known as Cecil Sharp House in Regent's Park Road, London, which the society owns and occupies. The claim to exemption is based on section 1 of the Scientific Societies Act, 1843, which, so far as is relevant, reads: "No person or persons shall be assessed or rated . . . in "respect of any land, houses or buildings . . . belonging to any "society instituted for purposes of science, literature, or the fine "arts exclusively, either as tenant or as owner . . . provided that "such society shall be supported wholly or in part by annual "voluntary contributions. . . ."

The case comes before us on a case stated in which all the facts found, or given in evidence, are set forth and to which full reference can, if necessary, be made. Out of respect for the arguments, and so as to make this judgment intelligible, I will, however, refer to certain of the paragraphs in the case. Paragraph 9 sets out the objects of the society, which are taken from its memorandum of association. [His Lordship read paragraph 9 (ii) (a) to (e) and continued:] Sub-paragraph (f) relates to the making of instruments; and an argument was based upon the proposition that, assuming a particular instrument in general use is requisite for use also in folk dancing, the memorandum authorized (and it was, therefore, one of the purposes of the society) the making and selling of those musical instruments. But in the event I think nothing turns on that particular matter.

Paragraph 11 of the case sets out the society's activities and shows that they include such matters as examinations, publications, records and films, the employment of teachers, and the holding, at Cecil Sharp House and elsewhere, of dances, "At "Homes," courses, exhibitions, demonstrations, recitals and festivals. There is also a reference made to the very extensive, and I think valuable, library kept at Cecil Sharp House; and, finally, there is a reference to the competing by members of the society in such events as the annual Eisteddfod.

Paragraph 12 amplifies by way of example the previous paragraph, for it sets out a summary of the events of the year 1952–53, which shows that there were a number of "At Homes" and dances at which members, their guests, and other persons were present, and that there were courses held. Also, since the year was Coronation Year, there were particular festivities arranged for Coronation Week.

Paragraph 14 is of considerable importance. [His Lordship read the paragraph, and continued:] In paragraph 15 reference is made to the character of the dances comprehended by the term "folk dances." Particularly the phrase includes square dances, which appear to have been discovered as existing in the mountains of Kentucky. Reference is also made to a notable event, namely, the attendance of Her present Majesty (then Princess Elizabeth) at a square dance party in Canada in 1951, an event which gave enormous stimulus to the activities of the society. The paragraph goes on: "The square dances practised by the society can, however, be quite recognizably distinguished from the rather more "flashy square dances which have appeared on television, and "which have been mainly of the variety danced (for example) at "holiday camps. The society could not persuade the B.B.C. to "show its variety on television, as the latter considered the "society 'stuffy.' For some years the society co-operated with "the B.B.C. on sound programmes connected with folk dancing, "but recently the society has refused to continue this co-operation since in its view the broadcast programmes have concentrated too much on the purely entertainment element of folk "dancing. Among the general public there has been a certain "amount of confusion as to what is meant by the square dance, "and the society's square dances are not what the ordinary "person in the street would expect as a square dance. Since the "recent popular fashion referred to above, the society's dances "have been attended by a large mass of the public that is "ephemeral. Such visitors are a little disappointed when they "find that the dances performed differ from the commercialized "versions of square dances and how staid the society's dances "are. A few go off in haste, but most of them stay and have "their money's worth, and have an evening when they can enjoy "and learn something."

In paragraph 16 there is a reference to singing games. [His Lordship read the paragraph and continued:] Paragraph 17 sets out the fact that the only method of preserving folk dances is by demonstration and teaching, as they are not susceptible of the ordinary notation of a musical score. The conclusion of the Lands Tribunal upon this point is expressed in paragraph 23. [His Lordship read paragraph 23 and continued:] From the evidence given and recorded in the case it is possible to state, at least in negative form, certain characteristics of the society and its activities. Thus: (1) The activity or "art" (if it is properly so called) of folk dancing and singing is not in any sense creative. The painter creates a picture which remains to be seen, appreciated and judged. In the case of music there is the presentation by an orchestra or individual players of the composer's composition. In the case of folk dancing and singing the purposes of the society are not to create anything and then present it for appreciation; but rather to encourage the performance by as many persons as possible of the old and traditional dances and songs in the old and traditional manner. (2) The society does not claim to appeal to the mind, or even, as I understand, to the faculty of taste. The passages which I have read from the evidence show the society's ideas to be that the dancer is so taught that he executes with his body, as far as is possible, spontaneous movements said to be expressive of natural or ritualistic physical impulses. The result may be pleasing or picturesque to the beholder but no claim is made to exhibit the beauties or graces of the human form. Artistic performances cannot be said to be the aim, still less the raison d'etre, of folk dancing. The controversy with the British Broadcasting Corporation seems to show a repudiation on the part of the society of any claim to please or attract the aesthetic sense of an audience.

In the circumstances, I have been conscious of an essential difficulty of formulation, namely, what is it in regard to folk dancing or singing which is said to be "a fine art"? To that question the only possible answer seems to me to be the actual performance by the dancers or singers of the old traditional songs and dances, the characteristics and requisites of the execution of which being those I have already recited. I have referred to the fine arts as one of the trilogy in section 1 of the Act, science, literature and the fine arts. Literature has no relevance in the present case, but the society has contended that it was in part instituted for the purpose of science, as that word should be understood in the Act. In support of this contention, counsel has pointed to the considerable research undertaken into the origins of folk songs and dances and to the learning devoted thereto, and to the propagation of public interest therein. I myself feel grave doubt whether any activities of the society could be classified as scientific within the meaning of the section. It is not, of course, suggested that all such activities are scientific; and in any event it must be shown that the residue falls within the category of "a fine art"; for it is not to be forgotten that to obtain the exemption provided by the Act the society must be shown to be instituted for the purposes of science and the fine arts exclusively. Therefore, the remainder—the non-scientific part—of the society's activities must in any event be comprehended by the term "the "fine arts"; or, to adopt the expansion of the language of the section used by A. L. Smith L.J. in Royal College of Music v. Vestry of St. Margaret's and St. John's, Westminster,[1] all such activities must be shown to constitute the advancement, dissemination or propagation of the fine arts, including the actual performance of the dances and songs themselves.

The real question in the case, therefore, in my judgment, is whether the society's purposes, in so far as they are not, if indeed they are at all, scientific, can be said to be for the purposes of the fine arts. The expression "the fine arts" is one well known to, and recognized by, all users of our language. Treating the question as one of the impression made by such words upon my own mind, and without the assistance of any dictionary definitions or of decided cases in the courts, I would say unhesitatingly that the society is not, according to my understanding of the language, instituted for the purposes of the fine arts. To take but one example (and if it be thought extreme it is to be remembered that the society must show itself "exclusively" so instituted), I cannot persuade myself that the performance, however faithful to tradition, by members of the society of the singing game

"Here we go round the mulberry bush" can sensibly be regarded as an exhibition of the fine arts. Having taken that example, I wish to make it quite plain that I am not to be taken to be casting any doubt whatever on the seriousness of the society's activities or the genuineness of its members' devotion to the society's pursuits, or, indeed, on the social value and utility of what the society does. No such denigration of its work can fairly be made of a society having so well-established a reputation as this society has, and having as its president so distinguished a musician as Dr. Vaughan Williams. But the court is not concerned with social uses or values, but only with the narrow question whether the society is instituted for the purposes exclusively of the fine arts, or of science and the fine arts within the meaning of the Act of 1843.

I am not restricted to my own understanding of the term because we were referred to the definitions found in well-known dictionaries. Thus, according to the Oxford English Dictionary, the term "fine arts," which appears originally to have been a translation from the French "beaux arts," is "arts which are "concerned with 'the beautiful,' or which appeal to the faculty "of taste . . . Often . . . restricted . . . to the arts of design, "painting, sculpture, and architecture." Under the word "art" in the same dictionary is found: "fine arts: Those in "which the mind and imagination are chiefly concerned." We were also referred to the following passage in the seventh edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica. "The fine arts. The "term fine arts may be viewed as embracing all those arts "in which the powers of imitation or invention are exercised "chiefly with a view to the production of pleasure by the "immediate impression they make on the mind. But the "phrase has of late we think been restricted to a narrower and "more technical signification, viz., to painting, sculpture, archi-"tecture and engraving which appear to the eye as the medium "of pleasure, and, by way of eminence, to the two first of these "arts." It appears that the entry which I have just quoted was from the edition published in the years 1830 to 1842 and was contributed by no less a master of our tongue than Mr. William Hazlitt. Having regard to the characteristics of the activities cultivated by the society as I have taken them from the evidence, they fall, in my judgment, outside even the broad definitions which I have cited. I do not forget Mr. Harvey's argument that whatever may have been intended by Parliament by its language in 1843 the terms used may fairly be shown to have been since expanded. I do not dissent from that view or say that the doors of the pavilion of fine arts were finally closed in 1843. Thus, there are many subjects of technique and research which can now be regarded as applied science, though they were not dreamed of in the philosophy of 1843. Similarly, it may be (though I do not so decide) that the art of photography, which in 1843 would have been at most a scientific curiosity, would in 1955, at least in some of its aspects, lay claim to be regarded as a fine art. But there is no finding here that at any time since 1843 folk dancing and singing have been accepted as among the company of the fine arts by the community generally or by the more educated and cultivated section of the community.

It is clear that there is no authority directly bearing upon the present question in the books. The cases may, I think, fairly be said to show that the fine arts are not now interpreted according to the more restricted definition of the plastic arts alone. Thus, music must now be taken as among the fine arts since the Royal College of Music case,[2] which I have already quoted. This court in Nonentities Society v. Linley and Kidderminster Borough Council[3] had before it the claim to exemption of a society instituted for purposes of the drama and dramatic performance. In the event it was not necessary for this court to decide whether a society so constituted was instituted for the purposes of fine arts, for the court held that in any case the Nonentities Society failed to satisfy the later requirement as to voluntary contribution; but the majority of the court were undoubtedly inclined to favour the view that the presentation of acknowledged masterpieces in drama would be within the term "fine arts." Thus Somervell L.J. said[4]: "Having come to that conclusion"—that is, in regard to voluntary contributions—"it is unnecessary to "decide the other points, some of them very interesting points, "which were raised. It was submitted, on behalf of the valuation "officer, in the first instance, that drama and dramatic art and "the art of acting ought not to be regarded as a matter of law "as within the words. It is quite true that the expression 'fine "'arts' is sometimes used to mean painting, sculpture, and, "perhaps, architecture, but it is plain from the decisions that "it cannot be regarded as so limited in this section. In a case "which is referred to in Jenkins J.'s judgment, music has been "held to be within the words. I was not satisfied that it could "possibly be said that drama and acting as a matter of law must "be excluded from the ambit of the words in the section." Birkett L.J., in like manner, said[5]: "I am not ready to accept "the contention of counsel for the valuation officer that dramatic "art cannot be included in the fine arts or that the presentation "of plays at a theatre may not qualify under the heading of "literature. If, for example, a theatre produced plays like "Twelfth Night, I think that there might be a considerable "argument on the matter." Romer L.J.,[6] on the other hand, indicated a contrary opinion.

The effect of the case to my mind is, however, to show that any addition to the class of fine arts which might otherwise be restricted to the plastic arts would have to be of activities showing a true analogy to the primary instances. At least, it is clear that there has been no case before the courts concerned with dancing. In the case of ballet dancing there would, as it seems to me (though I do not so decide), be substantial claims for inclusion in the class of fine arts which would not be available to folk dancing. On the other hand, to my mind it would, prima facie, offend the sense of propriety of language that a society formed for the purpose of cultivating the practice of modern ballroom dancing could bring itself within the section. Yet the society's argument seems inevitably to involve that result when regard is had to the evidence I have cited—or certainly to involve that result if, instead of modern ballroom dancing, there were substituted, say, the more graceful ballroom dances of the eighteenth or nineteenth century. Mr. Harvey, indeed, contended that a society for cultivating (amongst other things) what should be appreciated as good or bad in ballroom dancing would be within the section as a society constituted for the purposes of fine arts. I am not myself clear by what standard goodness or badness, in the example given, would be judged. But I assume that Mr. Harvey intended an appeal to cultivated taste. As I have said, any such appeal seems to me to be expressly excluded and repudiated by much of the evidence given in the present case, unless it be assumed that the standards of taste are necessarily satisfied by the mere antiquity of folk songs and folk dances. In any case, even if such a claim could possibly be justified in the case of the more austere aspects of the society's activities, it must, as I have already more than once stated, be established that the society's purposes are exclusively those of the fine arts.

Finally, the view of the Lands Tribunal, which I have read, and which was expressed by them in paragraph 23 of the case, seems to me to involve the acceptance of the claim, prima facie, that dancing is to be considered as one of the fine arts. If I may repeat the reference, it is: "On the evidence before us "we came to the conclusion that there was no reason why "dancing, which is a form of expression similar to music, drama "and painting, could not qualify for inclusion within the term "'fine art' and we were of opinion that the activities of the "society as enjoined by the memorandum of association and as "carried out by them were devoted to the purposes of the 'fine "'arts' exclusively." If the premise is accepted there is, no doubt, much to be said for the conclusion; but, with all respect to the Lands Tribunal, I am not prepared for my part to accept the premise. I do not think it possible to say that all dancing is, prima facie, within the term "fine art": nor can I agree with the correctness of the analogy in the sentence ". . . "dancing, which is a form of expression similar to music, drama "and painting, . . ." In my judgment the references I have made to the dictionaries and authorities confirm the impression of my own unaided mind, and I conclude accordingly that the society fails to satisfy the requirements of the statute to the effect that it is instituted exclusively for the purposes of the fine arts or of science and the fine arts.

In the result it is unnecessary to express any view on the second point, raised by Mr. Lyell in the appeal, namely, whether, even if the society be treated as one instituted exclusively for the purposes of the fine arts, or of science and the fine arts, it is still not shown to be wholly or partly—that is, to any appreciable, relevant extent—supported by annual voluntary contributions. I must return to the case to make some further references to the facts. Paragraph 10 of the case shows that in March, 1953, the society had 3,600 full members, 7,350 associates, and 95 donor members or contributors, of whom (referring to the donor members) rather over one-third are also full members. Each year a full member or a donor member subscribes 25s., and an associate 7s. 6d. There follow the privileges to which members are entitled; for example, free copies of the annual journal and a participation, at favourable rates, in certain of the functions organised by the society—dances, "At Homes," etc. In paragraph 12, to which I earlier referred, containing a summary of the events in the year 1952–1953, there is shown in the case of the various activities, "At "Homes," dances, and so forth, what a member paid to participate as compared with the charges made for non-members and, as indicated, these members' charges were smaller than those made to strangers. It is said that in fixing the charges the society goes upon the view that the dances, "At Homes," and so forth, should pay their way upon the footing that only members are present, assuming they are well attended, and the result of making the additional charges to non-members is merely to increase accordingly, for the general purposes of the society, the profits that are made. The conclusion of the tribunal upon those facts [as stated in paragraphs 24 and 25 of the case] was: "We were further of the opinion that although the members "of the society had certain privileges vis-à-vis non-members, "this can be said of most learned societies. We considered "that these privileges were only incidental to the main purposes "of the society and did not debar it from claiming exemption "under the section. Finally we came to the conclusion that "the amount of £7,000 odd out of a total income of £32,000 odd "in 1952 was represented by subscriptions and donations of "members"—that, of course, meant annual subscriptions and donations—"and that this was sufficient to enable us to come "to the conclusion that the society conformed to the require-"ments of the provisions of section 1 of the aforesaid Act in that "it was in part supported by annual voluntary contributions."

Mr Lyell's point in opening the case was that the ordinary subscribers could not be said to be voluntary contributors because they got some material advantages from their membership, particularly the right to attendance at the dances and other festivals of the society at prices appreciably below the prices charged to outside members and the public. Mr. Lyell accordingly referred to and relied upon Overseers of the Poor and Chapel Warden of the Royal Precinct of the Savoy in the County of London v. Art Union of London,[7] the headnote of which reads: "A society is "not 'supported by voluntary contributions' within the meaning "of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 36, section 1, when it returns to every contri- "butor the equivalent of his contributions in money's worth. "'Voluntary' as there used does not mean compulsory; it means "gratuitous, without any money or other merely material con- "sideration." It will be seen that the second sentence of the head- note appears to go considerably further than the first sentence. The two questions, namely, whether the society is one instituted exclusively for the purposes of the fine arts, and, second, whether it is supported in part by annual voluntary contributions, are necessarily somewhat interdependent in that, on the one hand, the facts as regards the prices charged for the various functions tend in themselves somewhat to support the view that the cultiva- tion of folk dances and singing is not as such a fine art. On the other hand, if the society is properly regarded as one instituted for the purposes of the fine arts, I am not, as at present advised (although, again, I do not so decide), prepared to say that they would be disqualified from exemption on the ground that the subscribers could not be said, on the grounds already stated, to be annual voluntary contributors. The basis, as I understand it, of the decision of the House of Lords in the Art Union case [7] was that the subscribers were there in effect making an investment. That is most clearly shown from the final paragraph in the speech of Lord Halsbury.[8] "It hardly admits of debate that the Art "Union gives to every subscriber full value for his money. The "document published by the art union itself appears to establish "very clearly that the subscriber obtains as an equivalent for his "contribution money's worth at least equal to if not beyond "the amount he has subscribed. I cannot therefore regard this "as a voluntary contribution; it is a prudent and well-rewarded "investment."

Every member of a learned and scientific society gets in the ordinary course, as Mr. Lyell conceded, some privileges: for example, the receipt of the publications of the society. In truth, to my mind, the question is one of substance and degree, and for this purpose I am content to adopt the language of my brother Jenkins in Metropolitan Borough of Battersea v. British Iron and Steel Research Association.[9] Jenkins L.J. said [10]: "This does "not, however, mean that a subscription is prevented from being "a voluntary contribution merely because it carries with it mem- "bership of the society and certain incidental advantages are "conferred by membership. The substance of each case must "be looked at to see whether the payments claimed to be

" voluntary contributions are, in substance, made as a matter of " business, or as a matter of bounty."

Being a matter of degree, the question, then, is prima facie one of fact. The difficulty here is that, in the paragraph which I have already read, I do not find any such finding. But I do not in the circumstances, for reasons already indicated, propose to express any opinion of my own. I say only that as at present advised I am not prepared to accept the view that a subscription ceases to be a voluntary contribution merely because, as part of the rights of membership, the subscriber may obtain some privilege which could be said to have a monetary value, or the deprivation of which entitles him to claim compensation expressed as a monetary loss or as damages.

For the reasons I have expressed on the first question, I think that this appeal must be allowed.

JENKINS L.J.: The issue in this appeal is whether, as the Lands Tribunal has held, the society is entitled, in respect of its premises, Cecil Sharp House, 2 Regent's Park Road, London, to the exemption from rates afforded by section 1 of the Scientific Societies Act, 1843, to the premises of " any society instituted for " purposes of science, literature, or the fine arts exclusively . . . " provided that such society shall " (amongst other conditions as to which no question arises) " be supported wholly or in part by " annual voluntary contributions."

It is contended on the part of the valuation officer (i) that the society is not instituted for purposes of science, literature, or the fine arts exclusively within the meaning of the section; and (ii) that, even if contrary to his contention the society is so instituted, it is not supported wholly or in part by annual voluntary contributions within the meaning of the section. If either of these contentions is well founded the appeal must succeed, for in order to qualify for the exemption the society must satisfy both conditions.

The society was incorporated under the Companies Act, 1929, as a company limited by guarantee, with the licence of the Board of Trade to dispense with the addition of the word " limited " to its name under section 19 of that Act. The objects of the society as set out in its memorandum of association include those to which the Master of the Rolls has already referred. The facts as to membership of the society are summarized in paragraph 10 of the case stated by the Lands Tribunal.

The society's activities are described in paragraph 11 of the case, and although my Lord has already referred to that paragraph, I may, perhaps, mention some of those activities. Paragraph 11 states: " The society's activities include the follow- " ing," and then reference is made to examinations for proficiency in folk song and dancing and the award of certificates. There are publications, records and films, which are sold at a profit, although that profit is but an insignificant proportion of the total income of the society, a matter of £1,700 out of a total income of £32,000 odd. It appears that the society employs teachers who hold classes at which folk dances and songs are taught, and they also adjudicate at competitions. Reference is made at considerable length to the events promoted and organized by the society at Cecil Sharp House and elsewhere. I think it is noteworthy that the list includes events such as dances of various sorts, some of which are open to members and non-members while others are open only to members and their guests, namely, country dances, men's Morris and sword dances, community dances, and square dances. There are also " At " Homes " which are open only to full members or in some cases also to associate members, and their guests, and there are occasions on which members can meet the director and each other and practise rather more advanced and complicated dances. Then there are holiday courses in folk dancing and song; exhibitions of films of folk dancing; lectures and classes; demonstrations of folk dancing; recitals of folk songs and folk music; and folk dancing festivals, which the society promotes alone or in conjunction with others. It is mentioned that Cecil Sharp House only accommodates 250 dancers, and that members attending the dances there almost invariably bring guests. Sub-paragraph (e) of paragraph 11 says that the society keeps a library at Cecil Sharp House, details of which are set out in one of the attached documents. There is apparently no other comparable library in England and Mr. Howes did not know of any other in Europe. [His Lordship read sub-paragraphs (f) and (g) and continued:]

This information is amplified in great detail in paragraph 12 of the case, which gives particulars of events held by the society in the autumn and summer seasons in the year 1952/1953. Reference in made in paragraph 13 of the case to provincial events which are described as the same in principle as those listed in paragraph 12. In paragraph 14 of the case there is a description of folk dancing to which my Lord has already adverted.

Paragraph 15 explains that folk dances include Morris dances, sword dances, country dances and square dances, the latter being described as the American equivalent of the English country dance. In paragraph 16 of the case singing games are mentioned, and such things as " Roman soldiers," " Gathering nuts in May," and " Here we go round the mulberry bush " are given as examples. The paragraph says that the society regards singing games as being of great interest as representing survivals of old rituals. Apparently, it does not now itself teach singing games, though it formerly did so; but it has records of them and its teachers advise and help school teachers in connexion with the teaching of such games. I should also refer to paragraphs 17 and 18 of the case. [His Lordship read the paragraphs and continued:]

Paragraph 19 of the case refers to certain grants made to the society by the Arts Council of Great Britain and its predecessor the Council for the Encouragement of Music and the Arts, apparently as implying recognition of those two bodies by the society as having for its exclusive object the furtherance of fine arts, or some or one of them. That, however, is a question for the court to decide on the facts found, and not by reference to any opinion upon it which may have been expressed or implied by the Arts Council of Great Britain or the predecessor of that body.

In paragraphs 24 to 26 of the case, the Lands Tribunal expresses its conclusions and the question of law for the opinion of the court. [His Lordship read those paragraphs and continued:]

The society claims that on the facts as found in the case it was rightly held by the Lands Tribunal to be instituted for purposes of the fine arts exclusively within the meaning of the exempting section; and further or alternatively, that if and so far as any of its purposes are not purposes of the fine arts they are, within the meaning of the section, purposes of science exclusively, so that the society is entitled to the exemption as being, within the meaning of the section, either a society instituted for purposes of the fine arts exclusively or a society instituted for purposes of science and the fine arts exclusively. It is clear from the case that before the Lands Tribunal (although the decision did not deal with this alternative basis of exemption) the society based its claim on purposes of science as well as purposes of the fine arts; but the argument based on purposes of science took, at all events before us, a secondary and subordinate place. The scientific element in the society's purposes is said to consist in the historical and anthropological or ethnological study and research, the promotion and encouragement of which form part of its objects. These activities might, I suppose, be described as being in a broad sense scientific; but even if they are purposes of science within the meaning of the section there remain other and leading objects which to my mind are clearly not purposes of science and can only qualify for the exemption (if they are to qualify at all) on the ground that they are exclusively purposes of the fine arts.

I pass, therefore, from the claim based on the purposes of science and address myself to the crucial question whether those objects of the society which cannot be classed as scientific are purposes of the fine arts exclusively within the meaning of the section. Excluding from consideration as possibly scientific in content paragraph 3 (c) of the memorandum [paragraph 9 (ii) (c) of the case], which is "to promote and encourage research and "study of the origins, development and traditional practice of "English folk dances songs and music and their relationship with "those of other countries," one is left, so far as leading objects are concerned, with paragraph 3 (a) and (b) of the memorandum [paragraphs 9 (ii) (a) and (b) of the case], namely: "(a) to "preserve English folk dances and songs and other folk music " (including singing games), to make them known and to encourage " the practice of them in their traditional forms. (b) to promote " the knowledge and practice of English folk dances, songs and " music by means of schools, classes, examinations, lectures, " demonstrations, festivals and other like methods." These objects must be read in the light of the facts found in the case, which show (see paragraph 15) that folk dances include Morris dances, sword dances and country dances, of which " Sir Roger " de Coverley " is an example, and that country dances include square dances, of which " The Lancers " is an example. They show further (see paragraph 16) that singing games include such old favourites as " Gathering nuts in May " and " Here we go " round the mulberry bush."

Object (a) must thus be read as directed (inter alia) to the preservation and making known and encouraging the practice in their traditional forms of folk dances, including country dances such as " Sir Roger de Coverley " and " The Lancers," and of folk music including singing games such as " Gathering nuts in " May " and " Here we go round the mulberry bush." Similarly, object (b) must be read as directed to the promotion of the knowledge and practice of folk dances (including as above) and folk music (including as above) by means of schools, classes, examinations, lectures, demonstrations, and other like methods. Are these objects, which are clearly not purposes of science, and none of which has been claimed to be purposes of literature, purposes of the fine arts exclusively within the meaning of the section?

By way of approach to that question we were referred to various definitions of the terms " art," " fine art " and " the fine " arts " in the Oxford English Dictionary and in the 7th and 8th eds. of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, covering the period from 1830 to 1860 and thus spanning the date of the Scientific Societies Act, 1843. The Oxford English Dictionary has under " Art ": " 10. A pursuit or occupation in which skill is directed towards " the gratification of taste or production of what is beautiful. " Hence ' the arts ' (specifically)—' The fine arts.' . . . 11 (a) " . . . ' Industrial, mechanical, useful arts: those in which the " hands and body are more concerned than the mind. ' Fine " ' arts ': Those in which the mind and imagination are chiefly " concerned." The Oxford English Dictionary has under " Fine ": " Fine art, in plur. the arts which are concerned with ' the " ' beautiful ' or which appeal to the faculty of taste; in the " widest use including poetry, eloquence, music etc., but often " applied in a more restricted sense to the arts of design, as " painting, sculpture, and architecture."

The 7th and 8th editions of the Encyclopaedia Britannica have under " The fine arts " the following introductory passage: " The fine arts. The term fine arts may be viewed as embracing " all those arts in which the powers of imitation or invention are " exercised chiefly with a view to the production of pleasure by

Jenkins L.J.

" the immediate impression they make on the mind. But the " phrase has of late we think been restricted to a narrower and " more technical signification, viz., to painting, sculpture, archi- " tecture and engraving which appear to the eye as the medium " of pleasure, and, by way of eminence, to the two first of these " arts."

I am prepared to accept the wider meaning assigned to " the " fine arts " in the above definitions and to treat them as including, for example, poetry, eloquence, and music as well as such " arts of design " as painting, sculpture, and architecture. We are indeed bound for the present purpose to include music amongst them. (See the case in this court of Royal College of Music v. Westminster Vestry.[11]) It is possible that dramatic art should also be included. (See the Nonentities Society's case,[12] where the question was discussed but not decided, as the society's claim to exemption under the Act of 1843 failed on the ground that it was not supported wholly or in part by annual voluntary contributions.) If music and drama rank as fine arts, I see no justification for holding, as a general proposition, that dancing, which in some of its forms is closely allied to music and the drama, can never do so. I observe that the Oxford English Dictionary under the word " ballet " says that it is " now for the " most part regarded as an artistic exhibition of skill in dancing," and this perhaps affords an example of a form of dancing fit to be recognized as one of the fine arts. But it by no means follows that all dancing is in itself fine art, or that everybody who dances any form of dance on any occasion is practising the fine art of dancing. An artistic exhibition of skill in dancing may be fine art, but I cannot bring myself to hold that dancing of the sort in which the assembled company take part for their own amusement at a ball or similar function can properly or reasonably be so described. Dancing of that sort is to my mind no more than a recreation or pastime—dancing as a social amusement as distinct from dancing as a fine art.

Applying these considerations to the present case and restating the two leading objects of the society in summary form, I find that so far as dancing is concerned the purposes of the society include making known English folk dances, encouraging people to dance them in their traditional forms, and teaching people how to do so. Bearing in mind the inclusion in English folk dances of country dances such as " Sir Roger de Coverley," and square dances such as " The Lancers," I find more specifically that the society's leading objects include making known country dances such as " Sir Roger de Coverley " and " The Lancers," encouraging people to dance them in their traditional forms, and teaching people how to do so. Quite clearly these objects extend to the reintroduction or perpetuation in recreational dancing of old-fashioned country or square dances such as " Sir Roger de [11] [1898] 1 Q.B. 809. [12] 47 R. & I.T. 426.

"Coverley" and "The Lancers," done as they used to be done in olden times, and giving people who enjoy dancing of this kind facilities for taking part in it. I cannot hold these to be purposes of the fine arts within the meaning of the section.

So far as folk songs and other folk music are concerned, apart from the inclusion of singing games, no point is made for the valuation officer against the society's claim to exemption in view of Royal College of Music v. Westminster Vestry.[13]

Restating the two leading objects in summary form in relation to singing games, I find that the purposes of the society include making known singing games, encouraging people to play them in their traditional forms, and teaching people how to do so. As appears from the case, and as I have already mentioned, singing games include such things as "Gathering nuts in May" and "Here we go round the mulberry bush." The question therefore arises whether teaching people (in this instance, no doubt, children) how to play, and encouraging them to play such games as "Gathering nuts in May" and "Here we go round "the mulberry bush," are purposes of the fine arts. I cannot bring myself so to hold. To my mind a person teaching children to play these games cannot reasonably be held to be instructing them in a fine art any more than children playing these games can reasonably be held to be practising a fine art. The children are simply being shown how to play a traditional game, or, having been shown how, are amusing themselves by playing it, and no question of fine art enters into the matter.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the society's claim to exemption fails on the first of the two grounds above stated, namely, that it is not instituted for the purposes of science or the fine arts exclusively within the meaning of the exempting section. I should add that in reaching this view I have, as the authorities enjoin (see British Iron and Steel Research Association's case [14]), guided myself by reference to the purposes of the society as defined by its constitution rather than by the purposes it has actually pursued in practice, but that the facts as to its actual activities as found in the case seem to me on the whole to confirm my conclusion.

I trust that nothing I have said will be taken as belittling the work of the society, which I have no doubt is valuable work, not only for the pleasure which it gives to many people but also for the additions it has made, and is making, to our knowledge of the traditional dances and songs of our ancestors, and for its success in preserving and reviving for our instruction and enjoyment these old dances and songs. Nor am I suggesting that the society is incapable of presenting, or may not from time to time present, exhibitions of skill in dancing for which the status of fine art might well be claimed. I am concerned only with the question whether the society is, within the narrow terms of the section, instituted for purposes of science or the fine arts exclusively, and for the reasons I have endeavoured to state I have come to the conclusion that it is not.

This makes it unnecessary to decide whether the society complies with the second condition of exemption, namely, that it should be supported wholly or in part by annual voluntary contributions. The valuation officer's argument on this point turns largely on the facts found in paragraphs 11 and 12 of the case, from which it appears that full members, and to a lesser degree associates, are accorded certain privileges and, in particular, admission to some of the society's functions at rates lower than those charged to non-members. The question is whether these privileges are such as to make the annual subscriptions of full members and associates other than "voluntary," according to the meaning of that expression in section 1 of the Act of 1843, as interpreted by the House of Lords in Overseers of the Savoy v. Art Union of London,[15] where it was held to mean, in effect, "made without equivalent consideration" as distinct from "made without obligation." That seems to me to be a question of some nicety; and as it is immaterial to the result in the present case, whereas a comparable case in which the corresponding question is decisive of the claim to exemption may well arise at some future date, I prefer for the present to leave it unanswered.

I should add, in conclusion, that in the course of the argument for the society it was suggested that the question whether the society was instituted for purposes of the fine arts exclusively was a question of fact which, having been decided by the Lands Tribunal as the proper tribunal of fact, was not open to this court. I cannot agree. The question is whether the society was instituted for purposes of the fine arts exclusively within the meaning of the section. That is a question concerning the true construction of the section, and, as such, plainly a question of law open to this court.

For the reasons which I have endeavoured to state I think this appeal should be allowed.

Parker L.J. I have come to the same conclusion. From a perusal of the leading objects of the society it is clear that, to use the words of A. L. Smith L.J. in the Royal College of Music case,[16] the society is "instituted for the purpose of advancing" or disseminating or propagating" (inter alia) the practice of English folk dancing. Assuming, as I do, that folk dancing is an art in the wide sense of the word, the question is whether it is also a fine art. The finding by the Lands Tribunal on this point is to be found in paragraph 23 of the case, to which the Master of the Rolls has already referred. Its conclusion, it will be seen, is arrived at on the basis that there is no reason why dancing in general cannot qualify as a fine art. I cannot bring myself to accept such a wide premise. While it may be that some dancing—for example, ballet dancing—might qualify, the question for this court is whether, on the facts found, the tribunal was entitled in law to hold that the form of dancing here in question, English folk dancing, comes within the expression " fine arts " where used in the Scientific Societies Act, 1843.

What, then, is included in the expression " the fine arts "? It was urged by Mr. Harvey, for the society, that any medium of what he called " pure art " as opposed to " applied art " comes within the expression. Whether an art is also a fine art, he said, depended merely on the use to which it was put. I am unable to accept this view. It seems to me that fine art involves something more than this. What exactly it is I will not attempt to define, but this at least is necessary, I think, before an activity can be so classified: it must be an activity which makes an immediate impression on the mind or imagination, its perception by whatever sense arousing aesthetic satisfaction. Moreover, the person on whom that impression is to be made is the person perceiving the performance, not merely the performer. The fact that the performers get pleasure from their activity does not, of course, prevent an activity from being a fine art if otherwise it is one. But here the main emphasis is on the pleasure derived by the performers. There is little, if any, evidence that people go to watch folk dancing as they undoubtedly go to see ballet dancing, or, if they do, it is to see more than others partaking in a revival of traditional and recreational dances. Dancing does not become a " fine art " merely because what is danced is a revival of that which was performed many hundreds of years ago and because the onlookers enjoy seeing others enjoying themselves. No doubt there is also a considerable historical interest aroused, but that is, in my judgment, not enough. A pageant, or indeed a tattoo, of the times of Henry V has great historical interest and may be performed in such a way as to please the eye; but there is all the difference between that and a performance of Shakespeare's Henry V. The latter performance may well be an exposition of fine art, but certainly not the former.

It was further contended that research into the origins of English folk songs and dances, an undoubted object of the society, was in the nature of a science. Even, however, if that were the case, that is not exclusively the purpose of the society.

Accordingly, I am of opinion that the Lands Tribunal was wrong in law in holding that the society was instituted for purposes of the fine arts exclusively: and accordingly it is unnecessary to consider the further question whether the society is supported wholly or in part by annual voluntary contributions. I would allow the appeal.

[1953. J. No. 7620.]

Vendor and Purchaser—Implied covenant—Warranty of fitness—Contract to purchase dwelling-house—Implied warranty—Purchase of bungalow in course of erection or to be erected—Cracks in walls appearing after completion—Caused by withdrawal of moisture from subsoil by roots of poplar trees—Not fit for habitation—Builder's obligation to provide proper foundations—National Conditions of Sale, 15*th ed.*, 12 (3).

By a contract made in February, 1950, the plaintiff's husband agreed to buy from the defendant, a builder, a bungalow "in the "course of erection or to be erected," and he entered into occupation shortly after the completion date. Cracks appeared in the structure which were caused by the settlement of the walls owing to the withdrawal of moisture from the subsoil by the roots of poplar trees growing near the bungalow. In 1953, her husband having died, the plaintiff, as administratrix of his estate, sued the defendant for breach of contract:—

Held, that the warranty implied in a contract for the sale of a house in the course of construction that it should be fit for habitation, and completed in a workmanlike manner when handed over on completion, was not confined to the parts of the house above the ground, but extended to the provision of proper foundations on ground where they would not settle. Accordingly, as the defendant had taken no steps to prevent the settlement of the walls which resulted in the cracks, he was in breach of the implied warranty, and was liable to the plaintiff in damages.

Miller v. Cannon Hill Estates Ltd. [1931] 2 K.B. 113, and Perry v. Sharon Development Co. Ltd. [1937] 4 All E.R. 390 applied.

ACTION.

The defendant, Jack Lockhart Harry Tavener, a builder, carrying on business at Chingford, Essex, before 1939 acquired some land adjoining a road known as Gunners Grove intending to build bungalows upon it. Plans were prepared by an architect in 1938, but owing to the outbreak of war the defendant was unable to proceed with the building. In 1949 he obtained a licence from the Chingford Borough Council to build, in addition to other buildings, two semi-detached bungalows to be known as 34 and 36 Gunners Grove. The architect did not supervise the building of the bungalows or examine the site, the defendant relying on his own ability to attend to those matters.

In 1949, the plaintiff's husband, Ronald Raymond George Jennings, entered into an agreement with the defendant to buy No. 34, approval of the borough council having been obtained. He paid a deposit on August 31 and on December 29 his solicitors submitted a questionnaire to the defendant's solicitors, in the answers to which the bungalow was described as being "in the "course of erection." On February 22, 1950, the contract was signed. It incorporated the National Conditions of Sale (15th edition) in so far as they were not inconsistent with certain special conditions which included, inter alia, special condition 10, providing that, if the property had not been completed by the date fixed for completion, completion should take place within seven days of the production of a letter from the Chingford Borough Council to the effect that the property had been completed to their satisfaction. The day fixed for completion was April 28, 1950. Work on the bungalow was finished on May 11, the purchase was completed on May 17 and the plaintiff and her husband moved in on May 20. Soon after they occupied the bungalow cracks appeared in the walls, and other cracks developed later. Complaints were made to the defendant by the plaintiff's husband before his death in September, 1950, and afterwards by the plaintiff. The defendant inspected the cracks in 1951 and in 1953 a further inspection was carried out by an architect, Mathew, on behalf of the plaintiff. He concluded that the cracks were caused by the withdrawal of moisture from the site by the roots of poplar trees growing in a cemetery some 30 or 40 feet from the back of the bungalow. In December, 1953, at the request of the plaintiff, the cemetery proprietors cut down the trees and destroyed their roots and no further damage occurred to the bungalow thereafter. It was eventually agreed between the parties that the cracks in the walls were caused by the withdrawal of moisture from the subsoil by the roots of the trees.

In November, 1953 the plaintiff, as administratrix of her husband's estate, issued a writ against the defendant claiming damages for breach of a contract for the sale of a bungalow in the course of erection or to be erected. She alleged that the bungalow had become unfit for habitation and claimed that the defendant, in breach of implied terms in the contract, had failed to build the bungalow with reasonable skill and care, to use good and suitable materials and to build in a proper, efficient and workmanlike manner in that he had failed to take any adequate precautions against damage resulting from the shrinkage in the subsoil which he knew or ought to have known was likely to occur; failed to take any or any effective steps to remove the roots of the poplar trees from the site of the bungalow or otherwise prevent them from affecting the stability of the soil; and failed to lay sufficiently deep foundations having regard to the nature of the subsoil on which the bungalow was to stand. She alleged two other circumstances as contributing causes but conceded that neither alone would have caused the damage.

The defendant denied breach of contract and alleged that the bungalow was constructed with sound materials and in a workmanlike manner and to the satisfaction of the local authority. Counsel for the defendant, in argument, also relied on condition 12 (3) of the National Conditions of Sale.*

C. P. Harvey Q.C. and M. R. Hickman for the plaintiff.
H. J. Phillimore Q.C. and H. E. Francis for the defendant.

Cases cited in argument (other than those referred to in this report of the judgment) were as follows: In re Puckett and Smith's Contracts †; Thomson v. Cremin.‡

Cur. adv. vult.

May 11. JONES J., reading his judgment, stated the facts, reviewed the evidence, referred to the cases cited in argument and continued: Mr. Harvey relied on an implied warranty that the house would be built in a workmanlike manner. Mr. Phillimore agreed that a warranty of fitness is to be implied in the case of the sale of a half-built house, but he maintained that the warranty was only that the builder would complete the building in a proper and workmanlike manner, and he claimed that the defendant had done this. He relied also on Condition 12 (3) of the National Conditions of Sale, 15th ed., but Mr. Harvey submitted that that condition was inconsistent with special condition 10 and did not apply to the contract. I am not sure if the defendant knew that these poplar trees were likely to cause this damage. I think that he should have known, as much literature had been published to builders that informed them of this danger, and I think that it is certain that if the defendant had employed an architect to supervise the building of the bungalow the architect would have known of the danger caused by the presence of these trees. It is interesting to notice the facts in Butler v. Standard Telephones,[1] where damage was done, and I observe that there was a case[2] before Harman J. recently in which similar damage appeared to have been done.

I hold that condition 12 (3) of the National Conditions does not apply to this contract, as it seems to me (though it is not easy to decide the point) to apply to a completed house and to be inconsistent with special condition 10, which clearly applies to a house in course of construction.

* National Conditions of Sale, 15th ed.: "12 (3). The purchaser "shall be deemed to buy with full "notice in all respects of the actual "state and condition of the property "sold and shall take the property as "it is."

It is necessary first of all to ascertain what is the nature and extent of the warranty in the case of the sale of a house in course of construction. In the first case to which I referred, Lawrence v. Cassel,[3] there was an express agreement to complete the house in accordance with certain plans, and it was a breach of that agreement that was alleged. It is interesting, however, to observe the passage in the judgment of Scrutton L.J. where he said[4]: "I "agree that it might require very careful consideration whether "the agreement to complete the house referred exclusively to "work to be done subsequently, accepting what had already been "done as executed according to the contract, or whether it "included the whole of the work to be done on the house—that "which purported to be completed as well as that which was "plainly unfinished. There is a good deal to be said for the "view that a contract to complete a house is not performed by "making a house full of defects some of which subsequently "appear in consequence of work badly done before the contract "and some of which are due to bad work done after the contract. "But on this question I say nothing, because no point was made "at the trial that clause 4 of the contract only related to work "which was to be done under clause 5, after the date of the "contract and before completion of the sale, but did not apply "to work done before the contract. In these circumstances I "do not think we ought to interfere even if we were of opinion "that the contract had no relation to work which had been done "before it was entered into, a question which, as I say, I am not "going to decide."

The headnote to the report of Miller v. Cannon Hill Estates Ld.[5] is as follows: "In a contract with builders or with the "owners of a building estate for the purchase of a house to be "erected or in course of erection, there is an implied warranty "by the vendors that the house shall be built in an efficient "and workmanlike manner and of proper materials, and that it "shall be fit for habitation. Lawrence v. Cassel[6] followed. A "representation by builders in conversation with a prospective "buyer, that all houses on the estate are of the best material and "workmanship may amount to a warranty collateral to a sub-"sequent formal contract, for breach of which an action will "lie." That is not really material to this case.

In the course of his judgment in that case, which came before a Divisional Court in the days when appeals from county courts went to a Divisional Court, Swift J. first of all referred to the sale of a completed house. Then he said[7]: "The position is "quite different when you contract with a builder or with the "owners of a building estate in course of development that they "shall build a house for you or that you shall buy a house which "is then in the course of erection by them. There the whole " object, as both parties know, is that there shall be erected a " house in which the intended purchaser shall come to live. It " is the very nature and essence of the transaction between the " parties that he will have a house put up there which is fit for " him to come into as a dwelling-house. It is plain that in those " circumstances there is an implication of law that the house " shall be reasonably fit for the purpose for which it is required, " that is for human dwelling. Our attention has been called to " the well known passage from the judgment of Bowen L.J. in " The Moorcock [8] as to the cases in which a warranty will be " implied in law. Can the parties here be thought, when the " plaintiffs were bargaining for a dwelling-house which was to be " erected in accordance with the character of the other dwelling- " houses in the neighbourhood, to have been bargaining for some- " thing which was no protection in wet weather? The jury have " found here that this house was in such a leaking or porous con- " dition that it was quite unfit for human habitation. If the " plaintiff has no implied warranty that it shall be fit for human " habitation, then the consideration for which he bought this " house wholly fails."

The decision in Miller v. Cannon Hill Estates, Ld.[9] was considered and approved by the Court of Appeal in Perry v. Sharon Development Co. Ld.[10] The headnote is as follows: " The " plaintiff on December 19, 1935, entered into an agreement for " the purchase of a house stated to be ' erected or in the course " ' of erection.' The balance of the purchase money was to be " paid, and completion to be made, on January 7, 1936, or ' so " ' soon thereafter as the premises shall be completely finished " ' and ready for occupation.' On December 19, the house, in " addition to the decorations, lacked such things as water-taps, " baths, and grates, and the plastering of the walls of the dining " room and drawing-room was incomplete. The plaintiff actually " went into occupation on January 7, 1936. In May, 1936, he " complained of various defects in the house, and in this action " he relied upon an implied warranty that the house should be " of the same standard of building and of finish as was the show- " house, and, in any event, that the construction should be " carried out in a proper, efficient and workmanlike manner. It " was contended that this was the sale of a completed house, and " that there was no such implied warranty. Held: this was a " purchase of a house in the course of erection, and not a purchase " of a completed house, and the plaintiff was, therefore, entitled " to rely upon the implied warranty."

Greene M.R. said [11]: " The county court judge has dealt with " the matter of law only. He has not gone into any of the details " of damage claimed. . . . Accordingly, in his judgment he " dealt with the question of law only, and he held that the

" warranties, or terms mentioned in the particulars of claim, " were to be implied, basing himself on Miller v. Cannon Hill " Estates Ltd.[12] I propose to consider this case without refer- " ence to any authorities, for the moment. It is, of course, well " settled that a vendor of a completed house, in respect of which " there is no work going on and no work to be done, does not, in " the absence of some express bargain, undertake any obligation " with regard to the condition of that house. It is further well " settled that, quite apart from obligations in contract, there is " no obligation in tort lying upon him in respect of want of proper " care in the construction or in the condition of the house which " he is selling. Indeed, the reason for that is obvious. Every " contract must, of course, be construed with reference to the " subject-matter with which it is dealing, and, where a contract " for the sale and purchase of a house is dealing with a house " which is, in the contemplation of both parties, and to the " knowledge of both parties, supposed to be a completed house, " there is no room for the implication of any term as to the doing " of further work upon it. But it seems to me that, where the " contract is a contract relating to a house which is still in the " process of being completed, where the vendors' workmen are " still on the job, and particularly where the completion is not " to take place until the house has arrived at the contemplated " condition—namely, complete finish and readiness for occupation " —there must be implied in that contract an undertaking that " the house shall be in that condition. The very fact that the " contract is a contract for the purchase of a house in course of " erection, that the contract contemplates that it is not to be " completed until the house has been erected, and contemplates " that the degree or the state of erection which that is to mean " is the complete finishing of the house and its readiness for " occupation, makes it almost possible to say (and I am not sure " whether it is not more correct to say) that, on the true con- " struction of the contract itself, there is an express obligation to " finish that house. For present purposes, however, it matters " not which way it is put. When this contract is examined in " relation to the facts of the case as found by the county court " judge, there is, in my opinion, imported into it an obligation on " the vendors to put the house into the contemplated condition " of complete finish and readiness for occupation. The county " court judge has found that that was not done."

He said further, dealing particularly with the judgment of Swift J. in the earlier case[13]: " The case upon which the county " court judge relied in this case was a decision of the Divisional " Court in the case of Miller v. Cannon Hill Estates Ltd.[14] " That was a case where there was a collateral agreement which " had been held to amount to a contract, and it was held by

" the Divisional Court that the jury was entitled to find that " there was a contract. A further matter was discussed, where " Swift, J., says in his judgment [15]: ' Indeed it seems to me that " ' it is a matter of very little moment whether there was or " ' whether there was not an express warranty as to the condi- " ' tion of the material or the nature of the workmanship which " ' should be used in this house, because I think that it is plain " ' from the whole of the facts of the case that the law will " ' imply a warranty that the house which was to be built by " ' the defendants for the plaintiff should be a house which was " ' habitable and fit for human beings to live in.' "

The Master of the Rolls continued: " Then Swift, J., deals " with the case of an unfurnished house, and points out that " there is no implied contract with regard to its condition. He " goes on to say [16]: ' The position is quite different when you " ' contract with a builder or with the owners of a building estate " ' in course of development that they shall build a house for " ' you or that you shall buy a house which is then in the " ' course of erection by them. There the whole object, as both " ' parties know, is that there shall be erected a house in which " ' the intended purchaser shall come to live. It is the very " ' nature and essence of the transaction between the parties " ' that he will have a house put up there which is fit for him " ' to come into as a dwelling-house.' "

The Master of the Rolls went on to say [17]: " I am not sure " (and it is not necessary to go into this question) whether some " of the reasoning of the judge in that judgment commends " itself to me, but, so far as concerns his conclusion as to the " implication of a term in the contract in the case where it is " dealing with a house in course of erection, I am in agreement " with the general conclusion to which he came."

Romer L.J. said [18]: " It is well established by numerous " authorities, to some of which Serjeant Sullivan has called our " attention, that, in the case of the sale of a completed house, " there is to be implied on the part of the vendor no warranty " as to the house being in any particular condition. The same " rule would apply in the case of an uncompleted house, which " is the subject-matter of a sale, where the structure stands at " the time of the sale. Where, however, the contract is for the " sale of a house when completed, there is an implied contract " on the part of the vendor, in the absence of there being any " express contract as to the way in which the house is to be " completed, that the house shall be completed in such a way " that it is fit for human habitation." He says further—it is not necessary to read all that he says—" In my opinion, in those " circumstances, there was an implied contract on the part of

" the vendors that, at the date of completion, the house should " be in a state fit for human habitation."

Mackinnon L.J. in a short judgment said [19]: " . . . a house " only partly erected, or to be completed . . . the buyer . . . " cannot inspect it, either by himself or by his surveyor, and, " in the second place, from the point of view of the vendor, the " contract is not merely a contract to sell, but also a contract " to do building work, and, in so far as it is a contract to do " building work, it is only natural and proper that there should " be an implied undertaking that the building work should be " done properly."

In my view, the evidence of the architect, which I accept in preference to the evidence of the defendant and his surveyor where there is a conflict between their evidence, and also the photographs of the cracks in the bungalow, which are really not disputed, establish that this bungalow was not in a state fit for human habitation and had not been completed in a workmanlike manner when handed over by the defendant to the plaintiff's husband at the date of completion because the defendant had failed to take the necessary steps to prevent a settlement of the walls of the house which resulted inevitably in these cracks in the walls. I hold that a breach has been committed of the warranty that is implied in the case of the sale of a house in course of construction. I think that the obligation imposed on the defendant by the implied warranty was not confined to building the parts of the house that are above the ground but extended to the provision of proper foundations for the bungalow, and the building of these foundations in a place where they would not settle or collapse. The defendant assumed the responsibility of supervision of the siting and building of the bungalow without the assistance of an architect and failed to provide the plaintiff's husband with a bungalow fit for habitation, as he omitted to consider or guard against the well-recognised danger that the proposed site of a house may be unfit for that purpose because moisture has been extracted from it by the roots of such quick-growing trees as poplars growing in the immediate neighbourhood of the site. I find that the defendant could have prevented the occurrence of these cracks by cutting the roots of the trees at a distance from the house or by asking the cemetery company to do so or by putting a concrete bed under the foundations. I find also that the other defects in the bungalow mentioned by Mr. Mathew existed, but neither of those alone would have made the bungalow unfit for habitation.

Settled Land—Trustee for sale—Improvement—From capital money—Repairs—Expenditure on repairs by trustee out of income—Claim by tenant for life for recoupment out of capital—Settled Land Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 18), s. 73 (1)—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 63), ss. 1 (1), 81 (1), and Sch. III, Pt. II, para. 23.

A testator, who died in 1932, devised all his landed property on trust for sale with certain consents and with a power to postpone. The income from that property was to be held on trust (after payment of certain costs, charges and expenses) to divide the net income into two equal parts and pay half to each of two of the testator's nephews during their joint lives with cross-remainders between them and with limitations over (as to any part of the property which remained unsold and as to the capital moneys representing the proceeds of sale) after the death of the survivor. The testator further gave directions as to what charges were to come out of the income of the general estate. These included all costs of (inter alia) repairs and similar outgoings.

Between 1946 and 1952 the Public Trustee (who was one of the trustees of the will) expended considerable sums out of income on repairs to agricultural properties forming part of the estate.

The tenants for life desired to be repaid out of capital in respect of these expenses, and a summons was taken out by the Public Trustee to ascertain his powers in this respect, having regard to the material statutory provisions and the decision in In re Duke of Northumberland [1951] Ch. 202; 66 T.L.R. (Pt. 2) 1045; [1950] 2 All E.R. 1181:—

Held, that the tenants for life were not entitled to payment out of capital in respect of the expenditure in question. There was an essential difference between a trust for sale and a strict settlement, in that the Public Trustee, as trustee for sale, had the management of the trust property. By the will he was directed to defray such expenditure out of income, and had done so. He had, in addition, statutory powers to defray, in his discretion, repairs out of capital; but once he had defrayed them out of income no question could arise of undoing that which had been done.

In re Duke of Northumberland, supra, distinguished.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By his will, dated July 31, 1931, Frederick George Wynn (who died on January 20, 1932) appointed three trustees (including the Public Trustee) executors and trustees of his will and devised unto them (by clause 11) all his landed property on trust for sale with certain consents and with power to postpone the sale thereof and to invest the proceeds, and he directed as follows: "My trustees shall stand possessed of the income of "such investments and of the income of my landed property until " the sale thereof and the income derived from [a certain mort" gage] and also the income if any of my residuary estate . . .

" upon the trusts following:—(1) Out of the gross income to pay " such costs charges annuities and expenses as are by this my " will directed or authorized to be paid thereout (2) To divide
" the nett income into two equal parts (3) To pay one such equal
" part to my nephew Lord Newborough during his life and after " his death to my nephew the said Robert Vaughan Wynn if then " living during his life (4) To pay the remaining equal half part " to the said Robert Vaughan Wynn during his life and after his " death to Lord Newborough if then living during his life."
After the death of the survivor of Lord Newborough and Robert Vaughan Wynn he directed his trustees to stand possessed of such part of his landed property as should then be unsold and of the proceeds of the land sold on trust for the first and other sons of Lord Newborough (who, at the date of these proceedings had no son) successively in tail male with remainder to Robert Charles Michael Wynn (the eldest son of Robert Vaughan Wynn) for life with remainder for his first and other sons successively in tail male with remainders over. The infant defendant to these proceedings, Robert Vaughan Wynn, the younger, who was born in 1949, was the only son of Robert Charles Michael Wynn.

By clause 12 of his will the testator directed as follows. " I " declare that the hereinbefore mentioned trust for sale of my
" landed property is a trust for sale within the meaning of section
" 205 (i) (xxix) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and I declare " that the said trust for sale shall as to the parts of my landed " property hereinafter mentioned only be exercised with the " [consents therein mentioned] . . . When the trusts for the " payment of the nett income of the proceeds of sale of the " property devised to my trustees upon trust for sale shall have " come to an end then I appoint the persons who at that date " shall be the trustees of this my will to be the trustees for the " purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1925, of the settlement which " under the provisions of this my will thereupon come into " force . . ."

By clause 14 the testator bequeathed the residue of his estate to his trustees on trust for sale and to apply the proceeds for the purposes therein mentioned for which purposes he anticipated (as proved to be the fact) that his residue might prove insufficient. He also declared that the expression " my general estate " where thereinafter used meant " my landed property and the proceeds " of sale thereof and the principal sums secured by [the above
" mentioned mortgage] and any such balance of my residuary " estate as aforesaid."

By clause 15 the testator authorized his trustees to continue the system of estate management carried on by him and to appropriate for the purpose of estate management any houses or premises forming part of his estate. He also directed his trustees "in the management of my estate and in considering "the question of repairs drainage cutting timber planting "improvements rebates to tenants and in all other matters to "act as good landlords. They should consider not only the "interests of persons entitled under this my will but also the "interests of the persons living on my estate. My trustees may "charge to income matters which might strictly be charged to "capital."

By clause 16 the testator directed that his trustees "shall out "of the income of my general estate pay all the legal and other "costs of estate management and pay all costs of repairs insur- "ance rates taxes tithe and the expenses of running the power "house and electric plant and other machinery and other out- "goings in their opinion properly attributable to income and "shall also out of the said income pay all such parts as they shall "not in their discretion charge to capital of drainage improve- "ments and other matters arising between them and lessees "tenants or occupiers of any part of the estate and shall pay the "interest on all charges on my landed property . . ."

In 1951, certain questions having arisen in connexion with the administration of the estate, an originating summons was taken out to determine those questions and an order was made in those proceedings, dated January 17, 1952. [See In re Wynn.[1]]

The Public Trustee from time to time carried out improvements to the property, which was subject to the trusts of clause 11, and charged the costs of those improvements to capital.

In addition, he carried out repairs to agricultural buildings forming part of the property and fixed equipment thereon required for the proper farming of agricultural land forming part of the property. None of these repairs were repairs which the tenant of the property was under an obligation to carry out.

Until 1952, the cost of the repairs and also the general costs of management of the property were debited to income to which Lord Newborough and Robert Vaughan Wynn were entitled in equal shares. Further substantial sums had been similarly spent since April, 1952, but their allocation to capital or income was held in suspense pending the result of the present proceedings.

Lord Newborough and Robert Vaughan Wynn claimed that the Public Trustee had and should exercise the power to recoup to them out of the capital of the property the sums expended as and out of income on repairs, and the Public Trustee, being doubtful whether he had power to make this recoupment, took out a summons to determine (1) whether, having regard to the provisions of the Settled Land Act, 1925, the Law of Property Act, 1925, and section 96 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, concerns the will of one Frederick George Wynn. It invokes certain statutory relief with which I am not here concerned. I am now to decide a question arising under the trusts of the will as follows: [His Lordship read the question set out above].

There are large numbers of agricultural properties and repairs have been done on them by the Public Trustee; and a great deal of money has been spent. An elaborate schedule was put before me showing the repairs year by year since 1946. The total in the years 1951–52 was as high as £5,000. The items are all in connexion with properties let to agricultural tenants; and are not repairs which the tenants themselves were bound under their tenancies or leases to do. But it is submitted on behalf of one, at any rate, of the tenants for life, the persons entitled to the income, that all those repairs, having regard to certain statutory provisions, ought to have been done at the expense of the corpus of the estate; and in so far as they have been done and paid for out of income, that ought to be adjusted now between capital and income, and that in future all such repairs must be done out of capital.

The alternative view is that the Public Trustee has a discretion, and counsel for the remainderman concedes that, in so far as no determination has been made in fact: that is, from April, 1952, there is a discretion vested in the trustee whether he should pay for these repairs out of income, and so affect the enjoyment of the income, or out of capital under the statutory powers which have been conferred on him. As to the period up to April, 1952, the life beneficiaries deny and the remainderman asserts that the book is closed, that the income has been spent and that the trustee has exercised the trust or the power and that there should be no readjustment because the matter is at an end.

In order to understand the argument I must shortly state the facts. The testator made his will in 1931 and he died in 1932. He left a large estate, principally real estate, in Wales. In the upshot there has turned out to be no residue. At the present time the real estate still unsold amounts to about half a million pounds in value, and there are capital moneys representing the proceeds of sale of the real property in the trustee's hands amounting to something under £100,000.

The testator by his will, so far as material for this purpose, devised by clause 11 all his landed property as therein defined to his trustees on trust for sale with certain consents and with a power to postpone. That is the trust for sale now subsisting as interpreted by the order of 1952. The income from that landed property and from a mortgage which is still subsisting was to be held on the following trusts: " (1) Out of the gross income to pay " such costs, charges, annuities and expenses as are by this my " will directed or authorized to be paid thereout. (2) To divide " the net income into two equal parts " and pay half to each of the first and second defendants during their joint lives with cross remainders between them: that is to say, the survivor will take the whole income. Then, "Upon the death of the survivor of "my said two nephews my trustee shall stand possessed of all "such parts of my landed property as shall be then in fact "unsold," and of the capital moneys representing the proceeds of sale upon certain limitations under which it is enough to say that the last two defendants are interested, one of them for his life and the other one in tail.

There was then in paragraph 14 a bequest of residue. The first trust of that is to pay the estate duty and it was all used for that purpose. The testator then declared that "The expres- "sion 'my general estate,' where hereinafter used, means my "landed property and the proceeds of the sale thereof and the "principal sum secured" by the mortgage "and any such "balance of my residuary estate as aforesaid"—there being none. He then authorizes his trustees to carry on his system of estate management and in considering the question of repairs to act as good landlords and to charge to income if they pleased matters which might strictly be charged to capital.

By clause 16 he explains what the charges are which are to come out of the income of the general estate. The trustees are to "pay all the legal and other costs of estate management and pay "all costs of repairs insurance rates taxes tithe and the expenses "of running the power house and electric plant and other "machinery and other outgoings in their opinion properly attri- "butable to income and shall also out of the said income pay all "such parts as they shall not in their discretion charge to "capital" of among other things "improvements." In my judgment, the words "in their opinion properly attributable to "income" apply only to outgoings and not to repairs. Therefore, under the will there is a direction to pay for repairs out of income and a power to pay for improvements out of income, unless the trustees in their discretion think they should be paid for out of capital. There is again a similar expression at the end of clause 16 where he says: "It is my wish that my trustees "shall out of the income of my general estate provide for and "pay . . . all rates taxes tithe land drainage charges repairs "insurance and similar outgoings," in connexion with certain real properties specifically bequeathed.

Therefore, by the will the trustees are not only entitled but enjoined to pay for all repairs out of income and one may suppose that that is what they did for a number of years.

The trust for sale vested in the trustees of the will confers on them, by virtue of section 28 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, the powers of a tenant for life and of trustees under the Settled Land Act, 1925; thus the improvements sections of the Settled Land Act are imported into cases of trusts for sale, the difference being that in the case of a trust for sale the trustees are in the saddle, and not the tenant for life as in a case under the Settled Land Act. In the latter case the tenant for life may decide what improvements are to be done and, if they be improvements within

WYNN, In re. PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. NEWBOROUGH (No. 2).

Harman J.

Part I of Schedule III, he may call upon the trustees to raise capital to do them.

I pointed out in In re Sutherland Settlement Trusts [1] that a tenant for life making an improvement and calling on the trustees to pay for it out of capital must use his powers as trustees would use them with due regard to all those who come after him as well as himself. But, subject to that, the tenant for life decides. It is quite different when there is a trust for sale where the trustees decide. Clauson J. pointed out in In re Conquest [2] that trustees for sale have, by reason of section 28 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, two sets of powers: first, the power of management conferred on them by section 102 of the Settled Land Act, and, secondly, the powers regarding improvement under section 84 of that Act. I add that they also have, where the will so directs, the powers given by the will. No doubt the statutory powers are superimposed on those: so if the will provides that repairs may only be paid for out of income, the Act has the effect of conferring the power to do so out of capital, if it be an improvement to which under the Settled Land Act capital moneys may be applied. That was a concession which was in fact offered by counsel for the remainderman and which I think all parties accepted.

But Mr. Edwards, for one of the life tenants, wishes to go much further than that. He says there has been imported into the code, so to speak, a new situation altogether by the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948. That Act by section 96 had the effect of altering the Settled Land Act, 1925. It will be remembered that section 74 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, which deals with the investment of capital moneys by trustees, authorizes them to pay, as for an improvement authorized by the Act, any money expended under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923. The effect of section 96 is to substitute the Act of 1948 for that of 1923. Therefore, one of the ways in which a trustee may invest or apply capital moneys is in payment for improvements or what are treated as improvements under the Act of 1948. The relevant provision is section 81 of the Act of 1948, a very extraordinary piece of legislation. It refers to "any improve- "ments specified in the Third Schedule to this Act." The terms of the Schedule include among the improvements, under No. 23, "Repairs to fixed equipment." Such repairs, therefore, must be treated as being improvements for the purposes of this Act, and are, therefore, matters on which capital moneys may be expended under section 73 of the Settled Land Act. Mr. Edwards contends that section 81 (1) of the Act of 1948 makes it obligatory to spend capital on such items. [His Lordship read the subsection and continued:] In my judgment, the effect of that is to show that these matters which are specified in Schedule III to the Act of 1948 are to be treated as what I may call Part I improvements: in other words, improvements in respect of which capital money spent is not to be recouped out of income.

Mr. Edwards says that having regard to the words "such "improvement" the effect of the subsection is that all improvements under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, are Part I improvements and must be defrayed out of capital. I do not follow that argument. All the section seems to me to say is that, if capital is spent on such improvements, it cannot be recouped out of income. Indeed, it starts by saying that where capital money is applied in the improvement then it shall not be recouped. That is all it says and that is all, in my opinion, that it effects.

In the present case no capital money has been applied in any of the improvements and, therefore, it does not seem to me that the section has come into operation at all. Apart from that, I can see nothing in that section, or anywhere else, to show that the powers thrust on the trustees for sale, being Settled Land Act powers, override their powers as trustees for sale. They are given additional powers and, therefore, they may override the instructions of the will to this extent that, whereas under the will the trustees had only the right to pay out of income, they may now in addition pay out of capital. It does nothing to destroy the testamentary power which they had to pay out of income if they chose: so, therefore, I reject Mr. Edwards' proposition.

There remains the question about the back payments. The evidence upon that is not very complete. First I have the statement in the affidavit in support of the summons that the Public Trustee has from time to time carried out improvements to the property and has charged the cost of such improvements to capital. No doubt that was an exercise of his powers under the Settled Land Act. It is further stated: "In addition, the Public "Trustee has carried out repairs to agricultural buildings forming "part of the landed property and the fixed equipment thereon "required for the proper farming of agricultural land forming "part of the landed property. None of these repairs were repairs "which the tenant of the property concerned was under an obli-"gation to carry out." Then he specifies these repairs and says: "The cost of all such repairs and also the general costs "of management of the landed property have been debited to "income of the landed property to which Lord Newborough and "Colonel Wynn are entitled in equal shares." That is the position up to April 1, 1952. He has done those repairs and paid for them out of income as the will directed him to do, treating those persons entitled to the income as entitled only after the duties required by the will have been performed. No one can complain, as I see it, of that transaction.

It is further argued or suggested that there ought to be some readjustments, having regard to the decision of Vaisey J. in In re

WYNN, In re. PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. NEWBOROUGH (No. 2).

Harman J.

Duke of Northumberland.[3] That case drew the attention of those concerned in the management of land to this rather revolutionary section in the Act of 1948 enabling the cost of repairs to be met out of capital, and landowners were not slow to take advantage of it. Vaisey J. held that, as the tenant for life there had spent money on repairs, which came within the Schedule to the Act of 1948, he was entitled to call on the trustees for a number of years to recoup those expenses. So it is suggested here that the trustee who has spent the money may recoup it from himself, as I understand it, by raising it out of capital and paying it over to the tenant for life as income.

In my judgment, there is an essential difference between a settlement on trust for sale and a strict settlement in this respect. Here it is not the tenant for life who has spent the money or who has to raise the capital which he wishes to spend. It is the trustee who has spent the money in the exercise of his powers and, indeed, as the trusts imposed on him by the will direct. Having done that, it seems to me that no question arises of undoing that which has been done. It is said: that he had no idea that he had a discretion to pay these sums out of capital under the Act of 1948. There is no evidence whether he had any such idea or not. Even if he had no such idea, I do not see that there was anything wrong in the Public Trustee carrying out the trusts of the will. Whether he would have come to a different conclusion, if the provisions of the Act of 1948 had been pointed out to him, I do not know, and I think it quite irrelevant to ask. In April, 1952, and since, payments have not been allocated to capital or to income; and, in fact, that has been done advisedly in order to await the guidance of the court on the matter. As to those payments, in my judgment, the matter is still open and the Public Trustee may exercise his discretion about it, or he may surrender his discretion and ask the court what he should do. But that part of the summons is not before me and I say nothing about it. The matter, in my judgment, for the reasons I have given, ought to be left as it is, and the plaintiff has no power to recoup these earlier payments to the tenants for life.

Declaration accordingly.

Trade Dispute—Industrial Disputes Tribunal—Jurisdiction—Award by tribunal that recognized terms and conditions should apply to local authority—Local authority's circumvention of award by dismissing and re-engaging employee for same duties on different terms—Report of an "issue" by union to Minister—Reference of issue by Minister to tribunal—"Issue" and "dispute"—Not mutually exclusive—No duty to exhaust alternative negotiating machinery before reporting issue to Minister—Industrial Disputes Order, 1951 (S.I. 1951, No. 1376), arts. 2 (b), 10, 12 (1).

After protracted efforts by an employee of a local authority, his trade union, and the relevant provincial (Whitley) council to persuade the local authority that a particular scheme of recognized terms and conditions should apply to the post occupied by the employee, an award of the Industrial Disputes Tribunal in September, 1953, made that scheme, by operation of article 10 of the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, an implied term of the contract of employment between the local authority and the employee. The local authority sought to avoid implementing the award by dismissing the employee and re-engaging him to perform the same duties under another designation and under a new contract of employment, to which a different scheme applied. The union thereupon, in February, 1954, reported to the Minister of Labour and National Service that an issue had arisen under article 2 of the Order as to whether the local authority should observe the scheme in relation to the redesignated post which, they contended, being identical in character with the former post, was one to which the scheme applicable under the award should apply. The Minister referred the matter to the tribunal; but the local authority objected that the tribunal had no jurisdiction to hear it, and obtained from the Divisional Court an order prohibiting the tribunal from proceeding. The court held that at the relevant date there was no "issue" within the meaning of article 2, as construed by the majority of the Court of Appeal in Reg. v. Industrial Disputes Tribunal. Ex parte Technaloy Ld. ([1954] 2 Q.B. 46; [1954] 2 W.L.R. 932; [1954] 2 All E.R. 75) between the local authority and their employee or the union, and that if there was any controversy at that date it was one to be decided under the appeals machinery provided by paragraph 25 (2) of the scheme, as "a "question whether or not an employee was 'an officer' to whom "the scheme" applied, by reference to the relevant provincial (Whitley) council. On appeal by the trade union:—

Held, that the tribunal had jurisdiction to proceed, since (a) at the relevant date there was a conflict between the union and the local authority arising out of the provocative action of the local authority with intent to avoid implementing the award of the tribunal; (b) that conflict was an "issue" within article 2 (b) of the Order of 1951, the union seeking to procure the application of the scheme to the employment of their member, while the local authority contended that the scheme did not apply to his present employment; and (c) nothing in the Order placed the union under any contractual or legislative duty to exhaust the administrative machinery under the scheme before reporting the issue to the Minister; a fortiori, when the local authority had repudiated altogether the application of the scheme to their employee in all other respects.

Per curiam, approving obiter dicta of Romer L.J. in Reg. v. Industrial Disputes Tribunal. Ex parte Technaloy Ld. ([1954] 2 Q.B. 46, 61, 64) that the terms "dispute" and "issue" in the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, were not mutually exclusive.

Per Denning L.J. The word "parties" in article 10 of the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, means parties to the contract of employment, and not parties to the dispute or issue reported to the Minister.

Per Romer L.J. The Minister is not the sole arbiter, by virtue of article 3 (2) of the Order, to determine whether a controversy constitutes an issue or a dispute.

Decision of Divisional Court reversed.

APPEAL from Divisional Court (Lord Goddard C.J., Ormerod and Gorman JJ.), March 10, 1955.

The following statement of the facts is taken substantially from the judgment of Denning L.J.: In 1949, one Carter was employed by the Portland Urban District Council as "station "engineer" at their waterworks, and was given a house on the spot. On January 6, 1951, he applied to the council (hereinafter called "the local authority") to be graded as one to whose employment should be applied the scheme of conditions of service for the miscellaneous classes of officers of the National Joint Council for local authorities' administrative, professional, technical and clerical services. This scheme was applicable to persons employed by local authorities whose duties were of a special nature, neither wholly clerical nor wholly manual, and, as approved by a Whitley Council (consisting of representatives of employers and workers in equal numbers), was set out in a red book.

On February 24, 1951, the local authority refused to grade him as a "miscellaneous" man. On April 6, 1951, his trade union, the National and Local Government Officers' Association (the appellant trade union), took up the matter and appealed to the local authority to grade him as a "miscellaneous" man; but on April 23, 1951, the local authority refused their request. On January 30, 1952, the trade union suggested that the matter should be referred to the Whitley Council for the "miscel-"laneous" men, according to the procedure laid down in the red book, but the local authority refused this suggestion, saying that the appeals procedure laid down therein was inappropriate. The trade union were not deterred, and themselves referred the matter to the Whitley Council. That council heard both the trade union and the local authority, and unanimously recommended to the local authority that Carter should be graded as a "miscellaneous" man. The local authority refused to accept the recommendation of the Whitley Council. The trade union thereupon reported the matter to the Minister under the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951,[1] on the ground that an "issue" had arisen as to whether the local authority should observe the recognized terms and conditions in regard to Carter. The Minister, on August 4, 1953, referred to the Industrial Disputes Tribunal the issue stated to be "whether the Portland Urban District Council in respect of Mr. "C. H. Carter, station waterworks engineer, should observe the "terms and conditions of employment established by the National "Joint Council" for the miscellaneous class. On September 7, 1953, the tribunal decided that Carter came within the miscellaneous class. Their finding was contained in award No. 426 as follows: "The tribunal find that the recognized terms and conditions of employment applicable to Mr. C. H. Carter's position are the terms and conditions of employment established by the National Joint Council for local authorities' administrative, professional, technical and clerical services. The tribunal award that the Portland Urban District Council shall apply to Mr. Carter the provisions of the scheme of conditions of service for the miscellaneous classes of officers as established by the aforesaid National Joint Council. This award shall have effect as from the beginning of the first full pay period following the date hereof."

Upon that award being made, article 10 of the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951,[1] came into operation, with the result that it was an implied term of the contract between the local authority and Carter that they should apply the terms of the red book to him until varied by agreement between him and them.

The local authority duly implemented that award for a few weeks, but on October 23, 1953, they gave Carter one month's notice in writing terminating his employment as station engineer. They then immediately advertised for a maintenance fitter in language very similar to that in which they had previously advertised for a station engineer, knowing presumably that Carter would be an applicant for this new post, because he needed the employment and the house which went with it. He did in fact apply for the position and was appointed to it on November 26, 1953; and he continued as before. He occupied the same house and did the same work, but was described as maintenance fitter instead of station engineer. Incidentally he filled in the printed forms which still had the description of him as station engineer. The only difference was that the conditions of appointment stated that he should "be subject to the conditions of service laid down by the National Joint Council for the Waterworks Undertakings Industry." The terms and conditions of that industry, which had also been approved by a Whitley Council, were contained in a white book. The effect of grading under the red book and white book schemes respectively was that the red book men were a little better off than the white book men.

The trade union regarded this as a palpable device by the local authority to get out of the award which had been made by the tribunal. On February 12, 1954, the local branch of the union unanimously passed a resolution asking the union to take appropriate action. On February 13, 1954, the union reported to the Minister under the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, an "issue" under article 2 as to whether the local authority should observe the terms of the red book. They reported: "The issue arises out of the terms and conditions of employment of Mr. C. H. Carter, who holds a post now designated by the employing authority as 'maintenance fitter,' Friar Waddon Waterworks. It is contended that this post is identical in character to a post previously existing in this authority and titled 'station

" ' engineer,' Friar Waddon Waterworks, and is therefore one to " which the scheme of conditions of service for the miscellaneous " classes of officers of the National Joint Council should be " applied." The Minister sent a copy of that report to the local authority, who took objection to it, saying that " it is not true " that there is an issue between the council and Mr. C. H. " Carter." On April 29, 1954, the Minister replied that it appeared to him that the matter reported by the trade union was an " issue " within the meaning of article 2 of the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, and that the Minister proposed to proceed with the reference of the issue to the Industrial Disputes Tribunal. The tribunal sat on June 24, 1954, to hear the case, but the local authority took objection to the jurisdiction of the tribunal and the hearing was adjourned until the courts had determined the question. The Divisional Court, on March 10, 1955, prohibited the tribunal from entertaining the matter. They held that on a proper construction of the word " issue " in article 2 (b) of the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, as construed by the majority of the Court of Appeal (Somervell and Birkett L.JJ.) in Reg. v. Industrial Disputes Tribunal. Ex parte Technaloy Ld.,[2] there was at the relevant date (February 13, 1954) no controversy between the local authority and Carter or the trade union, and even if there were, the controversy was not whether the local authority was observing the recognized terms and conditions of employment, but whether the occupation of Carter under his new contract of employment brought him within the terms of the red book scheme. They held that that was not an issue within the meaning of article 2 (b), but a controversy to be decided by the machinery provided by the red book scheme itself. Lord Goddard C.J. expressed the view that it was much to be regretted that the local authority had acted as they did when the award of the tribunal was made against them, and described the dismissal of Carter and his re-engagement as a fitter instead of an engineer to perform exactly the same duties as a palpable sham and not an action which one would expect of a local authority, which ought to be a model employer. An order issued accordingly against the tribunal prohibiting them from hearing the issue.

July 7. DENNING L.J. We are here concerned with a trade dispute which has arisen over a man employed by the Portland Urban District Council, whom I will call the local authority. The local authority have their waterworks at Upwey, ten miles from Portland. The man in charge is a Mr. Carter, who is given a house on the spot. When he was first appointed in 1949 he was described as the "station engineer." In 1953 he was given a month's notice but was soon afterwards reappointed under the description of "maintenance fitter." His work was just the same as before. It was only a change of name. The reason is because the local authority hope in this way to put him into a different trade category.

There are two trade categories into which Mr. Carter may fall. The one is the "miscellaneous" class, which consists of men employed by local authorities whose duties are of a special nature, neither wholly clerical nor wholly manual. The other is the "waterworks" class, which consists of men employed in waterworks undertakings. There is a Whitley council for each of these trade categories which has power to recommend what should be done for the men but no power to enforce its recommendations. A Whitley council consists of representatives of employers and workers in equal numbers: and it makes recommendations only when a majority of each side are in agreement on what should be done. The Whitley council for the "miscellaneous" class has approved a scheme of conditions of service for miscellaneous men which is contained in a red book. The Whitley council for the "waterworks" class has approved a scheme for waterworks men in a white book. Under these schemes the miscellaneous men are a little better off than the waterworks men. If Mr. Carter is graded as a miscellaneous man he might in due course get £520 per annum, whereas he would only get £482 19s. 0d. as a waterworks man.

There has already been one long contest as to whether Mr. Carter should be graded as a miscellaneous man or as a waterworks man. This contest took over two and a half years from January 6, 1951, to September 7, 1953, and ended with Mr. Carter being graded as a miscellaneous man. All this took place while Mr. Carter was described as a "station engineer" and I ought perhaps to give in outline the steps in that contest. [His Lordship stated the facts set out above, and continued:] Upon that award (award No. 426) being made, article 10 of the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, came into operation, with the result that it was an implied term of the contract between the local authority and Mr. Carter that they should apply the terms of the red book to him until varied by agreement between him and them. I say "between him and them" because I think that the word "parties" in article 10 means the parties to the contract of employment and not parties to the dispute or issue. The local authority duly implemented that award, but not for long. They got out of it by the simple expedient of determining the contract of employment and, with it, the term implied by the award of the tribunal.

[His Lordship completed the statement of facts set out above, and continued:] The first point is whether there was any controversy existing on February 13, 1954, when the trade union reported the matter to the Minister. I think there clearly was. The action taken by the local authority was so provocative that no one could suppose that the trade union would acquiesce in it or remain silent under it. Mr. Carter may have himself been content, so that there was no issue between Mr. Carter and the local authority; but there was clearly an issue between the trade union and the local authority which needed only to be formulated. It was suggested that the union should have written a letter to the local authority before they reported the matter to the Minister. I think not. I do not see any need for a letter before report any more than a letter before action. If there was no difference between the parties, the local authority could immediately say so; whereas if there was a difference, there could be no objection to its being reported.

The second point is whether the matter was within article 2 of the Order, that is, whether there was "an issue as to whether "an employer in the district should observe the recognized terms "and conditions." The difficulty about this question is that it has sometimes been assumed that a matter must either be a "dispute" or an "issue," but cannot be both. I do not agree with this assumption. I find myself in agreement with what Romer L.J. said in Reg. v. Industrial Disputes Tribunal. Ex parte Technaloy Ld.,[1] that there may be a very considerable overlap. Some matters may give rise to an "issue" only, as, for instance, when all employers in a particular trade observe the recognized terms and conditions but a trade union wishes an employer in an allied trade to observe those terms also. In such a case there is no "dispute" within article 12 (1), because there is no dispute between an employer and the workmen in his employ: but there is clearly an "issue." Other matters may give rise to a "dispute" only, as, for instance, when the workmen are dissatisfied with their pay or conditions, but there are no recognized terms or conditions with which they can be compared.

Apart from those cases, there are many matters which can properly be described either as a "dispute" or as an "issue." The Technaloy case [1] is, I think, a good instance. It raised an "issue" whether the employers should pay their men the recognized rates. That is how the Divisional Court looked at that case. It also raised a "dispute" between an employer and some of his workmen connected with the terms of their employment. That is how this court looked at it. So also with the present case. It could, I think, be described as a "dispute" because it is, as I understand it, a dispute between the local authority and some of their staff connected with the terms of employment of Mr. Carter. It can also be described as "an "issue," because the union claim that the local authority should observe the recognized terms and conditions in regard to Mr. Carter.

In these cases when a matter can properly be described either as a "dispute" or as an "issue," it seems to me that the choice lies with the persons who report it to the Minister. If an organization of employers or a trade union reports it as "an "issue," the Minister must deal with it as such; but if they report it as a "dispute," he must act on that footing. In either case the matter will, unless settled, come before the tribunal. The jurisdiction of the tribunal should not depend on any nice distinctions between a "dispute" and an "issue," especially in those cases where the matter can properly be brought under either of those descriptions. The words of Lord Goddard C.J. in an unreported case from Derbyshire (Reg. v. Industrial Disputes Tribunal. Ex parte Derbyshire County Council [2]) are in point: "Both issues and disputes can be referred . . . we "certainly should not order prohibition because it may be called "a dispute instead of an issue or an issue instead of a dispute." In my opinion the union was, in this case, quite entitled to refer this matter as "an issue" to the Minister, and the Minister acted quite correctly in referring it to the tribunal.

The third point which was strongly pressed on us by Mr. Threlfall was that the difference ought to have been referred by the trade union in the first place to the Whitley council for the miscellaneous class. It ought not, he said, to have been referred straight away to the Minister. This point finds its origin in paragraph 25 (2) in the red book (the scheme for the miscellaneous class), which says that "a question as to whether or not an "employee is an officer to whom the scheme applies, as distinct "from a question arising out of the application of the scheme, "shall be dealt with under the procedure for the settlement of

"differences as set out in the constitution for the provincial "council."

Perhaps the strongest way of putting this point for the local authority is this: The only thing that can be reported as an "issue" to the Minister is whether an employer should observe the recognized terms and conditions. One of those terms is paragraph 25 (2) in the red book. So long as the local authority are prepared to let the matter be decided in the way laid down in paragraph 25 (2) in the red book, it cannot be said that they are not observing the recognized terms and conditions.

The short answer to this point is that the local authority here repudiate the red book altogether. They say that it does not apply to Mr. Carter. They cannot be heard to say that he is bound by it when they say they are not bound by it themselves.

Furthermore, paragraph 25 (2) is not, properly speaking, one of the "terms and conditions of employment" at all. It is only machinery for settling a difference. The existence of such machinery is no bar to a report to the Minister. It is often of the greatest public importance that an issue should be reported to the Minister at once before resort is had to the trade machinery for settlement. It may be the only way in which a strike can be averted. It is then a matter for the Minister to decide what steps to take to settle the difference. It is for him to say whether there is suitable machinery for settlement of the difference and whether it should go first to the Whitley Council or be sent straight to the Industrial Disputes Tribunal. It would be very unfortunate if a difference could not be reported to the Minister until all trade machinery for settlement had been exhausted. The Order does not so require, and I do not think the courts should require it either. I think the trade union were entitled to report this matter to the Minister without first going to the Whitley Council.

In the result, I see no reason for issuing a writ of prohibition in this case. I think the tribunal has jurisdiction to determine the issue referred to them. I do not agree with the views of the Divisional Court, and would allow this appeal.

BIRKETT L.J. stated the facts shortly, and continued: The local authority did not pretend that they had created a new post for Mr. Carter; he did precisely the same work as before; he occupied the same house; the only change was the change of name, and the condition of the employment that he should henceforth be governed by the conditions of service in the white book and not the red book as formerly.

In the Divisional Court this procedure on the part of the local authority met with strong disapproval. I am bound to say that it does not seem to me to be consonant with the standards local authorities ought to set as employers to try to defeat the decision of the tribunal by this rather transparent device. But the result was a renewal of the contest which had begun in 1951.

Birkett L.J.

[His Lordship concluded his statement of the facts, and continued:] The Divisional Court has directed the writ of prohibition to issue because they said that there was no "issue" which the Minister could properly refer to the tribunal. Part I of the Order of 1951 is headed "Reporting of disputes and issues," and, after dealing with disputes, deals with the reporting of "issues" in article 2, subclause 2 (a), (b) and (c) of which are concerned specifically with the reporting of issues concerning recognized terms and conditions of employment. Article 9 of the Order deals with "Reference of issues to the Tribunal," and article 10 with the way the awards of the tribunal are to be applied to the contract between the employer and the worker.

For the purposes of the Order at least, a clear distinction is drawn between disputes and issues. It would appear that an issue is concerned only with recognized terms and conditions of employment as laid down in article 2.

In Reg. v. Industrial Disputes Tribunal. Ex parte Technaloy Ld.,[3] Somervell L.J. suggested that the wording of the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, might well be made clearer than it is, and added[4]: "It would be unfortunate if it remained a happy hunting "ground for prerogative writs." In Reg. v. Industrial Disputes Tribunal. Ex parte Derbyshire County Council[5] the Divisional Court had before it a motion to prohibit the Industrial Disputes Tribunal from dealing with a "dispute" which the Minister had referred to them under the Order. Lord Goddard C.J. reviewed the previous cases which had come before the Divisional Court, and concluded his judgment with these words: "I am inclined "to think, but it does not make any difference for the purpose "of this case, that so far as the description of what is referred "is 'that the county council should implement the recommenda-"'tions of the joint negotiating committee for chief officers of "'local authorities,' I think that, strictly speaking, is what the "Order calls an issue; but the second point, that 'the council "'should fix salary scales of not less than £2,600 rising to "'£2,900' for the four men is clearly a dispute; but I do not "think it makes any difference, because both issues and disputes "can be referred. The matter has been referred in this way, "and therefore the Industrial Disputes Tribunal can deal with "the matter; and we certainly should not order prohibition "because it may be called a dispute instead of an issue or an "issue instead of a dispute." But in the Technaloy case[6] the Divisional Court allowed a writ of prohibition to issue on the ground that the matter referred by the Minister of Labour was not a "dispute" but was an "issue" and should have been referred to the Minister as an "issue" and not as a "dispute." In this court the decision of the Divisional Court was reversed on the ground that the controversy in that case was a "dispute" and not an "issue." Romer L.J., while not dissenting from the decision of the court, made some important observations for himself, which have a great bearing on the way the Order should be interpreted. He said [7]: "It is, in my opinion, a matter "of some difficulty to fix with exactitude the precise line of "demarcation between what is a 'dispute' under the Industrial "Disputes Order, 1951, and what is an 'issue.' I am fully in "agreement with my brethren in thinking that the conception "of an 'issue' in the Order is primarily related to the question "whether or not a general code of terms and conditions of "employment which exist in any particular district should be "enforced as a whole on some employer in the district who is "not already bound by them. For myself, however, I feel some "difficulty in accepting the view that an 'issue' is rigidly con-"fined to the question of enforcing a code in its entirety and that "any difference between employers and employees which is in "any degree narrower in its scope than that cannot constitute "an 'issue' but must be considered on the footing that it is a "'dispute.'" Later he said [8]: "I am accordingly of opinion, "on the whole, that the failure or refusal of an employer to "observe some part only of a generally accepted code may con-"stitute an 'issue' and be referred to the tribunal as such, but "it may nevertheless also be a 'dispute' within the definition "in the Order and be reported and determined upon that footing. "It seems to me, indeed, that too rigid a distinction between the "two kinds of difference envisaged by the Order, involving as "it does the view that 'disputes' and 'issues' are mutually "exclusive, might well lead to trouble in the working of the "Order—as it has in fact led to trouble in the present case. In "my judgment there may in some cases, although not, perhaps, "in many, be an overlap between the two." In that case, Mr. Pritt, who argued the case for the trade union, said in the course of the argument [9]: "Even if the difference between the employer "and workmen is an issue, it also has all the qualifications of a "dispute, and there is nothing in the Order to suggest that "'dispute' and 'issue' are mutually exclusive terms"; and Mr. Cooke, who appeared for the Minister of Labour, said [10]: "If it is a question of the meaning of the terms and conditions "it is a 'dispute'; but if it is a question whether the employer "shall observe the terms and conditions it is an 'issue.' Where "the workmen are contented there cannot be a 'dispute' but "only an 'issue.' When it is a question whether the employers "are observing the national agreement the question whether it "is a 'dispute' or an 'issue' depends upon how the matter is "put forward. In effect, the parties themselves decide under "which definition they will bring forward the report. The "employer cannot report an issue and therefore the case can be

REGINA v. INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES TRIBUNAL.
Birkett L.J.

" reported as both a dispute and an issue." Mr. Beney, who appeared for the employers, said [11]: " What the report by the " union is seeking to say is that this company is not carrying out " an agreement which has been nationally agreed, and that is " the very topic which article 2 is intended to cover. If the " workmen were saying ' you are not carrying out the terms of " ' the agreement,' and the employer was replying ' I am carrying " ' them out,' that would be a dispute; but where a union asks " for a decision whether a particular employer should carry out " an agreement and is doing so, the Minister has no power to " refer a dispute, because there is no dispute, but only an issue." These quotations are enough, I should hope, to show the divergence of view on the interpretation of the Order. In my own judgment in the Technaloy case I confined myself to a decision on the point at issue, namely, whether the facts of the case brought the matter within article 2 of the Order as an " issue " or whether it came within the provisions of the Order dealing with disputes. I said [12]: " The real point to be decided " is whether the facts in the case show the controversy to be an " ' issue ' or a ' dispute ' within the meaning of the Order. The " agreement of November 29, 1951, was concerned with two " matters only—the 11s. increase and the question of holidays. " In asking the employers to fulfil the terms of this agreement " the union was asking for the increase in wages and for the " additional holiday; and in refusing to fulfil the terms of this " agreement, the employers were saying: ' We will not pay the " ' increase, nor will we make any alteration in the holidays we " ' grant.' ". I continued: " I am of opinion that article 2 and " article 9 (2) of the Order do not apply to the facts of the " present case, so as to make this an ' issue ' within the meaning " of the Order." It is clear from this quotation that I was then deciding that the view of the Divisional Court was wrong, because they had said that this was an " issue " and not a " dispute," whereas my view of what the Order meant by an " issue " was what I described in the passage quoted.

The difficulty in construing the Order arises mainly because the Order itself draws such a clear distinction between a " dispute " and an " issue." At the time of the Technaloy case,[12] and again today, I was impressed by the distinction drawn, and endeavoured to discover the reasons for the distinction. It still seems to me that on the facts of the Technaloy case [12] it was right to decide that the matter in controversy was a " dispute " and not an " issue," for the reasons given.

In the present case the local authority contend that no " issue " had arisen, and there was no controversy between Mr. Carter and the local authority on February 13, 1954, the date of the report to the Minister. The Divisional Court said on these matters: " It would appear from the facts that there was " no controversy between the council and Mr. Carter or the " association at this relevant date and, even if there were, the " controversy was not whether the council was observing the " recognized terms and conditions of employment but whether " the occupation of Mr. Carter under his new contract of employ- " ment brought him within the terms of the scheme. This is " not, in the opinion of the court, an issue within the meaning " of the article but a controversy to be decided by the machinery " provided by the scheme itself." In my judgment, the question whether there was any controversy between Mr. Carter and the local authority is irrelevant, and to state the controversy which had arisen as one which did not raise the question whether the council was observing the recognized terms and conditions of employment, but only whether Mr. Carter in the new name the local authority had given to him of maintenance fitter came within the scheme at all is to take much too narrow a view of the controversy. From the history of the case it seems to me clear that the union was raising the question as stated in their report to the Minister which has been quoted in the judgment delivered by Denning L.J. (supra). To submit that the proper procedure is to apply the provisions of paragraph 25 (2) of the scheme when the local authority has expressly repudiated any application of the terms of the red book to Mr. Carter is a little cynical; but in my view the Minister was fully entitled to refer the matter to the tribunal as an " issue."

That really disposes of this appeal, and strictly no question arises concerning the definitions of " dispute " and " issue," for on the view I take there was here an " issue," and the Divisional Court has not suggested that there was a " dispute," but merely that paragraph 25 (2) of the red book must first be applied. But in view of the argument it is clear, I think, that while there can be " issues " which can only be " issues " within the meaning of this Order, and " disputes " which can only be " disputes " within the meaning of the Order, there can be controversies which partake of the nature of a " dispute " and an " issue " at the same time, and in any such case it would seem that it might be reported as a " dispute " or as an " issue." I would allow the appeal.

ROMER L.J. One of the primary contentions of the Portland U.D.C. on this appeal was based on the provisions and alleged effect of the " scheme of conditions of service for the miscel- " laneous classes of officers," to which I will refer hereafter as " the scheme." Paragraph 25 of the scheme concerns appeals, and in subparagraph (2) thereof provides as follows: " A question " as to whether or not an employee is an officer to whom the " scheme applies, as distinct from a question arising out of " the application of the scheme, shall be dealt with under the " procedure for the settlement of differences as set out in the " constitution of the provincial council, and any decision in favour " of the employee . . . shall have effect from a date not earlier " than that on which application was first made to the employing " authority." The urban district council say that, by reason of this provision, the question as to whether the scheme applies to Mr. Carter in his present employment cannot (at all events at present) be referred by the Minister as an " issue " under the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951. The matter is put in two ways. First it is said that no issue can arise unless and until the question has been submitted for settlement to the provincial council and an award obtained from them which is adverse to the employers and which the employers refuse to implement. Secondly, it is said that no issue can be reported unless it be shown that employers are declining to observe recognized terms and conditions and that that cannot be shown of the urban district council because they are willing to proceed under paragraph 25 (2) of the scheme. In my opinion one answer to the first of these contentions is that the National and Local Government Officers' Association has no right, so far as I can see, to bring the machinery of paragraph 25 (2) into operation—although they managed to do so in 1952. The opening words of the sub-paragraph, " a question as to whether or not an employee is an " officer to whom the scheme applies," mean, as it appears to me, a question as between an employee and his employer and not a question as between the employer and his employee's union. But further than this, and assuming that the union can in fact resort to paragraph 25 (2), I can find no support for the view that no issue can arise until they have done so. The union is under no contractual or legislative obligation to obtain an award from the provincial council, and if it reports an issue to the Minister without obtaining one there is nothing in the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, which precludes the Minister from referring it at once to the tribunal, for article 5 of the Order does not apply to issues but only to disputes. Then, as to the second question, it is not easy to see how the urban district council can, at one and the same time, say that the scheme does not apply to Mr. Carter's present employment and yet contend that it contains a relevant term or condition of employment with which they are complying or are willing to comply. If the scheme as a whole constitutes the terms and conditions of Mr. Carter's employment the urban district council are plainly not complying with them; if, on the other hand, it does not, then the willingness of the urban district council to comply with one of the terms and conditions is an irrelevant consideration. But apart altogether from this, I do not regard paragraph 25 (2) as forming a part of the " recognized terms and conditions " within the purview of that phrase as used in article 2 of the Order of 1951. The scheme admittedly formulates a complete code of terms and conditions but that is not to say that a term or condition of employment emerges from every paragraph of the scheme. No such term or condition emerges from paragraph 25 (2), which does no more than provide administrative machinery for the purpose of settling questions whether or not an employee is in fact an officer to whom the scheme applies. From this it follows that the purported adoption by the urban district council of paragraph 25 (2) does not enable them to say that they are conforming to even one of the recognized terms and conditions of employment and they cannot therefore displace the application of article 2 of the Order on that ground.

The next point on which the urban district council relied is that the difference of opinion which has arisen with regard to the terms of Mr. Carter's employment constitutes a "dispute" under the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, if it falls within the Order at all; and that as it is a "dispute" it cannot be reported to the Minister as an "issue" and be referred by him to the tribunal as such. As to this, it seems to me to be at least a possible view that the question which is in controversy does not constitute a "dispute" at all; for that word is defined by article 12 (1) of the Order as meaning (so far as relevant) "any dispute "between an employer and workmen in the employment of that "employer" connected with terms of employment or with conditions of labour, and no such dispute exists between Mr. Carter and the urban district council. On the assumption, however, that a dispute does exist as to the terms which regulate Mr. Carter's employment, this does not in itself, in my opinion, prevent the co-existence of an issue. I expressed my views on this aspect of the Order of 1951 in the Technaloy case [13] and I will not repeat them now. Suffice it to say that in my judgment "disputes" and "issues" under the Order are not mutually exclusive and there is, in some degree at least, an overlap between the two. In the present case it is the aim of N.A.L.G.O. to procure the application to Mr. Carter's present employment of the terms and conditions set forth in the scheme. The urban district council, as Mr. Carter's employers, contend that these terms and conditions are not applicable to his employment. It appears to me that this conflict of views does give rise to an issue and can be dealt with as such under the Order; and none the less because it may also constitute a dispute and certainly would constitute one if Mr. Carter were a party to the controversy himself. I find myself no more able now than I was in the Technaloy case [13] to define the difference between a dispute and an issue with any satisfactory degree of precision; but where, as here, one finds "recognized terms and conditions" which an employee's union contends should be applied to his employment, and that contention is rejected by the man's employers, it seems to me that a controversy arises which the union can report as an "issue" under article 2 of the Order and which the Minister can refer to the tribunal under article 9. I would only mention in conclusion on this point a suggestion which was put forward in argument by Mr. Gardiner to the effect that the Minister himself is the sole arbiter, by virtue of article 3 (2) of the Order, to determine whether a controversy constitutes an "issue" or a "dispute" and that his decision is binding upon the parties. Such a power was repudiated by Mr. Cooke, on behalf of the Minister, and in my opinion rightly so. In my judgment the certificate of the Minister which is referred to in the subclause is not a certificate as to whether what has been reported to him is a "dispute" on the one hand or an "issue" on the other, but merely an authoritative statement that he has received a reported dispute or a reported issue, as the case may be.

I agree with Denning L.J. that it is not a condition precedent to the reporting of an issue that a trade union should first communicate to the employers their intention so to do and there is nothing that I can usefully add to what he has said either on that point or on the urban district council's submission that no controversy existed at the date of the report. On the appeal as a whole I agree that the urban district council has not made out a case for a writ of prohibition and that the appeal should therefore be allowed.

Appeal allowed.
Order for prohibition set aside.

* In re LEVIEN. LLOYDS BANK v. WORSHIPFUL COMPANY OF MUSICIANS.

[1954 L. 1515.]

Charity — Education — Singing — Trusts for encouragement of singing and advancement or study of organ music—Validity.

A testator directed that a sum should be set aside out of his residuary estate to form a trust fund to be transferred to the Worshipful Company of Musicians, the annual income of which was to be devoted to the making of presentations (other than money or medals), through a committee, to distinguished members of either one or any of the following professions, namely (a) singers, (b) composers of vocal music, (c) writers on the subject of singing, and (d) researchers into matters relating to the human voice; and that the committee, in awarding the presentations, should always bear in mind as part of their standard of excellence "Santley's "views and doctrine upon singing and voice production as "exemplified in my two monographs, 'Sir Charles Santley' and "'Some notes for singers.'"

The testator further directed that his trustees, after providing for the above fund, should transfer the residue of the capital and income of the residuary trust fund to the company for the establishment of a trust fund to be applied for the benefit of professional or amateur musicians, whose work or study might be devoted wholly or partly to the music of the organ:—

Held, that, the objects of the trusts being to confer benefit on the public by raising the standards of vocal and organ music, each of the trusts was a valid trust for educational purposes.

Observations of Lord Greene M.R. in Royal Choral Society v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 25 T.C. 263, 273; [1943] 2 All E.R. 101, 104 applied.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

The testator, John Joseph Mewburn Levien, who died on July 2, 1953, by clause 9 of his will, dated January 17, 1945, directed that Lloyds Bank Ld.—the executor and trustee of his will—should stand possessed of his residuary estate on the following trusts, namely:—"(1) Upon trust in the first place to set "aside out of the residuary trust fund a sum of £2,000 and to "pay and transfer the same to the Worshipful Company of "Musicians (hereinafter called 'the company') for the purpose "but subject to the conditions hereinafter mentioned of establishing and conducting a trust fund to be called 'The Sir Charles "'Santley Memorial Fund' according to the following provisions "and conditions namely:—Upon trust to invest the same [in "manner therein mentioned] and to employ the annual income "arising from the same investments or some part thereof in "awarding every year presentations to distinguished members "of either sex of any of the following professions viz.:— "(a) singers (b) composers of vocal music (c) writers "upon the subject of singing (d) researchers into matters "relating to the human voice (including in such class, "laryngologists and similar specialists upon the physiological "aspect of singing) and in payment of all costs and expenses "incidental thereto and it is my desire though I expressly do not "impose any trust upon the company in that behalf but leave "the matter to their unfettered discretion that they will "administer the Sir Charles Santley Memorial Fund in accordance with the following principles viz.: (a) The fund shall be "administered by a standing committee of three chosen from "the past masters and assistants of the company. (b) The "number of the presentations to be awarded in any one year and "the respective recipients shall be decided by such committee "subject to confirmation by the Master, Wardens and Court. "(c) The presentation shall not be money prizes or medals but a "piece of plate a jewel or such other token as the committee "shall subject to confirmation as aforesaid decide. (d) In awarding the presentations the committee shall always bear in mind "as part of their standard of excellence Santley's views and "doctrine upon singing and voice production as exemplified in my "two monographs 'Sir Charles Santley' and 'Some notes for "'singers.' (2) Upon trust in the second place to hold the "residue of the capital and income of the residuary trust fund

Best " Memorial Fund as the company may think fit and determine " and that in all other respects the company shall have an " absolute and unfettered discretion as to the mode and manner " of their application of either of the trust funds and the income " thereof respectively."

The testator further provided by clause 9 (3) of the will for the receipt of the person who professed to be the treasurer or other proper officer of the Worshipful Company of Musicians being a sufficient discharge to the bank and by clause 9 (4) for a gift over of the residuary trust fund to the person or persons who would be entitled on his intestacy in the event of the refusal of the company to notify its acceptance of the said gifts on the conditions above set out within one year from the date of his death.

A summons was taken out by the bank to determine whether the trusts contained in clause 9 of the will were valid charitable trusts.

DANCKWERTS J. This case concerns the will of the testator which was dated January 17, 1945. The testator died on July 2, 1953. He was very much interested in singing, of which he was a professor, and he had been a liveryman of the Worshipful Company of Musicians since the year 1912 (a company of which I myself became a liveryman in 1913), but the Worshipful Company of Musicians is only interested in the matter in the position of trustee, and the question at issue is whether the trusts which they are directed to carry out are of a charitable nature and therefore valid.

The trusts are contained in clause 9 of the will. [His Lordship read the trusts as above set out and continued:]

It seems to me that the case which gives me the greatest assistance with regard to the present questions I have to decide is that of the Royal Choral Society v. Inland Revenue Commissioners. [12] That was a case of a society which was formed for the advancement of choral singing in London, and the question was whether it was "established for charitable purposes only" and whether its income was "exclusively applied for such purposes" in regard to income tax law. Some observations of Lord Greene M.R. seem to me to be very relevant to the matter which I have to decide; after discussing the question of whether the matter was a matter of law or a matter of fact, he continued as follows: "That, of course, does not conclude the matter;

" because it has to be shown that the purpose of this body of " persons is charitable and only charitable. We are accordingly " thrown back upon an examination of the purposes for which it " was established and for which it carries on its work. It is the " purpose of the members of the society, ten in number, that is " relevant. The maintenance of the choir may be regarded in " two aspects: first as an educative process for the members of " the choir; and, secondly, as an instrument by which the per- " formance of this type of music is presented to the public. I " should have said that there is no flavour of commercial profit, " or anything of that kind, about this society. So far as the " choir is concerned the object, as I have said, paraphrasing the " language of the rule, is the encouragement and advancement of " choral singing; or, taking the language of the rule, ' the pro- " ' motion of the practice and performance of choral works.' " Bearing in mind the nature of the works in question and the " medium through which they are performed, it seems to me that " the objects, so far as the public are concerned, are educational; " and in so far as possibly they may not be regarded as educa- " tional, they would fall within the fourth case referred to in " Lord Macnaghten's analysis in Commissioners for Special " Purposes of Income Tax v. Pemsel.[2] Dealing with the educa- " tional aspect from the point of view of the public who hear " music, the Solicitor-General argued that nothing could be " educational which did not involve teaching—as I understood " him, teaching in the sense of a master teaching a class. He " said that in the domain of art the only thing that could be " educational in a charitable sense would be the education of the " executants: the teaching of the painter, the training of the " musician, and so forth. I protest against that narrow concep- " tion of education when one is dealing with aesthetic education. " Very few people can become executants, or at any rate " executants who can give pleasure either to themselves or to " others; but a very large number of people can become instructed " listeners with a trained and cultivated taste. In my opinion, a " body of persons established for the purpose of raising the artistic " taste of the country and established by an appropriate document " which confines them to that purpose, is established for educa- " tional purposes, because the education of artistic taste is one " of the most important things in the development of a civilized " human being. In the case of artistic taste, one of the best " ways of training it is by presenting works of high class and " gradually training people to like them in preference to works of " an inferior class. The people who undergo this process go no " doubt with the idea of being amused or entertained; but it is " not the state of mind of the people who go to the performance " which matters for the present purposes, it is the purpose of the " people who provide it which is important. If the people who

" are providing the performance are really genuinely confining " their objects to the promotion of aesthetic education by present- " ing works of a particular kind, or up to a particular standard, " it seems to me that that is just as much education (and, in " fact, having regard to the subject-matter the best available " method of education) as lecturing or teaching in a class, or " anything of that kind. The Solicitor-General referred to a " number of cases in which he said it was established that educa- " tion in the charitable context is limited to teaching in that " narrow sense. In my opinion, those cases do not establish " any such proposition. I should be very sorry to think that they " did. The matters that were being dealt with in those cases " have nothing to do with aesthetic education or the cultivation " and improvement of public taste in music or the other arts. " I cannot help thinking that the Board of Education, which has " taken the Council for the Encouragement of Music and the " Arts under its wing, would be very surprised to learn that that " enterprise, in which public funds are now being used, was not " an educative one."

Then he goes on to deal with the evidence of Sir George Dyson, and he criticises the passage in Tudor on Charities as being misleading. The passage in Tudor on Charities (5th ed., p. 39) was: " ' The fine arts, however, are probably not regarded " ' as objects of charity; and a gift to encourage artistic pursuits " ' was held not charitable. But it is otherwise if the element of " ' instruction is introduced: a gift for an art school is good.' " He then continued: " I do not know what that passage means " when it says: ' The fine arts are probably not regarded as objects " ' of charity.' Does it mean that education of artistic taste is " not education in the charitable sense? If it does, I dissent from " that most vehemently. There is not a particle of authority in " support of such a view. If it means that the only way you can " bring the fine arts into the charmed circle of charity is by setting " up a class to teach executants, whether to teach actors to act, or " painters to paint, or musicians to perform, again I dissent most " vehemently from any such proposition. Accordingly, in my " opinion, that paragraph is inadequate and, indeed, misleading." Then he refers to two authorities; the first is In re Allsop,[3] and he discusses that, and he then refers to the case of In re Ogden[4] and continues: " There the testator desired that his executors, " with the assistance of certain gentlemen and an art master, and " any persons they might call in to assist them, should expend his " residue: ' . . . in any manner they may think desirable to " ' encourage artistic pursuits or assist needy students in art.' " I have referred to that case because on somewhat similar lines it was argued in the present case that the trusts were not charitable.

The Master of the Rolls continued: " Again, the report of " the case is very meagre. Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R. said that " no less than three times in the previous year had it fallen to his " lot to express his view on what the law was in that kind of " case. He went on, at page 383: ' In the present case the " ' Vice-Chancellor had thought that the trustees were bound to " ' spend the money to encourage in some way or other educa- " ' tion in art.' With the greatest respect to the Vice-Chancellor, " he did not see how it was possible to get that meaning out of " the words. I do not myself derive any assistance from that " case: but it is worth pointing out that a gift merely ' to " ' encourage artistic pursuits ' might be expended in a way that " nobody would consider charitable; for instance in merely pro- " viding for one or two individuals paints and paint-brushes. or " a grand piano on which the beneficiaries could play in their " drawingroom. I apprehend nobody would say that that was a " charitable object; but the money could have been spent for " some such purpose as that." Then he refers to In re Shakespeare Memorial Trust,[5] a case before P. O. Lawrence J. which he said was in line with the conclusion which he had reached.

It is argued in this case that one could consistently with the trusts laid down by the testator find that the trustees could apply the money for the purpose of benefiting individual singers or individual organists, merely for benefiting them in their way of life, I suppose, and therefore not for a purpose which is wholly charitable. It is argued (of course, quite correctly) that if one finds that application may be made for purposes which are not charitable, then that invalidates the whole trust because one at once gets the difficulty of uncertainty and the whole trust is invalid and fails. But, in the present case, it seems to me that one has to read the trust as a whole. It seems to me, in the case of the Sir Charles Santley Memorial Fund, reading the trust as a whole and ignoring, if you like, as not being lawfully binding the part of the trust which is plainly of a precatory nature and expresses the testator's hope, that the object of the whole trust is to improve the training of singers, including research by experts, like laryngologists and others, in the methods of singing and therefore to produce better singers; it is really to effect the training of singers for serious music for aesthetic purposes, and it seems to me to fall exactly within the words used by Lord Greene in the case to which I have referred. Taking the trust as a whole, it is not intended to be a trust for the benefit of individual singers, but to be a trust to benefit the public by producing better singers and voice production.

Turning to the other trust, the W. T. Best Memorial Fund, it is even clearer I think in that case that the object of that trust is educational (to produce the better education of performers on the organ) because one finds in the concluding words of clause 2, before the proviso, a reference to application, " for the advance- " ment or study of the music of the organ in such other manner Factory — Dangerous machinery — Fencing — Woodworking machine — Circular saw—Saw not used for sawing—Duty to comply with Act notwithstanding compliance with regulations—Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 14 (1)—Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922 (S.R. & O., 1922, No. 1196), reg. 10.

The plaintiff, who was employed by the defendants at their factory, was, in the course of her employment, engaged in cutting lengths of timber by means of a circular saw, and, having cut a number of such lengths, was removing some off-cuts from the bench where they had accumulated when her fingers came into contact with the revolving saw and she sustained injuries. Oliver J. found that although the saw had been fenced in accordance with the requirements of regulation 10 of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922,[1] it was not fenced so as to comply with section 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937[2]:—

The guard " shall be kept so adjusted that the " said flange shall extend below the " roots of the teeth of the saw. The " guard shall extend from the top of " the driving knife to a point as low " as practicable at the cutting edge of " the saw."

STRINGER v. AUTOMATIC WOOD-TURNING CO. LD.

Held, that if the plaintiff had been injured while she was sawing wood the defendants would have been protected by the regulation, but the removing of off-cuts, whilst directly ancillary to such work, was not the job of sawing wood; accordingly, it was the duty of the defendants to comply with section 14 (1) of the Act of 1937, and, notwithstanding the fact that the defendants had provided a fence complying with regulation 10 of the Regulations, they were in breach of the duty imposed upon them by the sub-section.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, who was employed by the defendants at their furniture factory, had worked for about six months at a circular saw and on January 7, 1954, she was using the saw to make chair legs. The saw had been set up and fenced for the purpose of cutting the timber, so as to comply with regulation 10 of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations 1922–1945. The timber to be cut by the plaintiff was in proper sized pieces and was placed upon and held tightly against a jig so that it was presented to the teeth of the circular saw and cut into particular lengths. After cutting each length of timber a piece of wood, called an off-cut, remained on the bench at the side of the saw after the saw had passed through the timber. The plaintiff was engaged in removing the off-cuts from the bench in the manner in which she had been trained, i.e. she moved to the side of the saw and, using her push-stick, flicked away the off-cuts whilst the saw was in motion, when her fingers came into contact with the saw and she sustained injuries. The plaintiff brought this action claiming damages for personal injuries, leave being given at the hearing to amend the statement of claim so as to allege a breach by the defendants of the duty imposed upon them by section 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 20. OLIVER J. This case raises the interesting question whether a circular saw which has been set up for sawing correctly within regulation 10 of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations becomes unprotected by that regulation when the saw is being used not for sawing; but for a different, but ancillary, purpose of clearing off-cuts from the top of the bench. I have come to the conclusion with considerable hesitation that it is not so protected.

[His Lordship described the set-up of the saw, stating that it came within the provisions of regulation 10 of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922–1945, read paragraph (c) of the regulation and continued:]

Without going into an elaborate exposition, what that provides for is this: that the piece of wood which is to be cut, when presented to the saw, is as close as practicable to the under-side of the fence so that there is no room for fingers to go between it and the saw on the side from which the operator works. The object of that regulation was to make the circular saw able to function at all, since it has been realised for many years that no circular saw could be used at all if it had to be so fenced that nobody could cut themselves with it. The object of that regulation was to make the piece of timber which had to be cut—a chair leg in this case—part of the fence. If the fence were put up much higher, so as to leave a space between the chair leg and the bottom of the fence, the work would not be set up so as to come within the Woodworking Machinery Regulations.

The facts of this case are agreed, that the plaintiff was cutting these chair legs, and every now and then, (although I should not have thought as often as the defendants' foreman said, for the reason that if these were long pieces of timber there would not be many off-cuts) there would be accumulated on the table of the saw a number of off-cuts. They would be on the right-hand side of the blade as one looks at it; and, of course, the operator would never be encouraged to try and move them from where she was standing to do the sawing, because to do that she would have to put her hand right across the blade. What she did was to do what she had been taught to do, quite properly. She came round to the near side of the machine and took up a position close to the wheel and then, with the push-stick, she flicked away, as she said, these off-cuts from the table of the saw. She was doing this operation habitually and she did it on the day of the accident. The saw was left running, and that was how she had been taught to do it. The man who had instructed her was an excellent type of workman and he habitually did it that way himself. He formed the opinion that if a push-stick was used there was no danger: but there was danger; because, when the last cut was made, the jig had travelled beyond the saw teeth and three and a half inches of sharp buzzing teeth was absolutely unfenced.

[His Lordship referred to the evidence and continued:] I accept that the plaintiff had been perfectly properly instructed, so that question narrows itself down to this: Mr. Nelson contended that in the case of a circular saw, once you have set up the machine so as to comply with the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, you take the machine away from section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937 (the fencing section), altogether. In support of that proposition he cited Miller v. William Boothman & Sons Ld.[1] With all respect to Mr. Nelson I do not think that the case has any bearing on the circumstances before me. That was a case of an injury to an operative while he was actually using the saw, and the saw complied with the Woodworking Machinery Regulations. I find as a fact here that, for the purpose of using the saw for sawing, this saw was properly set up within regulation 10 of the regulations. In Miller v. Boothman [2] the man was hurt while he was operating the circular saw, and using it to cut with the circular saw, which was set up within regulation 10 of the regulations. In that case it was argued that it is not enough to comply with the regulation; but you have got to comply with section 14 of the Act of 1937 as well. It was pointed out by the court that the very reason for making regulation 10 was to make the machinery usable without encouraging risks of penalties or actions for damages. Having been framed for that purpose, it was correctly and lawfully framed within the meaning of section 79 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (now section 60 of the 1937 Act), and that is all that that case decided. If the plaintiff had been injured while she was sawing timber, nothing more would be said about it—she would be quite clearly within the ruling of Miller v. Boothman [3]; but she was not sawing wood. It seems to me that this case is exactly the same as if she had left the saw running and some other employee had come in contact with it unfenced; I do not see any difference. It is quite true that the moving of off-cuts is directly ancillary to the job of sawing; but it is not the job of sawing. I find no difficulty in saying that a saw may be correctly fenced for the purpose of operation as a saw, but not correctly fenced for some other purpose. I find full support for that proposition in two cases—Dickson v. Flack [4] and in Benn v. Kamm & Co. Ld. [5]

STRINGER v. AUTOMATIC WOOD-TURNING CO. LD.

I suppose it may be argued that if this decision of mine is right, a great hardship is put upon the owners of circular saws. That reflection in itself is not sufficient to make one decide something which appears to be wrong; but I do not, myself, appreciate what the inconvenience will be. Every circular saw has normally an efficient stop switch, and it was said by the witness who was called for the defendants that in this case it would cause undesirable delay; because every time the saw was switched off it diminished speed gradually and was still dangerous until the blade stopped. It might take half a minute to stop. One would have thought it was perfectly simple to have some sort of brake which would pull up the saw almost immediately. Some machines have to be stopped immediately in the case of danger, but there is always danger in the case of the naked teeth of a saw. I should have thought that every time it was necessary to move these off-cuts, the blade should be stopped to make it completely safe, so that it should only run when it was completely fenced. That being so I have come to the conclusion that there was a breach of section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937. [His Lordship considered the question of contributory negligence and continued:] In the circumstances, the responsibility for the accident must be equally shared.

Contract—Formation—Intention to create legal relationship—Competition — Fashion competition in newspaper — Three forecasts by different persons in one coupon—Coupon submitted in defendant's name—Agreement to "go shares"—Claim to recover share of prize —Intention to create legal relations.

A was a paying boarder at B's house, and C was B's granddaughter. By arrangement among the three it was agreed that A, who had been in the habit of entering for a fashion competition run by a Sunday newspaper, should fill in a coupon every week consisting of three forecasts made by A, B and C respectively, and send it off in B's name. There was no hard and fast rule as to which of the three paid the incidental expenses. This arrangement had been operated for seven or eight weeks when a forecast made by C in a coupon submitted in B's name was successful.

SIMPKINS v. PAYS.

B obtained the prize of £750. A sought to recover one-third of the prize from B, alleging an agreement to "go shares" in the event of success. B contended that A had merely assisted her in completing the coupon and that there had been no intention to create legal relations:—

Held, that on the facts the parties had entered into the competition as an informal syndicate on the understanding that whichever forecast in any coupon was successful they should "go shares" in the prize; there was mutuality in the arrangement between the parties and an intention to create legal relations could be inferred; A was, therefore, entitled to recover a one-third share of the prize.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, the defendant and her granddaughter had an arrangement whereby the plaintiff submitted a coupon every week in the name of the defendant for a newspaper fashion competition. The coupon contained three forecasts made by the plaintiff, the defendant and the granddaughter respectively. A forecast made by the granddaughter was successful and the defendant obtained the prize. The plaintiff sought to recover a third part of the prize alleging an agreement to "go shares" in the event of success.

Robin David (Morgan Hughes with him) for the plaintiff. The parties formed a syndicate and made a joint entry. There was an express agreement to "go shares." Alternatively a third part was held by the defendant to the use of the plaintiff: see dictum of Denning L.J. in Hoddinott v. Hoddinott,[1] viz., ". . . "if husband and wife together embark on a joint venture in "which they equally contribute their skill, then if nothing is "said between them, the proper inference is that the proceeds "go to them jointly." That principle was not limited to husband and wife.

Bertrand Richards for the defendant. If there was an agreement between the parties it was not such as was intended to be enforceable: see dictum of Scrutton L.J. in Rose & Frank Co. v. J. R. Crompton & Bros. Ld.[2] and of Cohen L.J. in Hoddinott v. Hoddinott.[3] Balfour v. Balfour[4] was also referred to.

SELLERS J. Happily this is an unusual type of case to come before a court of law, and it arises out of what seems to be a popular occupation of the public—taking part in a competition run by a Sunday newspaper. In this particular case there was a contest, No. 397, in the Sunday Empire News, of June 27, 1954, whereby readers were invited to place in order of merit, attraction or beauty, eight fashions, or articles of attire. Both the plaintiff and the defendant, along with the defendant's granddaughter, Miss Esme Pays, sent in a coupon with three forecasts on it. The middle line of the second forecast was successful and won the prize of £750. This action is brought to recover one-third of that amount, £250.

The plaintiff had been living in the defendant's house for some time in 1950, having gone there some six months after the defendant's husband had died. The defendant was some 83 years of age. The plaintiff was a much younger person, and was then divorced, though she has married again. They lived together in harmony, the plaintiff paying a weekly sum for her board and lodgings to the defendant. The plaintiff had been competing for some time in newspaper competitions, including the News of the World and the Sunday Empire News, before she went to live in the defendant's house. When she became a lodger at the defendant's house she found that the defendant was competing in the News of the World competition, and they seemed to have joined forces and competed together, but independently, although throughout the time I accept the plaintiff's evidence that she was filling up, week by week, a similar sort of competition in the Sunday Empire News, and she so did alone up to a time some seven or eight weeks before this successful forecast, and she was doing that, as far as I can appreciate the evidence, unbeknown to the defendant. She kept the Sunday Empire News up in her room and made her weekly forecast.

About seven or eight weeks before June 27, 1954, something had happened which brought the two parties to this action to take an interest in the Empire News. The plaintiff says that she left the Empire News in the living room of the house occupied by the defendant on a Sunday, and the defendant picked it up, took an interest in it and discussed competing in the competition run by the paper. The defendant says that it was the plaintiff who brought the paper down and said: "Why "don't you compete in this as well?" It may be that the truth lies somewhere between the two, but on the whole I think perhaps the plaintiff's version is the preferable one, and that when the defendant did get to know about the paper and they were discussing it, the plaintiff may have said to her: "Well, "why don't you compete?"

From then onwards, each week the two parties to this action, together with the defendant's granddaughter, sent in a coupon with forecasts on it, and, as far as the Empire News is concerned, I am satisfied that the method of doing this was for the defendant to make her forecast, put it on a piece of paper, for the granddaughter to make hers and put it on the same piece of paper, and then when the plaintiff came home, perhaps rather late at night, as the defendant says, when she was in bed, she would pick this piece of paper up and would fill in the coupon in her own room, putting her own line in first, the granddaughter's second, and the defendant's third, and that would be dispatched on the Monday.

The evidence is a little uncertain as to who actually paid for the necessary stamps for the postage, or for the twopence-halfpenny which had to be sent for each line forecast, but I accept the plaintiff's evidence that it was done more or less alternately. There was no hard-and-fast rule. In regard to the winning coupon, the defendant had asked the plaintiff to get the stamps and deduct them from the weekly payment, but apparently they were not deducted. The weekly payment was 30s. and, as I understood the defendant, she paid 30s. I think one of the cases that were referred to in argument held that the payment, when it comes, is not a vital matter in this sort of transaction. It might well be done informally; one party can pay one time, the other party can pay another time. It might well be the case that, in fact, all the stamps were obtained and paid for by the defendant. The substantial matter is, on what basis were these forecasts being made?

SIMPKINS v. PAYS.

Sellers J.

When the plaintiff made out the coupon she put down the forecasts in the way I have indicated, and entered in the appropriate place on the coupon the name of Mrs. Pays, 11, Trevor Street, Wrexham, and so with each coupon in those seven or eight weeks as if they had been the defendant's. In fact there were three forecasts there, and when the matter first came to be considered, I accept the plaintiff's evidence that what was said, when they were going to do it in that way, was: "We "will go shares" or words to that effect. "Shares" was the word used, and I do not think anything very much more specific was said. Whether it was said by the plaintiff or the defendant does not really matter. I think that was the basis, and it may well be that the plaintiff is right when she said, in her evidence, that the defendant said: "You're lucky, May, and if we win we "will go shares."

The alternative position to that of these three competing together as a syndicate is that the plaintiff, with all her propensity for having a gamble, when the defendant became interested, suddenly abandoned all her interest in the competition in the Empire News, and handed it over to the defendant. I think that is most improbable, and I accept her evidence that she did not do that. She combined her efforts with the defendant's in the way I have indicated, and from then onwards she had shares in the result. It may well be that in the family circle—and this had some element of a family circle about it, although there was no relationship between the parties—or even as between very close friends, the facts might indicate that all that was intended was that if anybody rendered a service to the defendant to fill up her coupon that person also rendered a service to make some forecasts, which might reveal that all they were doing was to help her make her forecasts and make suggestions, and to give her the benefit of their skill or their capacity to guess, whichever it is, so that the venture would be entirely that of the person in whose name the coupon was sent in. On the facts of this case, and on the probabilities as I see them, I do not think that was the case here, and having balanced it as best I can, I prefer the plaintiff's evidence as to how the matter came into being, and how it was carried out. However, it is true that the plaintiff stands alone—she was the only witness for her case.

[His Lordship received the evidence and continued:] The competition, successful as it was for the coupon sent in the defendant's name, was not in fact won, as it would appear, by the forecast of either the plaintiff or the defendant. If the plaintiff's evidence is right, and I see no reason to reject it—she gave it before the facts were known at all—the middle line was one not composed by either of the parties, but by the granddaughter, and the defendant's case involves this, that whichever forecast won—either the plaintiff's or the defendant's, or the granddaughter's—the whole prize was to go to the defendant. I think that is highly improbable.

When the prize-money became known the defendant was obviously elated. I think the matter went to her head, and to the heads of her family as well, who all thought they had got a great prize. There was something of a celebration on the very Sunday when this paper had the winning forecast in it. Between them they have sought to shut out the plaintiff from her interest, but from the time when the cheque became due the plaintiff has persisted that she was entitled to her share. I think on what was said she was to "go shares." Properly interpreted, there being three of them, their shares were one-third each. If there were two, there would have been half-shares.

On the finding that the plaintiff's evidence is right as to what was said about the shares, and rejecting the incidental evidence given by the witnesses as to what occurred afterwards, counsel for the defendant not unnaturally said: "Even if that "is so, the court cannot enforce this contract unless the arrange-"ment made at the time was one which was intended to give rise "to legal consequences." It may well be there are many family associations where some sort of rough and ready thing is said which would not, on a proper estimate of the circumstances, establish a contract which was contemplated to have legal consequences, but I do not so find here. I think there was here a mutuality in the arrangement between the parties. It was not very formal, but certainly in effect it was agreed that every week the forecast should go in in the name of the defendant, and that if there was success, no matter who won, all should share equally. That seems to be the implication from or the interpretation of what was said, that this was in the nature of a very informal syndicate so that they should all get the benefit of success. It would be equally wrong, I think, to say from what was arranged that because the granddaughter's forecast was the one which was successful of those submitted by the defendant that the plaintiff and the defendant were to get nothing. Although she was not a party before the court and I have not had the benefit of her evidence, as far as I can see, on this arrangement she would be as entitled to the third share as the others, certainly, so far as the plaintiff is concerned. Esme was not, apparently, present when this bargain was made, but both the others knew, at any rate soon after the outset, that she was coming in. It is possible, of course, although the plaintiff is not concerned in it, that the granddaughter's effort was only to assist the defendant, her grandmother. She may accept that, but it makes no difference, so far as I can see, to the fact that the plaintiff and the defendant entered into an agreement to share. The plaintiff does not seek to say: "Esme was only "aiding Mrs. Pays," in asking for half the shares, but she was entitled to one-third, and I so find and give judgment to the amount of £250.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Beatrice Luttman, who was employed as a cleaner by the defendants, was on June 10, 1954, engaged in cleaning a canteen which was within the curtilage of the defendants' factory premises. After completing her cleaning work she went towards the basement, taking with her a bucket and mop in order to put them away, when, in the course of going down a staircase leading to the basement, she fell and sustained injuries. The staircase was not provided with a hand-rail.

The plaintiff claimed damages for personal injuries on the grounds of breaches of statutory duty under sections 5, 25 (2) and 26 of the Factories Act, 1937, and of breach by the defendants of their common law duty to provide and maintain a safe working place for the plaintiff. The defendants, while admitting that their general premises were a factory, contended that the canteen was not a part of the factory, relying upon subsection (6) of section 151 of the Factories Act, 1937,* and the case is reported only on that point.

The language of that subsection certainly suggests that some building like a canteen might very well not be part of the factory, because, prima facie, it might be said that the canteen is not used solely for the processes of manufacture carried on in the factory; but there is a decision to which I have been referred by Mr. Nelson: London Co-operative Society v. Southern Essex Assessment Committee,[1] in which words similar to those in this subsection had occurred under a Rating and Valuation Act.[2] Those words were considered and the effect of that decision, which I need not go into in any detail, is that the Divisional Court held that a canteen was not a place which is solely used for some purpose either of manufacture or handicraft carried on in the laundry, which were the premises being used in that particular case. Having regard to that case and having regard to the fact that the decision in that case was approved and applied in Thurogood v. Van den Berghs and Jurgens Ld.,[3] it seems to me quite impossible that I should come to any conclusion other than that this canteen was not solely used for some purpose other than a process carried on in the factory and that the use of the canteen for the purposes of feeding and entertaining the people working in the factory was a purpose that was incidental to the processes of manufacture carried on at the factory. In those circumstances, therefore, I have come to the conclusion that the canteen was part of the factory.

I should not have held that it was a separate factory. In view of the case to which I have been referred, I do not think that the process which was carried on there could be regarded as a process carried on in a factory; but it is part of the factory, because it is not solely used for some purpose other than a process carried on in the factory. That being so I have to hold that the Factories Act applied to this building and thus to consider whether there has been any breach of the provisions of the Factories Act referred to in the statement of claim. The conclusion I have come to is that there was a breach of section 25 (2) because that provides: "For every staircase in a building or affording a means "of exit from a building, a substantial handrail shall be provided "and maintained."

* SHELL-MEX AND B.P. LD. v. CLAYTON (VALUATION OFFICER) AND ANOTHER.

Rating—Docks—Freight-transport hereditament—Oil piped by company from ships into storage tanks on hereditament—"Dock purposes"—"Dock undertaking"—Whether storage tanks warehouses—Business of shipping and unshipping—"Use of undertakers"—Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928 (18 & 19 Geo. 5, c. 44), ss. 5 (1) (c), (2) (c), (3); 6.

The Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, by section 5 (1) (c), defines "freight-transport hereditament" as: "(c) A hereditament occupied and used wholly or partly for dock "purposes as part of a dock undertaking being an undertaking

"whereof a substantial proportion of the volume of business is "concerned with the shipping and unshipping of merchandise not "belonging to or intended for the use of the undertakers."

The British Transport Commission had leased the hereditament in question, being waste land adjoining its Hull Docks undertaking, to the appellant company, a company concerned in the importation and distribution of oil. Pursuant to the terms of its leases the company had erected on the land storage tanks for oil, and the commission had constructed two jetties, which were owned by them. Incoming tankers unshipped their oil at the jetties, the unshipping being effected through a system of pipes running along the jetties to the storage tanks, from whence the company distributed it to customers, retaining only a small proportion for its own use. The company also owned a barge berth some 300 yards away from the hereditament and connected with it by pipes. The barge berth was a dock within section 5 (3) of the Act of 1928, and was used by the company for transhipping oil. Approximately one quarter of the oil imported was dutiable and technically the whole hereditament was a bonded warehouse. Substantially the whole of the oil unshipped at the jetties was consigned pursuant to an agreement by three oil companies to the appellant company, as their sole agent for the sale and distribution of their oil, the company being remunerated for its services by commission. The company claimed that the hereditament was a "freight-transport hereditament" within section 5 (1) (c) of the Act of 1928, and, as such, entitled to be derated:—

Held, (1) that if it was shown that the whole of the hereditament was primarily used for warehousing merchandise within the meaning of section 6 (3) (b) of the Act of 1928, it would be wholly disqualified from derating as a freight-transport hereditament, notwithstanding that it, or part of it, was used for purposes connected with unshipping; if, on the other hand, it was shown that any part of the hereditament was used to some extent at least for purposes connected with unshipping and not, or not primarily, for warehousing merchandise not in the course of being transported then (given fulfilment of the other conditions in section 5 (1) (c)) there should be an apportionment, the effect of which would be to give the benefit of derating to the whole hereditament, including any part of it not used for dock purposes, but with the exception of any part primarily used for warehousing merchandise not in the course of being transported, which, by virtue of section 6 (3) (b), was not to be deemed to be occupied for transport purposes.

Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. West Derby Assessment Committee [1932] 1 K.B. 40; 47 T.L.R. 468 and Union Cold Storage Co. v. Moon [1932] 2 K.B. 648 applied. Assessor for Aberdeen v. Shell-Mex and B.P. Ld., 1953 S.C. 211 considered.

(2) That the hereditament was partly used for dock purposes and that it had not been shown that the whole of it or every part of it used for dock purposes was primarily used for warehousing oil not in the course of being transported and, accordingly, that the hereditament fulfilled the first of the three conditions laid down in section 5 (1) (c).

(3) That the company, in occupying and using the hereditament for its own private purposes, was not occupying and using it as part of the Transport Commission's Hull Dock undertaking, and further, that while the hereditament could properly be described as occupied and used in connexion, inter alia, with the barge berth (which was a dock), it could not be regarded as occupied and used as part of the barge berth and that the hereditament was not used as part of a dock undertaking and the second condition of section 5 (1) (c) was not satisfied.

Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Inland Revenue Officer, 1930 S.C. 454 and Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Assessor for Glasgow, 1931 S.C. 400 considered.

(4) That the company had failed to satisfy the third condition laid down in section 5 (1) (c), in that a substantial proportion of the volume of business at the hereditament was concerned with the shipping and unshipping of merchandise "used" by the company and, accordingly, that the hereditament was not entitled to be derated.

The question whether storage tanks might not primarily be used for warehousing within section 6 (3) (b) of the Act of 1928 considered but not decided.

APPEAL from the Lands Tribunal by case stated.

The appellant company, Shell-Mex and B.P. Ld., appealed to the Lands Tribunal against a decision of the local valuation court sitting at Kingston-upon-Hull, dismissing the claim of the company that the hereditament at Salt End, Preston, ought to be treated as a freight-transport hereditament within the meaning of section 5 of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928.[1]

The following statement of facts is taken from the case stated by the Lands Tribunal: Para. 2. "The hereditament is situated "at Salt End, Preston within Holderness Rural District Rating "Area, in respect of which the respondents Holderness Rural "District Council (hereinafter referred to as 'the rating autho-"'rity') are the rating authority. The respondent Glanville "Clayton (hereinafter referred to as 'the valuation officer') is "the valuation officer authorized by the Commissioners of Inland "Revenue pursuant to section 33 of the Local Government Act, "1948, to act in relation to the valuation list for the said rating "area.

"3. The said hereditament was described in Part 1 of the "valuation list as 'Tanks, Works and Appurtenances' situated "at Salt End and was assessed at rateable value: £16,986. On [1] Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, s. 5: "(1) In "this Act the expression 'Freight-"'transport hereditament' means all "or any of the following hereditaments:— . . . (c) A hereditament "occupied and used wholly or partly "for dock purposes as part of a dock "undertaking being an undertaking "whereof a substantial proportion of "the volume of business is concerned "with the shipping and unshipping "of merchandise not belonging to or "intended for the use of the undertakers. . . ."

S. 6: "(3) For the purpose of "determining in what proportions a "freight-transport hereditament is "occupied and used for transport "purposes and for other purposes, "respectively, the hereditament shall "be deemed to be occupied and used "for transport purposes, except in so "far as it is occupied and used for "the purposes of a dwelling-house, "hotel, or place of public refreshment: Provided that— . . .

"(b) in the case of a hereditament . . . occupied and used for "dock purposes as part of a dock "undertaking no part of the hereditament, being a building, yard, or "other place primarily occupied and "used for warehousing merchandise "not in the course of being transported, shall be deemed to be "occupied and used for transport "purposes."

" March 28, 1952, the appellant company made a proposal that " the hereditament ought to be treated as a freight-transport " hereditament. On April 10, 1952, the valuation officer gave " notice of objection to the said proposal, and on April 28, 1952, " the appellant company gave notice of appeal to the local valua- " tion court. On September 25, 1952, the appellant company, " the valuation officer and the rating authority appeared before " and were heard by the local valuation court, which decided that " the hereditament ought not to be treated as a freight-transport " hereditament and dismissed the appeal. The appellant com- " pany, being aggrieved by the said decision, gave notice of appeal " to the Lands Tribunal on October 13, 1952, and the rating " authority and the valuation officer gave notice of their intention " to appear at the hearing of the appeal on November 5 and " November 11, 1952, respectively.

" 4. The said hereditament comprised three parcels of land " on the banks of the river Humber. . . .

" 5. The appellant company is the lessee of the said land " which extends to 51½ acres or thereabouts. The said three " parcels are held on different leases from the British Transport " Commission (formerly the Docks and Inland Waterways Exe- " cutive) or their predecessors in title at a total ground rent of " £4,195 per annum. . . .

" 6. On the said land the appellant company or its predecessors " in title have erected offices, stores, garages, filling sheds, pump " houses, a boiler house, tanks and ancillary buildings. The said " erections, save for building number 69, are occupied by the " appellant company.

" 7. In addition the appellant company owns and occupies " exclusively a barge berth which has been erected on part of the " foreshore in part leased from the Board of Trade and in part " under licence from the British Transport Commission and their " predecessors in title. The said berth, which is approximately " 1,000 feet distant from the said hereditament, is connected with " the pump houses and tanks on the said land by means of pipe- " lines which are owned, occupied and used exclusively by the " appellant company.

" 8. From the south west corner of the said land two jetties " which are the property of the British Transport Commission " (formerly the Docks and Inland Waterways Executive) run out " into the river Humber. . . . No. 1 jetty is used jointly by the " appellant company, the Esso Petroleum Company, the Hull " Distillery and British Industrial Solvents, but the appellant " company has its own pipe-lines, 12 in number, which run along " the said jetty and are connected with the pump houses and " tanks on the said land. No. 2 jetty is used jointly by the " appellant company and the Esso Petroleum Company and the " pipe-lines thereon, 10 in number, are common to both users " for the length of the said jetty at the shore end of which con- " nexions are made between the said 10 and the said 12 pipe-lines.

SHELL-MEX AND B.P. LD. v. CLAYTON.

" In addition along No. 2 jetty there run a 4-inch steam pipe " and 2-inch air pipe. The steam pipe is used in common by " the appellant company and the Esso Petroleum Company and " connections are made at the shore end to a steam pipe of the " appellant company. The air pipe belongs entirely to the appellant company and is used exclusively by it.

" 9. A number of different qualities of oil and other petroleum " products are handled at the hereditament; these will be referred " to collectively hereinafter as ' oil.'

" 10. The appellant company carry on the business of distributing and marketing oil in the United Kingdom. In order to " carry on that business the appellant company has established in " the United Kingdom a number of ' terminal depots,' of which " the hereditament at Salt End is one. The main function of " such terminal depot is to replenish the supplies of a number of " internal depots which are dependent on the terminal depot for " their supplies of oil. The essential function of the subsidiary " depots is the supply of oil to consumers.

" 11. Oil is brought to the Salt End installation in ocean-going " tankers of an average capacity of 10,000 to 12,000 tons and " unloaded at the said jetties. Bills of lading are made out " either in the name of ' Shell-Mex and B.P.' or in the name " of the consignor. In every case the appellant company takes " delivery of the oil at the ships' rail.

" 12. Tankers are unloaded at the said jetties by means of " pipes which are coupled to the ends of the above-mentioned " pipe-lines which run along the said jetties. There are no grid " boxes on either of the said jetties. Grid boxes are simply " chambers in which pipe-lines end, and in which ships' flexible " discharge pipes can be coupled to the pipe-lines. The oil is " pumped from the tanker via the pipe-lines into tanks at the " hereditament.

" 13. The appellant company must have at a terminal such as " the Salt End depot a tankage capacity in excess of that which " would be required to meet the day-to-day requirements of the " subsidiary depots because it must correlate the intake of oil to " the movements of tankers. A much smaller amount of excess " capacity was required to meet unexpected demands.

" 14. The whole of the said hereditament including the said " pipes is a bonded warehouse. In 1951 approximately a quarter " of the total oil which passed through the installation was " dutiable.

" 15. The said hereditament is used by the appellant company " for fulfilling its obligations under an agreement dated December " 31, 1931. . . ."

It appeared from the case stated that under the agreement of December 31, 1931, which was made between " Shell " Marketing Co. Ld. of the first part, Eagle Oil and Shipping Co. Ld. of the second part, Anglo-Persian Oil Co. Ld. of the third part and the appellant company of the fourth part, the appellant company was the sole consignee for the consigning companies for the distribution of oil within the United Kingdom and was to be paid for its services by a commission.

The case stated continued: "Products from the consigning companies are received by the appellant as consignee and agent in accordance with the said agreement. Upon the sale of the product the appellant company accounts to each consignor for its pro rata share of the receipts from sales of the same after deducting an agent's commission of 8 per cent. except in respect of a small quantity (.17 per cent.) used by the appellant company itself for which the latter pays an agreed price. The same product received from different consigning companies is in practice mixed on the hereditament, although by special arrangement it would be possible to keep separate the contribution of each consignor. . . ."

After a consideration of the accounting methods of the appellant company the case stated continued: "19. The main function of the Salt End terminal depot with regard to onward transmission of oil is to dispatch oil by water, rail or road whichever is the appropriate method to its dependent depots in order to replenish their supplies. It is the practice for the appellant company to replenish supplies at a dependent depot when space is available at that depot. So far as possible each tank at the Salt End depot is emptied before being refilled from an incoming tanker.

"21. The total tankage capacity at the hereditament is 211,781 tons of oil." After setting out the quantities of stocks of oil retained in the hereditament and the total tonnage handled, which in 1951 totalled 1,320,000 tons, the case stated continued: "23. In disposing of oil the appellant company is described in the appropriate documents as 'sellers' and it invariably sells in its own name. . . . Oil supplied for bunkering tankers chartered by the consigning companies is not treated by the appellant company as being sold. The shipping company makes direct payments for such bunker fuel to the consigning company concerned. Such bunker fuel is treated for accounting purposes as if it had never been delivered to the hereditament.

"24. The appellant company contended that the hereditament was within the meaning of section 5 of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, occupied and used by them for dock purposes as part of a dock undertaking carried on by them within the undertaking of the Port of Hull and being an undertaking whereof a substantial proportion of the volume of business is concerned with the shipping and unshipping of merchandise (namely, oil of various kinds and grades) not belonging to or intended for the use of the undertakers, and that the hereditament is a freight-transport hereditament wholly occupied for transport purposes.

"25. The valuation officer and the rating authority contended that:—

1955
SHELL-MEX AND B.P. LD. v. CLAYTON.

" (a) The hereditament is not occupied and used wholly or " partly for dock purposes within the meaning of section 5 (1) (c) " of the 1928 Act.

" (b) The hereditament is not occupied and used as part of a " dock undertaking within the meaning of the said section 5 (1) (c).

" (c) If, which is denied, the hereditament is occupied and " used wholly or partly for dock purposes as part of a dock under- " taking, such dock undertaking is not an undertaking whereof a " substantial proportion of the volume of business is concerned " with the shipping and unshipping of merchandise not belonging " to or intended for the use of the undertakers.

" (d) The whole of the hereditament is a place primarily " occupied and used for warehousing merchandise not in the " course of being transported within the meaning of section 6 " (3) (b) of the 1928 Act.

" (e) The hereditament is not a freight-transport hereditament " within the meaning of section 5 of the 1928 Act.

" (f) If, which is denied, the hereditament is a freight-trans- " port hereditament, the hereditament includes oil storage tanks " which are places primarily occupied and used for warehousing " merchandise within the meaning of section 6 (3) of the 1928 " Act and the net annual value of the hereditament ought to be " apportioned."

Mr. W. Fitzgerald, sitting as the Lands Tribunal, summarized his conclusions in the concluding paragraphs of the case stated as follows: " 26. I came to the conclusion that the land and plant " comprising this hereditament were used solely for the storage " and distribution of oil and spirit in connexion with the business " of the appellant company quite separate and distinct from any " of the activities carried on at the adjacent Port of Hull. I " found that this hereditament is not part of the Hull Docks " Undertaking within the meaning of section 5 of the 1928 Act. " I also found that the land when leased to the appellant company " and its predecessors in title was open land; indeed it might be " called waste land. It was not being utilized as part of the Port " of Hull. I was of opinion that this land was leased for the " purposes of the appellant company's own undertaking and that " there was not in any sense a delegation by the British Trans- " port Commission or their predecessors in title of any of their " functions as a dock authority. I was of the opinion that the " oil in the tanks was there for storage until such time as the " demand for it should arise. I considered that the conveying " of the oil by the pipe-line could be compared with the convey- " ance of ordinary goods in lorries by the consignee from the point " of disembarkation. My opinion was that immediately the oil " entered the pipe-line delivery to the consignee was complete. " It entered into a state of storage for the purpose of distribution " to subsidiary depots. It seemed to me that this was the only " conclusion consistent with the decision in Assessor for Aberdeen " v. Shell-Mex and B.P. Ld. and Shell-Mex and B.P. Ld. v.

"Assessor for Aberdeen.[2] For this reason I was of the opinion "that the hereditaments of the appellants were not freight-"transport hereditaments within the meaning of the Rating and "Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, and I dismissed the "appeal."

Cur. adv. vult.

July 22. The written judgment of the court was delivered.

EVERSHED M.R. The judgment which I am about to read, and which has been prepared by Jenkins L.J., is the judgment of the court.

The appellant company contends that the hereditament described in the case stated by the Lands Tribunal, and consisting of its terminal depot at Salt End, adjacent to the Port of Hull, ought for rating purposes to be treated as a "Freight-"transport hereditament" under section 5 (1) (c) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, which includes in the category of "freight-transport hereditaments": "(c) A here-"ditament occupied and used wholly or partly for dock purposes "as part of a dock undertaking being an undertaking whereof a "substantial proportion of the volume of business is concerned "with the shipping and unshipping of merchandise not belonging "to or intended for the use of the undertakers."

As appears from the above definition of the relevant type of freight-transport hereditament, the appellant company, in order to make its contention good, must show that the hereditament in question satisfies all the following conditions, namely: (1) that it is occupied and used wholly or partly for dock purposes; (2) that it is so occupied and used as part of a dock undertaking; and (3) that such dock undertaking is one whereof a substantial proportion of the volume of business is concerned with the shipping and unshipping of merchandise not belonging to or intended for the use of the undertakers.

SHELL-MEX AND B.P. LD. v. CLAYTON.

Section 5 (2) (c) of the Act defines "dock purposes" as meaning (so far as material for the present purpose) "all purposes connected with the shipping or unshipping at a dock of . . . merchandise." Section 5 (3) of the Act adds the following further definitions: "'Dock' includes any harbour, wharf, pier, jetty or other works in or at which vessels can ship or un-ship merchandise or passengers not being a pier or jetty primarily used for recreation. 'Dock undertaking' means an undertaking carried on by a dock authority, but also includes any other undertaking comprising as part thereof a dock in so far only as its business is carried on at and in connection with that dock. 'Dock authority' means any person or body of persons, whether incorporated or not, who are authorised to construct or are owners or lessees of any dock authorised by or under any Act."

We will treat as incorporated in this judgment the facts set out in the case stated and make special reference only to the essential points upon which the arguments for and against the appellant company's claim have turned.

As to the first of the three conditions above stated, is the hereditament occupied and used wholly or in part for dock purposes, that is to say, for purposes connected with the shipping or unshipping of merchandise at a dock? On this question, the essential matters of fact are these: The appellant company uses the hereditament as a terminal depot in its business of importing, distributing and marketing oil. Incoming tankers unship their cargoes of merchandise in the shape of oil at two jetties belonging to the Transport Commission, which are undoubtedly a dock within the meaning of section 5 (3). The unshipping is effected by pumping the oil from the tankers through a system of pipes running out along the jetties and leading to the storage tanks on the hereditament, and the appellant company takes delivery of it at the ship's rail. The total tankage capacity at the hereditament is 211,781 tons and the tanks habitually contain stocks of oil substantially in excess of day-to-day requirements, the stocks on hand (according to typical figures given in the case) being as a rule of the order of 100,000 to 150,000 tons and sufficient to cover, say, one month's deliveries in the event of receipts being suspended. The ratio of receipts to distribution varies from month to month, but it would seem that over a period they more or less balance, so that the surplus of, say, 100,000 to 150,000 tons we have mentioned is in the nature of a reserve. From the stocks of oil in the tanks the appellant company distributes supplies by land and water transport to its own internal depots and also to various categories of customers and consumers. It also effects sales of oil to customers direct from the hereditament and consumes relatively insignificant quantity in its own operations. The media of distribution used by the appellant company include a barge berth owned and occupied by it at Hedon Haven, some 300 yards to the southeast of the southernmost portion of the hereditament, and connected with pumphouses and tanks on the hereditament by means of pipes owned and occupied exclusively by the appellant company. The barge berth (at which oil is shipped into barges) is undoubtedly a dock within the meaning of section 5 (3). Approximately one-quarter of the oil brought into the hereditament from the incoming tankers is dutiable, and technically the whole hereditament, including the pipes and storage tanks upon it, is a bonded warehouse in which, pending distribution, the dutiable oil can lie without payment of duty. The appellant company must have available on the hereditament a tankage capacity in excess of the day-to-day requirements of distribution, because it must correlate the intake of oil to the movements of tankers, and also, but to a much smaller degree, for the purpose of meeting unexpected demands. The provisions of the leases under which the hereditament is held by the appellant company clearly show them to have been granted for the very purpose of enabling the lessees to receive into the hereditament oil unshipped at the jetties.

On these facts, Mr. Rowe, for the appellant company, argues that the hereditament is, within the meaning of section 5 of the Act, occupied and used, if not wholly, at all events partly, for dock purposes, that is to say, purposes connected with the unshipping of merchandise (that is, oil) at a dock (that is, the Transport Commission's jetties). He observes with force that the unshipping operations here in question consist of pumping the oil from the tankers into the storage tanks through the pipes leading to them from the jetties, and that oil in bulk cannot be unshipped merely by putting it over the ship's rail on to a jetty, but must be transferred from the ship's tanks into suitable receptacles on shore. He bases himself on the simple proposition that pipes through which, and tanks into which, cargoes of oil in bulk are discharged from ships cannot reasonably be said not to be used for purposes connected with the unshipping of that oil. He says that it is only incumbent on the appellant company in the first instance to show that the hereditament is used partly, that is, to some extent, for dock purposes. Once that is shown, the appellant company's claim that the hereditament is a "freight transport hereditament" is made good, so far as the first of the three conditions (i.e., occupation and use wholly or partly for dock purposes) is concerned, and, provided the other two conditions are satisfied, it will remain to consider whether there should be any, and, if so, what, apportionment under section 6 of the Act. It will be convenient at this point to refer to the terms of that section. So far as material for the immediate purpose, it provides as follows: "(1) In every valua" tion list every freight-transport hereditament, which is occupied
" and used wholly for transport purposes shall be shown as being " so occupied and used, and as respects every such hereditament " occupied and used partly for transport purposes the net annual

1955
SHELL-MEX AND B.P. LD. v. CLAYTON.

"value thereof shall be shown in the prescribed manner as being "apportioned between the occupation and user of the hereditament for transport purposes and the occupation and user "thereof for other purposes. (2) Where a freight-transport "hereditament is not occupied and used for more than one "transport purpose the nature of that purpose shall be shown. ". . . (3) For the purpose of determining in what proportions "a freight-transport hereditament is occupied and used for "transport purposes and for other purposes, respectively, the "hereditament shall be deemed to be occupied and used for "transport purposes, except in so far as it is occupied and used "for the purposes of a dwelling-house, hotel, or place of public "refreshment: Provided that . . . (b) in the case of a hereditament . . . occupied and used for dock purposes as part of a "dock undertaking no part of the hereditament, being a "building, yard, or other place primarily occupied and used for "warehousing merchandise not in the course of being transported, shall be deemed to be occupied and used for transport "purposes."

Mr. Rowe by no means admits that the hereditament or any part thereof is primarily occupied and used for the purpose of "warehousing merchandise not in course of being transported" within the meaning of section 6 (3) (b), and argues that the status of a bonded warehouse technically possessed by the hereditament with respect to the dutiable one-fourth or thereabouts of the oil brought into it is a minor and incidental matter which should not affect the result. But, whether he is right or wrong on these points, he says they have no bearing on the question whether the hereditament is a freight-transport hereditament within the meaning of section 5 of the Act, whatever their effect may be on any ensuing apportionment.

Mr. Lyell, for the valuation officer, on the other hand, contends that the hereditament is occupied and used simply for storage purposes and not to any extent whatever for purposes connected with the unshipping of merchandise at a dock. He claims that the process of unshipping is complete the moment the oil is over the ship's rail or, in other words, the moment it passes out of the ship's pipes into one of the pipes lying along the jetties, and that everything happening beyond this point is part of the process of storage and distribution, or, in other words, disposal by the consignee of merchandise which has finished its journey by reaching his hands. Mr. Lyell compares the pipes to a consignee's lorries, into which goods are put over the ship's rail, and compares the passage of the oil into the tanks through the pipes to the conveyance of such goods to some destination determined by the consignee, such as a warehouse perhaps many miles distant from the dock. He relies in support of this argument on the technical status of the hereditament as a bonded warehouse, which he says is essentially a place where a consignee, who has taken delivery of merchandise, may deposit it pending disposal without in the meantime paying the duty upon it. Alternatively, Mr. Lyell says that the hereditament is primarily used for warehousing merchandise not in the course of being transported within the meaning of section 6 (3) (b) of the Act and that this proviso is relevant, not merely to the question of apportionment under section 6, but also to the prior question whether the hereditament is occupied and used for purposes connected with the shipping or unshipping of merchandise at a dock so as to fulfil the first of the three conditions imposed by section 5 (1) (c).

If the matter were free from authority, we would have little hesitation in holding that, in accordance with Mr. Rowe's argument, the hereditament is at all events partly occupied and used for purposes connected with the unshipping of oil at a dock (i.e., the jetties) within the meaning of section 5 (2) (c) and that this question falls in the first instance to be determined without regard to section 6 (3) (b). The phrase " connected with " is a phrase of wide and general import, and we find it extremely difficult to hold that the tanks on the hereditament have no connection with the unshipping of the oil which they are designed to receive. Mr. Lyell's argument to the contrary seems to us highly artificial. We are not persuaded that, when oil is being pumped directly from a tanker into and through one of the pipes lying along the jetties, that pipe is not being used for a purpose connected with the unshipping of that oil or that the tank on the hereditament to which that pipe leads is not being used for such a purpose when it is being filled with oil flowing from the tanker through that pipe. As to the application of section 6 (3) (b). we would, for our part, be disposed to hold that it only becomes relevant if and when the hereditament has been found to be a freight-transport hereditament within the meaning of section 5, that is to say, for the present purpose a hereditament occupied and used wholly or partly for dock purposes and fulfilling the other two conditions imposed by section 5 (1) (c). If the hereditament is found to be so occupied and used, whether wholly or partly, then, as it seems to us, and only then, does it become relevant to consider whether, for the purposes of apportionment, it should to any, and, if so, what, extent be deprived of the status of a freight-transport hereditament accorded to it under section 5 on the ground that it, or some part of it, is primarily occupied and used for warehousing merchandise not in the course of being transported within the meaning of section 6 (3) (b).

But the matter is not free from authority. We should first refer to the Scottish case of Assessor for Aberdeen v. Shell-Mex and B.P. Ld.[1] That case concerned the appellant company's terminal depot at Aberdeen which was let to the appellant company by the Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners but actually occupied and operated by the appellant company's managing agent for Scotland, Scottish Oils and Shell-Mex Ld. The only material (or supposedly material) difference between the facts of that case and this one appears to have been that in the Scottish case connection was made between the ship's pipes and the shore pipes in chambers termed "grid boxes" situated on the quays or jetties, whereas there are no such boxes in the present case.

For reasons which will shortly appear, we should quote what is said in the present case stated concerning them: "12. . . . "There are no grid boxes on either of the said jetties. Grid "boxes are simply chambers in which pipe lines end and in "which ship's flexible discharge pipes can be coupled to the pipe "lines."

The claim made by the appellant company and its subsidiary in the Scottish case was closely comparable to the present claim and was made under the Act of 1928 as applied, without any material variation, to Scotland. Lord Keith said this[2]: "In "my opinion, neither the ground leased in these cases nor the "plant erected thereon is used for dock purposes, i.e., purposes "connected with the shipping or unshipping of merchandise. I "consider that the land and plant are used not merely primarily "but solely for the storage and distribution of oil and spirit in "connection with a business quite separate and distinct from "any of the activities carried on at the adjacent docks. I "proceed in no way upon the terms of proviso (b) of subsection "(3) of section 6 of the Act of 1928, which applies, in my "opinion, to warehouses forming part of an admitted dock "occupied by a dock undertaking and at least partly used for "dock purposes. That is not the position, in my opinion, of "the premises here. Any shipping begins and any unshipping "ends, in my opinion, at the grid-boxes. We are not told "exactly what these grid-boxes are, but I assume that they are "tanks or receptacles sunk below the surface of the quay, which "hold considerable quantities of oil and like products. It will "be easier to confine myself to the unshipping process. The "shipping process is largely the same in reverse, but is insignifi-"cant in bulk. The grid-boxes may be regarded as temporary "receptacles for the unshipped oil and it may be said therefore "that they are connected with the unshipping of oil. What the "result may be as regards the grid-boxes taken in isolation I "shall consider later. But when the oil is pumped from the "grid-boxes to the depot, that, in my opinion, has nothing to "do with unshipping the oil, no more than has the conveying "by a consignee of goods from a temporary storage or transit "shed on the quay. The shed may be connected with the "unshipping of goods. But when goods are carried away from "the shed a second stage has begun, viz., the transporting of "goods from the dock to the consignee's place of business. If "in the present case the depot instead of being 20 to 30 yards

"from the quayside were 20 to 30 miles away and the oil were "collected at the quay direct from the ship into road oil-tankers, "the unshipping would be finished when the oil was discharged "into the tankers. I regard the pipes from the grid-boxes and "the ancillary pumping plant as merely a means of conveying "or transporting the oil from the grid-boxes to the depot."

It will be seen that this passage supports to the full Mr. Lyell's primary argument that the purposes here are purely storage purposes, wholly unconnected with the shipping or unshipping of oil. But, unfortunately, Lord Keith seems to have been misinformed as to the nature of the "grid boxes" and to have been under the impression that they were tanks or receptacles which held considerable quantities of oil, whereas they are, in fact, merely chambers giving access to the ends of the shore pipes for the purpose of connecting them with the ships' pipes. If and so far as Lord Keith's judgment was founded on this misapprehension, it cannot (if we may respectfully say so) be regarded as authoritative. But, although he seems to have attached some importance to the grid boxes, his reasoning and the illustrations he gives seem to us to make it reasonably plain that his view would have been the same if there had been no grid boxes.

Lord Patrick came to the same conclusion, but, unlike Lord Keith, called in aid the restrictive effect of section 6 (3) (b), thus providing support for the second branch of Mr. Lyell's argument. After quoting section 6 (3) (b), which he described as having "a "vital bearing on the determination of what lands and heritages "are excluded from the benefit of derating," he said this [3]: "It "results that you may have lands and heritages occupied and "used partly for dock purposes as part of a dock undertaking in "the sense of section 5 (1) (c). Nevertheless, if the whole or "part of such lands and heritages consists of buildings, yards or "other places primarily occupied and used for warehousing mer-"chandise not in the course of being transported, such whole or "part cannot be treated as occupied and used for 'transport "'purposes,' i.e., by definition for 'dock purposes,' i.e., by "further definition for purposes connected with the shipping or "unshipping of merchandise, and so cannot have the benefit of "derating."

Lord Sorn, with some doubt, expressed his concurrence and, as to section 6 (3) (b), he said this [4]: "I desire to reserve my "opinion upon the applicability of section 6 (3) (b) to the question "we have to decide. My impression is that section 6 (3) (b) was "not intended to affect the definition of a freight-transport here-"ditament contained in section 5 (1) (c), and that it only comes "in at the later stage of apportionment. I think that the proviso, "which deals with places used primarily for a certain kind of "warehousing, was meant, not to exclude such places from the "benefit of derating, but only to exclude them from the operation " of section 6 (3). For the meaning and effect of section 6 (3) (b) " at the stage of apportionment, I refer to the explanation given " by Greer L.J. in Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. West " Derby Assessment Committee.[5] "

In Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. West Derby Assessment Committee[5] Scrutton L.J. seems to have been clearly of opinion that the effect of proviso (b) to section 6 (3) was to exclude premises to which it applied from the benefit of derating. He said this about warehouses in general and bonded warehouses in particular[6]: " It is probably true that nearly all goods that go " into a dock warehouse will ultimately go out. Goods are not " put into warehouses to stay there for ever. They are put into " warehouses to stay till their owner is ready to take them out, " because he has sold them, or determined a destination for them " which he did not know when he put them in warehouse, and " therefore warehoused them till he did know on what fresh " transit he would send them. This is especially true of bonded " warehouses where the owner of goods leaves them for some " time, because, when he takes them out he will have to pay duty " on them, and where, not having sold them, he does not then " want to transport them any further. So he warehouses them " not in the course of transport." The same Lord Justice said[7]: " On these facts, for the reasons given, I am of opinion that " these three bonded warehouses are not subjects for derating. " The great bulk of the goods received in them are not received " for or in course of transport. They are received because their " transport is to stop. The consignee has received them but " does not want their transport to proceed. He does not know " where they are going, nor does he yet want to pay duty on " them; he therefore stores them in bond, often for a very sub- " stantial time. The warehouse is primarily occupied and used " for warehousing merchandise not in course of transport, " and is excluded from derating. I therefore agree with the " result arrived at by the Divisional Court as to these warehouses, " though as they have not given reasons for their decision, and " indeed had not before them the detailed facts before us, I may " have arrived at the same result as they did for different reasons. " In my view, it can only be in the most unusual cases that a " bonded warehouse would be entitled to the benefit of derating." Slesser L.J. said this[8]: " As regards section 5, I think that, " whatever may be the meaning of the words ' connected with " ' the . . . unshipping at a dock of . . . merchandise,' it is clear " from the proviso to section 6 (3) that any part of the heredita- " ment being a building, yard, or other place primarily occupied " and used for warehousing merchandise not in the course of " being transported must be excluded from what might otherwise " be a hereditament under section 5 (1) (c), as being used wholly " or partly for dock purposes. Although the phrase ' wholly or

[5] [1932] 1 K.B. 40.

[8] Ibid. 119.

" ' partly ' in section 5 extends in my view to an occupation or " user of a part either defined by physical limitation or by commercial function, it may well be, in a particular case, that the " whole hereditament in the physical sense may, as a place, " primarily be occupied and used for warehousing merchandise " not in the course of being transported and so nevertheless be " wholly excluded from the special list under the proviso of " section 6, which is limited by its language to physical occupation within metes and bounds, notwithstanding that the " hereditament might otherwise fall within the wider functional " definition of section 5 as being partly connected with the " unshipping of goods."

On the other hand, Greer L.J. said [9]: " In my opinion the " effect of proviso (b) is that if you find a building, yard, or other " place, which is partly occupied and used for transport purposes, " but is primarily occupied and used for warehousing merchandise " not in the course of being transported, then no part of that " building, yard, or other place is to be affected by the restraint " on apportionment enacted by subsection (3), but it remains " subject to the provision as to apportionment contained in sub-" section (1), that is to say, it is taken out of subsection (3) but " is left to be dealt with under subsection (1) without the gloss " put on the operation of that subsection by subsection (3). The " net annual value must then be apportioned. In many cases " the place used for warehousing merchandise not in the course " of being transported may be a part of a larger hereditament, " and definable by metes and bounds, and in these cases there " will be no difficulty in making an apportionment. There is " great difficulty in applying this proviso to the cases where the " hereditament that is rated is a warehouse partly used for trans-" port purposes but primarily used for warehousing merchandise " not in the course of being transported, the part user not being " determined by metes and bounds. Though difficult, the task " is not impossible, and in my judgment the Act requires it to " be done."

In Union Cold Storage Co. v. Moon,[10] Scrutton L.J. said [11]: " I have, however, received a very clear impression from the " language of the 1928 Act that Parliament did not intend to give " the benefit of derating to premises whose primary purpose and " use was storage or warehousing. From industrial hereditaments " to be derated, those were excluded whose primary purpose and " use was storage: section 3. In the case of freight transport " hereditaments, those were excluded in whole or part which were " primarily occupied and used for warehousing merchandise not " in course of transport: section 6 (3) (b). But the language of " the Act as to apportionment between different purposes, primary " or secondary, gives rise to great difficulties." The Lord Justice said [12]: " In my view the construction and result of section 6 as " a whole is as follows: The direction to apportion contained in " subsection (1) is restricted in two respects by subsection (3). " First, if the whole or part of the hereditament is primarily used " for warehousing merchandise not in course of being transported, " the premises so primarily used are not to be deemed to be used " for transport purposes, though there is a secondary use of such " premises for transport purposes. Secondly, unless premises are " shut out from being subject-matter of derating or apportionment " by the first restriction, they are to be deemed wholly used for " transport purposes, though in fact they are partly used for other " purposes, unless those other uses are for a dwelling-house, hotel, " or place of public refreshment, when there can be apportion- " ment. It is suggested that the main body of subsection (3) and " proviso (b) cancel each other and leave subsection (1) requiring " apportionment. But to apportion premises primarily used for " storage not in course of transport seems to me directly contrary " to proviso (b). You cannot apportion premises which are not " to be deemed to be occupied and used for transport purposes; " or, which is the same thing, to be deemed not to be occupied " and used for transport purposes."

Lawrence L.J. concurred with Scrutton L.J.'s judgment, expressing his complete agreement with it, both on the interpretation which ought to be placed on section 6 of the Act and on the manner in which its provisions ought to be applied to the facts of the case then before the court.

Greer L.J. concurred in the result, though with some doubt as regards the construction of section 6. He said [13]: " I am not " sure that my brethren and I are in agreement as to the right " construction of section 6 of the statute. I am inclined to adhere " to the views I expressed in the Liverpool cases,[14] but this has " no bearing on the question involved in the appeal, and makes no " substantial difference in the advice to be given to the Assess- " ment Committee as to the way in which they should approach " the question of apportionment. I therefore think it unneces- " sary, and probably it might be embarrassing, to restate views " with which the majority of the Court do not agree."

Notwithstanding the attractions of the reasoning of Greer L.J. and the approval of that reasoning tentatively expressed by Lord Sorn, we are thus, as it seems to us, precluded by two decisions of this court from adopting what, from the appellant company's point of view, is the most advantageous application of Mr. Rowe's argument, the effect of which would be that, once the hereditament has been found to be occupied and used partly for dock purposes, the hereditament, given fulfilment of the other two conditions, is to be treated, by virtue of section 6 (3), as being wholly a freight-transport hereditament, subject to apportionment under proviso (b) to non-transport purposes of any " part of the " hereditament . . . primarily occupied and used for warehousing " merchandise not in the course of being transported."

[13] [1932] 2 K.B. 648, 665. [14] [1932] 1 K.B. 40, 105.

We think it also follows from the two decisions of this court to which we have referred that, if it is shown that the whole of the hereditament is primarily used for warehousing within the meaning of section 6 (3) (b), it is wholly disqualified from derating as a freight-transport hereditament notwithstanding that it, or part of it, is also used for purposes connected with unshipping. If, on the other hand, it is shown that any part of the hereditament is used, to some exent at least, for purposes connected with unshipping and not, or not primarily, for warehousing merchandise not in the course of being transported, then (given fulfilment of the other two conditions) it would seem that there should be an apportionment, the effect of which would apparently be to give the benefit of derating to the whole of the hereditament, including any parts of it not used for dock purposes, but with the exception of any part primarily used for warehousing merchandise not in the course of being transported, which, by virtue of section 6 (3) (b), is not to be deemed to be occupied for transport purposes.

With respect to the opinions of Lords Keith and Patrick in the Aberdeen case,[15] we are not prepared to hold that no part of the hereditament in the present case is occupied and used for dock purposes, that is, purposes connected with the shipping or unshipping of merchandise at a dock within the meaning of section 5. Nor are we prepared to hold that the whole of it is used primarily for the warehousing of merchandise not in the course of being transported within the meaning of section 6 (3) (b). We cannot see that (for example) the pipes and pumps on the hereditament are warehouses or used for warehousing primarily or at all. They seem to us to be physically and functionally incapable of such description or use. The statute does not refer to use for purposes connected with warehousing, but to a building, yard, or other place used for warehousing, which denotes a structure or place actually used for warehousing. We do not think the circumstance that the whole hereditament is technically a bonded warehouse can reasonably be held to alter this conclusion.

The question whether the storage tanks may not be primarily used for warehousing within the meaning of section 6 (3) (b) presents more difficulty. These tanks are no doubt used not merely for the purpose of receiving the oil pumped from the tankers but also for containing it pending distribution. On a literal construction of the language of this proviso, it is difficult to maintain that each of the tanks is not a "place" or, having regard to the distinctive function of a warehouse in the ordinary sense of that expression as a repository for goods pending disposal, that the storage of oil in them pending distribution is not at best capable of being described as "warehousing." Moreover, once it has reached the tanks, the oil is, we suppose, no longer "in the course of being transported." In view of the fact that only one-quarter or thereabouts of the oil is dutiable, we can attach no great importance to the technical status of the hereditament as a bonded warehouse, but, for what it is worth, it tends to support the view that the tanks are to some extent used for warehousing. We cannot, however, entirely exclude a doubt proceeding from the manifest difference between these tanks and anything which would, in common speech, be ordinarily described as a warehouse. Accordingly, while we propose to assume for the purposes of this case that the tanks are to some extent used for " warehousing " within the meaning of proviso (b), we prefer to express no final opinion on the point.

But, on this assumption, are the tanks primarily so used? We find difficulty in forming any concluded view on that question. The tanks are, as a practical matter, necessary for the purpose of unshipping the oil. If there were no tanks, there could be no unshipping. The exigencies of sea-borne supply demand that a stock of oil in excess of day-to-day requirements should be maintained in the tanks, and the element of storage or warehousing in their use is largely due to that circumstance. There is, as it seems to us, no conclusive reason for regarding the unshipping use as secondary and the warehousing use as primary, rather than regarding the warehousing use as secondary and the unshipping use as primary, or, for that matter, regarding both as of equal importance.

We find it unnecessary to resolve this question for the purpose of deciding this case and are content to hold that, so far as the first of the three conditions is concerned, Mr. Rowe is entitled to succeed to the extent that the hereditament is used, partly at all events, for dock purposes and that it is not shown that the whole of it, or every part of it used for dock purposes, is primarily used for warehousing oil not in the course of being transported.

We now turn to the second of the three conditions. Given that the hereditament is occupied and used wholly or partly for dock purposes, is it so occupied and used as part of a dock undertaking? Mr. Rowe puts this part of his case in three ways. First, he says that the hereditament is occupied and used by the appellant company as part of the dock undertaking carried on by the British Transport Commission in the shape of the Port of Hull. Secondly, he says that the hereditament is so occupied and used by the appellant company as part of the dock undertaking carried on by them at their own dock in the shape of the barge berth. Thirdly, he says that the pipes running out along the jetties and the appellant company's rights of user over them suffice to constitute a dock, and that the hereditament is occupied and used by the appellant company as part of a dock undertaking carried on by them at that dock.

As to the first of these submissions, it would seem at first sight to be plainly negatived by the fact that the hereditament is in lease to and exclusively occupied by the appellant company for the purposes of its own business of importing and distributing oil and thus excluded and segregated from the Transport Commission's dock undertaking. But Mr. Rowe relies on section 6 (3) (a) of the Act, which is in these terms: "no part of a freight-transport hereditament which is so let out as to be capable of separate assessment shall be deemed to be occupied and used for transport purposes unless it is actually so occupied and used." This seems to show that a part of a freight-transport hereditament may be occupied and used as part of a dock undertaking even though the undertakers have let it to somebody else. There have been two Scottish cases bearing upon the point. In Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Inland Revenue Officer,[16] parts of dock premises let to ship owners and stevedores for the purposes of their own shipping or stevedoring businesses were held not to be part of the dock undertaking. On the other hand, in Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Assessor for Glasgow,[17] the opposite conclusion was reached. The difference in the results reached by these two cases apparently turned to some extent on a distinction made in Scotland between buildings erected by a lessor and buildings erected by a lessee. The passage most favourable to Mr. Rowe's argument in the second of these two cases is in the judgment of Lord Hunter, where, after referring to section 6 (3) (b), he said[18]: "That means, I think, that, where one finds subjects, capable of separate assessment and leased to tenants, which are so used and occupied as to fall within the definition of freight transport, one must treat the subjects, although let, as part of the dock undertaking for purposes of derating. That is the case here." Lord Fleming did not go so far. He said[19]: "But section 6 (3) (a) seems to me to imply that subjects which would otherwise be entitled to be regarded as freight-transport lands and heritages are not to be deprived of the benefits of derating merely because they have been let to and are occupied by some person other than the dock authority."

Mr. Rowe relies strongly on the terms of the leases under which the various parts of the hereditament are held by the appellant company. He says these leases show that the ground was let with a view to the erection and operation thereon of a terminal oil depot for the unshipping, storage and distribution of oil, in connection with which the lessees were to have unshipping facilities in the shape of the pipes running out along the jetties. There was thus, he argues, something in the nature of an arrangement between the dock undertakers and the lessees under which the lessees were to extend the activities of the dock undertaking to the importation of oil. Therefore, says Mr. Rowe, the installation should be regarded as constructed and operated as part of the dock undertaking. We cannot accept this argument. We would be disposed to agree with Mr. Rowe if what the appellent company did was to provide unshipping and storage facilities for anyone having occasion to import oil. But the appellant company does nothing of the sort. It uses the hereditament and the pipe lines on the jetties simply and solely for the purposes of its own individual business, and not by way of performing the functions properly within the province of the dock undertakers as such. Notwithstanding the second of the two Scottish cases just cited, we find it impossible to hold that, in occupying and using the hereditament for its own private purposes, the appellant company is occupying and using the hereditament as part of the dock undertaking carried on by the Transport Commission. To hold the contrary would involve the conclusion that the tenants of every industrial site let by the Transport Commission in the vicinity of the Port of Hull would be occupying and using their respective sites as part of the Transport Commission's dock undertaking, if their leases or tenancy agreements allowed them the use for their own private purposes of the dock facilities provided by the commission. In the result, therefore, we find ourselves in agreement with the conclusion of the Lands Tribunal on this point, though we cannot accept the Tribunal's reasoning so far as it is based on the circumstance that, when originally let to the appellant company or its predecessors, the various parts of the hereditament were open or waste land subsequently built upon by the lessees. So far as English law at all events is concerned, this seems to us an irrelevant consideration.

As to Mr. Rowe's second submission on this part of the case, it is to be observed that the expression "dock undertaking" is defined in section 5 (3) of the Act as meaning an undertaking carried on by a dock authority, but also including "any other "undertaking comprising as part thereof a dock in so far only "as its business is carried on at and in connection with that "dock." The purport of the limiting words introduced by the phrase "in so far only as" is somewhat obscure. In the present case the barge berth is undoubtedly a "dock." It is comprised in the appellant company's undertaking. Therefore, apart from the limiting words, the whole of the appellant company's undertaking is, by virtue of the definition, a dock undertaking. That obviously requires some qualification, and a qualification is provided by the limiting words. These words seem to say in effect that, notwithstanding the earlier part of the definition, the appellant company's undertaking is only to rank as a dock undertaking as regards that part of its business which is carried on at and in connection with the barge berth. That would appear to mean that the barge berth and the business of shipping oil there are to be regarded as a dock undertaking carried on as a distinct department of the appellant company's enterprise. The question then arises whether the hereditament is occupied as part of that circumscribed branch of the company's entire undertaking. There was some argument as to the meaning of the word "at" in the definition, and it was suggested that the hereditament, though only some 300 yards from the barge berth and connected with it by a pipe line, was too far away from the barge berth to be capable of being rightly described as occupied and used as part of an undertaking the business of which was to be treated as confined to business carried on " at and in connec- " tion with " the barge berth. We are not impressed by this argument. We do not think the word " at " can be given so close a geographical significance as necessarily to exclude premises only 300 yards distant from the actual dock (that is, the barge berth) and physically connected with it by pipes from the category of premises occupied and used as " part " of the undertaking carried on at the dock. But we think Mr. Rowe's submission fails on the ground that the hereditament, while it could properly be described as occupied and used in connection with (inter alia) the barge berth to which it supplies oil, cannot reasonably be regarded as occupied and used as part of the barge berth undertaking. The barge berth is no more than one of the media through which oil is distributed from the hereditament by land and water, and distribution is only one aspect of the activities carried on at the hereditament. We think the true position is that the barge berth is occupied and used as part of the undertaking carried on by the company on the hereditament and not that the hereditament is occupied and used as part of the barge berth undertaking.

Mr. Rowe's third submission on this part of the case is to the effect that the rights of laying, maintaining and using the pipe lines running out along the Transport Commission's jetties conferred on the appellant company by the various leases under which the hereditament is held suffice to constitute a dock comprised in the appellant company's undertaking as part of which the hereditament is occupied and used. We do not agree. We think these rights are rights over the Transport Commission's dock and not a dock in themselves. We agree with what was said by Lords Keith and Patrick about a similar submission in the Aberdeen case.[20] Accordingly, we think that the hereditament fails to satisfy the second of the three conditions postulated by section 5 (1) (c).

As to the third and last condition, if (contrary to our view) the hereditament is occupied and used as part of a dock undertaking, is it an undertaking whereof a substantial proportion of the volume of business is concerned with the shipping and unshipping of merchandise not belonging to or intended for the use of the undertakers? As appears from the case stated, the whole, or substantially the whole, of the oil unshipped at the jetties is oil consigned by " Shell " Marketing Co. Ld., Eagle Oil and Shipping Co. Ld. and Anglo-Persian Oil Co. Ld. to the appellant company as their sole agent for the sale and distribution of oil for consumption in the United Kingdom under an agreement made between these three consigning companies of the one part and the appellant company of the other part and dated December 31,

SHELL-MEX AND B.P. LD. v. CLAYTON.

1931. Substantially the whole of the appellant company's business consists of the sale and distribution of this oil and it is remunerated for its services by the three consigning companies on a commission basis. The appellant company is given wide powers under the agreement in regard to prices, terms and conditions of sale and so forth. The agency is exclusive, and the appellant company has, moreover, a positive right to be supplied by the consigning companies with the oil it requires. Although the property in the oil does not, under the terms of the agreement, pass to the appellant company, as between itself and the consigning companies, the appellant company must surely have a good title to the oil as against all other persons. In these circumstances, we think it might almost be said that the oil is merchandise "belonging to" the appellant company within the meaning of section 5 (1) (c). At all events, we think the oil must be "intended for the use of" the appellant company within the meaning of the subsection. It is argued against this view that "use" means consumption. We think that is an unduly narrow meaning. We apprehend that a retail tradesman can, with perfect accuracy, be said to be using his stock when he sells it to customers and to have used it up when it is all sold. So here we think that, inasmuch as the appellant company's business consists of the sale and distribution of oil, albeit as agent for others, it is using in its business the oil which it sells and distributes, and the oil is clearly brought to the hereditament with the intention that it should be so used. The word "use" in its natural meaning is a word of wide import. In British Motor Syndicate Ld. v. Taylor & Son [21] Stirling J. pointed out that "The first meaning "assigned to the word 'use' in Johnson's Dictionary is 'to "'employ to any purpose'; it is, therefore, a word of wide "signification." In this wide sense it is, we think, apt to cover the commodity in which a merchant trades, be he a petroleum merchant, a timber merchant, or other merchant. The commodity is employed in the merchant's business; it is used to supply his customers. We agree on this aspect of the case with the observations of Lord Keith at the end of his judgment in the Aberdeen case.[22] Accordingly, we think that, even if (contrary to our view) the appellant company was occupying and using the hereditament as part of a dock undertaking comprising docks in the shape of either the barge berth or the appellant company's rights over the Transport Commission's jetties, it would still fail to satisfy the third of the three conditions laid down by section 5 (1) (c) of the Act.

For these reasons, we think that the appellant company has failed to bring the hereditament within the second and third of the three essential conditions of derating demanded by section 5 (1) (c).

We have thus reached the same result as the Lands Tribunal, though not for entirely the same reasons, and it follows that in our opinion this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Negligence — Child — Injury to — Building site — Child injured while playing upon trailer—Liability of contractors—Whether occupiers of the site—Duty of care—Extent of duty.
Trespass.

The defendants, a firm of contractors engaged under contract in constructing roads, etc., on a housing estate, left their trailer, unattended, near to the place at which they were at the time constructing a road. The trailer, which was an allurement to children, was parked on land adjacent to the newly completed part of the road and at a point between six and ten feet away from the road. Flanking the road was an area of waste land which was freely used by members of the public and on which children played, although the defendants' employees took prompt steps to stop children playing on their works or with their equipment. On a Saturday afternoon, in the absence of the defendants' employees, the plaintiff, a girl of five, sustained injuries while playing with other children upon the trailer:—

Held, that the extent of the duty owed to the plaintiff by the defendants depended upon whether the defendants were in occupation of the land and since, on the facts (whilst bearing in mind the principle that the occupation need not be exclusive) the defendants were not occupiers of the land on which the trailer was situated, the extent of their duty was that illustrated in Donoghue v. Stevenson [1932] A.C. 562; 48 T.L.R. 494, H.L.; and not the more limited duty owed by occupiers to infant trespassers; accordingly, even if the plaintiff were a trespasser to the trailer itself, the defendants were liable in negligence to the plaintiff in having failed to take reasonable steps to protect her from injury.

CREED v. McGEOCH & SONS LD.

Per curiam: "The answer [to the question whether the "defendants are occupiers] in each case depends on the particular "facts of the case and especially upon the nature and extent of "the occupation or control in fact enjoyed or exercised by the "defendants over the premises."

ACTION.

The following summary of the facts is taken from the judgment. The defendants, John McGeoch & Sons Ld., a firm of contractors, by a contract, dated June 21, 1951, made between them and Birkenhead Corporation, undertook to construct certain roads, sewers and formations for paths and verges on the Woodchurch Estate, and on August 1, 1953, had almost completed one such road, known as Home Farm Road, there remaining a short distance to be completed near the T-junction formed with another road. For the purpose of transporting kerb-stones the defendants used a two-wheeled trailer which until June 1953 had been kept, when not in use, in a barn; but which, after demolition of the barn, had remained in the open near the place at which the defendants were at the time carrying out the construction of Home Farm Road. On August 1, 1953, the trailer was parked upon land immediately adjoining a part of the road which had been completed and kerbed, with its nearest edge about six feet from the roadside kerb. Neither side of the road near the trailer had been built upon, the nearest permanent building being an estimated distance of 300 yards away, and the area flanking the road within this distance was waste land (upon which it was the intention of the corporation in due course to build). The defendants had undertaken to carry out excavations for the laying of sewers alongside the road and to level a strip of waste land on each side of the road; but neither of these operations had, on August 1, been commenced in the vicinity of the trailer and the waste land was freely used by members of the public and played upon by children. No steps were taken by the corporation or by the defendants to prevent such use or to drive the children off, although, whenever the defendants' employees saw children playing on their works or with their equipment they took prompt steps to drive them away and they had on a number of occasions seen children playing on the trailer and had chased them off.

On the afternoon of August 1, 1953, which was a Saturday when none of the defendants' employees was working on the site, the plaintiff, Margaret Lesley Creed, a girl of five, in the company of her brother aged nine and two other children was making her way from beyond the T-junction, along Home Farm Road, to her home on the estate when, seeing the trailer and being unable to resist the temptation to amuse themselves on it, the children contrived to make it into a form of see-saw by running or jumping from one end of its wooden flat top to the other. While playing thus, the towing bar of the trailer came down suddenly causing injuries to the infant plaintiff, who brought this action by her mother and next friend, Mrs. Lilia Tucker, claiming damages alleging that the defendants were guilty of negligence and/or that the presence of the trailer close to Home Farm Road constituted a nuisance to the highway. The defendants by their defence alleged that the infant plaintiff was a trespasser to the land and/or the trailer.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 7. ASHWORTH J. read a judgment (at Manchester Assizes) in which he stated the facts substantially as set out above, and continued: It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendants are liable for her injury and the claim is framed both in negligence and in nuisance. So far as nuisance is concerned, it is said that the presence of the trailer close to Home Farm Road constituted a nuisance to the highway. In my judgment this contention fails. In the first place, although Home Farm Road was almost complete there was no proof that it had been dedicated as a highway or that the corporation had taken it over. Secondly, I do not consider that the presence of the trailer could be said to constitute a nuisance within the principles considered in Jacobs v. London County Council.[1] Thirdly, the conduct of the children in leaving Home Farm Road to play on the trailer would, in my view, amount to a deliberate deviation, even if the road were held to be a highway.

CREED v. McGEOCH & SONS LD.

Ashworth J.

Much of the argument before me was directed to the question whether the defendants were in occupation of the ground on which the trailer rested. A somewhat unusual feature of this case is that the defendants seek to establish that they were in occupation and owed no higher duty to the plaintiff than such as is imposed on occupiers in respect of infant trespassers; on the other hand, the plaintiff contends that whether or no she was a trespasser vis-à-vis the true occupiers, the defendants were not in occupation and owed a higher duty of the type illustrated in Donoghue v. Stevenson,[2] and more recently in Buckland v. Guildford Gas, Light & Coke Co.[3]

It may appear surprising, at least to the parties, that the measure of the defendants' obligation to the plaintiff should depend upon the answer to the question whether they were in occupation of the land, and in Davis v. St. Mary's Demolition and Excavation Co. Ld.[4] Ormerod J. said[5]: "I think any "decision which puts the defendants [who were not in occupation "of land] in a different position from the occupier of the land is "one which must be considered with very great care." It seems to me, however, that there is no escape from the conclusion that as the authorities stand the distinction referred to by Ormerod J. does exist.

In considering whether the defendants were occupiers of the relevant land or any part of it, it is important to keep in mind the principle that the occupation need not be exclusive. In Hartwell v. Grayson Rollo & Clover Docks Ld.[6] Lord Oaksey said[7]: "In my opinion the true view is that when a person "invites another to a place where they both have business, the "invitation creates a duty on the part of the invitor to take "reasonable care that the place does not contain or to give "warning of hidden dangers, no matter whether the place "belongs to the invitor or is in his exclusive occupation. "Although the rule has generally been stated with reference to "owner, or occupiers of premises, it is indicated by Lord Wright "in the case of Glasgow Corporation v. Muir[8] that the occupa- "tion need not be exclusive. He said there[9]: 'Before dealing "'with the facts, I may observe that in cases of "invitation" "'the duty has most commonly reference to the structural con- "'dition of the premises, but it may clearly apply to the use "'which the occupier (or whoever has control so far as material)

" ' of the premises permits a third party to make of the premises.' " Invitors, of course, do not as a rule invite others on business to " premises in which the invitors have no business interest or " control, but they may have an interest and control which falls " short of exclusive occupation."

It is true that in both the last-mentioned cases the courts were dealing with alleged invitors, but in my view nothing turns on that point so far as the question of occupation is concerned.

In the present case counsel on both sides sought to derive support for their arguments from the conditions incorporated in the agreement between the Corporation of Birkenhead and the defendants. For my part I do not think that the question whether vis-à-vis the plaintiff the defendants are to be regarded as occupiers or merely as persons carrying out work on land occupied and controlled by the corporation can be answered by reference to that agreement. In some cases it may well be that the terms of an agreement coupled with evidence as to the defendants' conduct with reference to the land will establish conclusively that they must be regarded as occupiers, but in the present case the terms of the agreement are not such as to lead to any conclusion either way on the problem now under consideration.

Moreover, I think that there is substance in the alternative submission put forward by Mr. Watson for the plaintiff on the footing that the terms of the agreement were in the defendants' favour, namely, that the agreement should be treated so far as third parties are concerned in the same way as agreements whereby a servant of one employer renders services for another; see Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Coggins.[10] In these circumstances I do not propose to lengthen this judgment by detailed reference to the provisions of the agreement.

Davis v. St. Mary's Demolition and Excavation Co. Ld.[11] has undoubtedly a resemblance to the present case, in that in both cases the defendants at the material time were carrying out work as contractors on property owned by a corporation. In Davis's case [11] the work involved the demolition of bomb-damaged houses, and in the present case it involves the construction of roads and ancillary works on a building estate. It is not clear from the report of Davis's case [11] to what extent the question whether the defendants were occupiers was argued, and the judgment is founded on the premise that they were not occupiers. I do not accept Mr. Watson's submission that the decision in Davis's case is conclusive on the issue as to occupation. In my judgment, the answer in each case depends on the particular facts of the case and especially upon the nature and extent of the occupation or control in fact enjoyed or exercised by the defendants over the premises.

CREED v. McGEOCH & SONS LD.

Ashworth J.

In Hartwell's case [12] and in Prenton v. General Steam Navigation Co. Ld.[13] the facts were sufficient to render contractors occupiers of part of a ship; Davis's case [14] is an illustration of the converse results in relation to real property.

In my judgment, so far as Home Farm Road is concerned, the defendants can only be described as occupiers of such land as was comprised in the length actually under construction. That is to say, on August 1, 1953, they were not in occupation of more than a relatively short length terminating in the T-junction. The road had been completed and kerbed from the Roman Catholic church to a point between the trailer and the T-junction, and assuming in the defendants' favour that they were in occupation of successive portions of that length during their construction, the defendants had completed that work and on August 1, 1953, were no longer in occupation of any part of it. It is true that the defendants had still to carry out work of excavation alongside the roadway, in order that sewers might be laid, but this work had not been begun, at any rate in the area near the trailer, and in my view the fact that the land on which the trailer was standing would in due course be excavated by the defendants is not sufficient to render them occupiers of it on August 1, 1953. Similarly, in regard to the strip 80 feet in width on either side of Home Farm Road, the defendants would in due course have to carry out levelling work, but this strip had not even been fenced or otherwise marked off from the remainder of the waste land, and in these circumstances I hold that the defendants were not in occupation of it.

The position therefore is that when the plaintiff and her companions left the roadway of Home Farm Road and went on to the land whereon the trailer stood they were not trespassers vis-à-vis the defendants in relation to that land. Nor indeed do I think that they were trespassers vis-à-vis the corporation, since the evidence established that children frequently played on the waste land without let or hindrance on the part of the corporation. In my view the principles applied in Buckland's case [15] and in Davis's case [16] are equally applicable in the present case and I refer in particular to the last two paragraphs of Ormerod J.'s judgment in the latter case.[17]

In the present case the defendants were fully aware of the risk of injury to children who might play on the trailer and they also knew that it was attractive to children. Admissions to this effect were frankly made by all the witnesses called on behalf of the defendants. Moreover, one of their directors said that he had considered turning the trailer upside down as a measure of precaution, but had not taken this course as he thought that children might then sustain injury while playing with the wheels. It seems probable that in any event the defendants would not have had any occasion to make further use of the trailer in connection with Home Farm Road and it could have been removed. In my judgment, steps could quite easily have been taken by the defendants to prevent such injury to children as occurred in this case either by turning the trailer upside down or by securing the towing bar in a fixed position, or by removing the trailer altogether. In these circumstances I hold that they were negligent.

It was argued for the defendants that even if the plaintiff was not a trespasser in regard to the land whereon the trailer stood, she was at least a trespasser in regard to the trailer itself. Reference was made to Lynch v. Nurdin [18] and it was contended that the plaintiff in that case would have failed as being a trespasser had it not been for the gross negligence of the defendant, and that no such negligence has been established here. For the plaintiff reliance was placed on Gough v. National Coal Board,[19] and although that case may be distinguishable in that the plaintiff was held to be a licensee of land occupied by the defendants, there are passages in the judgment which clearly indicate that the defendants' argument on this point should be rejected. It scarcely lies in the mouth of a defendant, who is found to have negligently left a dangerous and attractive object in a place where children are known to play, to contend that a child who has done the very thing which forms the basis of the finding of negligence should fail because he was a trespasser on the object. I therefore hold that the present claim succeeds. In my judgment, a reasonable amount to award by way of compensation is the sum of £600. There will therefore be judgment for the plaintiff for that sum.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Cruelty—Drunkenness—Husband's persistent excessive drinking.

Persistent drunkenness after warnings that such a course of conduct is inflicting pain on the other spouse, certainly if it is known to be injuring the other spouse's health, may well of itself amount to cruelty.

[Reported by E. SOMERSET JONES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Baker.

The gravamen of a wife's charge of cruelty in her defended petition for divorce was that her husband regularly and persistently drank to excess and was often drunk, thereby causing her acute mental distress and injuring her health. The wife repeatedly remonstrated with the husband about his drunkenness and told him that his conduct was endangering the marriage. On occasions the husband promised to reform, but a short time later reverted to his former habits, which were the real cause of the break-up of the marriage. When the wife was ill and confined to bed in April, 1954, her husband went out drinking for practically the whole of the permitted hours of licensed premises. After the wife's convalescence the husband promised to reform and did so for a short period before relapsing into his former habits: the wife refused to forgive him this relapse. Thereafter, the husband, who, despite his drunkenness, was not a violent man, frightened his wife on two occasions by exhibitions of temper and violence and frequently kept her awake at night trying to compel her to forgive him. When, on these occasions, the wife refused to have sexual intercourse, her husband compelled her to submit to him. On July 25, 1954, there was an attempted reconciliation between the parties, the wife agreeing to "try again" upon the husband's promise to reform, not to drink anything more that day and to go to work the following day. Despite the husband's promise, he went out drinking at a public-house on the evening of July 25 and was too ill to go to work on the following day, whereupon the wife, who was on the verge of a complete nervous breakdown, left the matrimonial home:—

Held, that such conduct amounted in the circumstances to cruelty.

Wife's defended petition for divorce on the ground of cruelty.

The parties were married in July, 1943, and there was one child born in 1950. The nature of the allegations, based in the main on the husband's drinking habits, is set out in the following paragraphs in the petition:

"9. That the respondent is a man of drunken habits who has "assaulted abused and threatened the petitioner.

"10. That since the celebration of the . . . marriage the "respondent has been drunk on occasions too numerous for the "petitioner to specify. On many occasions the petitioner has "remonstrated with the respondent about his drunkenness and "the respondent has promised to change his ways but after a "short time has always reverted to his normal habits.

"11. That in or about the month of April, 1954, the petitioner "was ill and confined to bed. During this period the petitioner "frequently requested the respondent to stay in the house with "her but the respondent persisted in remaining away from the "house when the public-houses were open. The petitioner had "to wait until 3 p.m. or thereabouts for her mid-day meal and "then was obliged to have her tea before 5.30 p.m. when the "respondent left the house.

"12. That after her . . . illness the petitioner went to a "convalescent home. Shortly after her return home the respon-"dent commenced drinking heavily again and when the petitioner "refused to forgive him his behaviour when drunk the respondent commenced the practice of going to the petitioner's bedroom at night abusing her and refusing to allow her to go to sleep until 2 a.m. or 3 a.m. When the petitioner closed her eyes to attempt to sleep the respondent shook her to waken her and said that he was trying to break her spirit to force her to forgive him. This practice continued until the petitioner was compelled by his conduct to leave the respondent on or about July 26, 1954. On one such occasion the respondent put his hands round the petitioner's throat.

"13. That on or about July 13, 1954, the respondent threatened the petitioner with violence if she did not submit to sexual intercourse with him.

"14. That on each night between July 17 and 26, 1954, the respondent desired sexual intercourse with the petitioner and when she refused threatened her and kept her awake until she was on each occasion forced in the early hours of the morning to submit.

"15. That on or about July 23, 1954, the respondent threatened to burn off the petitioner's hair and held a match to the side of her head. When she blew it out he took hold of her hair, pulled it and struck her in the face.

"16. That by reason of the respondent's cruelty as aforesaid the petitioner has suffered in her health."

The husband by his answer denied the allegations of cruelty; alleged that the wife left him, not as a result of any conduct on his part, but solely in order that she might associate more freely with a man named Capper; and pleaded that his cruelty, if any, had been condoned. By her reply the wife denied the allegations contained in the answer; alleged that it was by reason only of the husband's conduct that she in any way associated with Capper; and pleaded that the husband's cruelty, if condoned, was revived by his constructive desertion on July 26, 1954.

June 15. DAVIES J. read a judgment in which he referred to the pleadings and, after stating the fact of the marriage and the places of cohabitation of the parties, continued: The real gravamen of the wife's complaint is that the husband is a drunkard, and by reason of and in consequence of his drinking habits cruel to her. Davies J.

of what, if he will allow me to say so, was a most excellent final speech, was constrained to admit that his client was "a heavy "drinker by any standards," though he suggested that the extent of the husband's drinking had been exaggerated by the wife for the purposes of this case. I do not think that it was. It appears that the husband's business consists largely of selling cleansing substances to licensed victuallers, and he protests that in order to promote sales he has to do a certain amount of drinking with customers. For many weeks of the year he was away from home except at week-ends; but it is perfectly plain that his business drinking during the week did not prevent him from drinking heavily at the week-ends as well—I suppose for pleasure.

[His Lordship referred to the evidence, observing that the husband's appearance was obviously that of an extremely heavy drinker, and continued:] The husband, if not an habitual drunkard, regularly and persistently drinks to excess and is often drunk. And I have no doubt that that is what has really broken up this marriage.

But, as was pointed out by Lord Greene M.R. in Buchler v. Buchler[1]: "The legislature has not thought fit to make the "continuous unhappiness of one spouse caused by the unkind-"ness, the lack of consideration, the selfishness or even the "drunken degradation of the other spouse, a ground for obtaining "a dissolution of the marriage." There was also cited the well-known passage in the judgment of Denning L.J. in Kaslefsky v. Kaslefsky,[2] which passage has, no doubt, now to be read in the light of the recent decision of the Judicial Committee in Lang v. Lang.[3] Denning L.J. said[4]: "When the conduct does not "consist of direct action against the other, but only of miscon-"duct indirectly affecting him or her, such as drunkenness, "gambling or crime, then it can only properly be said to be "aimed at the other when it is done, not only for the gratification "of the selfish desires of the one who does it, but also, in some "part, with an intention to injure the other and to inflict misery "on him or her. Such an intention may readily be inferred from "the fact that it is the natural consequence of the conduct, "especially when the one knows, or it has been brought to his "notice what the consequences will be, and nevertheless he does "it, careless and indifferent whether it distresses the other or not. "But the court is not bound to draw the inference: the presump-"tion that a person intends the natural consequences of his acts "is one that may—not must—be drawn. If, in all the circum-"stances, it is not the correct inference, then it should not be "drawn. In cases of this kind, if there is no desire to injure "or inflict misery on the other, the conduct only becomes cruelty "when the justifiable remonstrances of the innocent party

" provoke resentment on the part of the other which evinces itself " in actions or words actually or physically directed at the " innocent party." [4]

In my judgment, persistent drunkenness after warnings that such a course of conduct is inflicting pain on the other spouse, certainly if it is known to be injuring the other spouse's health, may well of itself amount to cruelty. In any case, such drunkenness, if it is combined with other acts of ill-treatment, may obviously be of the greatest importance.

Before the parties were married, the engagement was on one occasion broken off by the wife because of the husband's drinking. But it was made up on the husband's promise to mend his ways. For a time he was better. But not long after the marriage he was drinking heavily again, and the wife threatened to leave him if he did not pull up. He was better at times, but there were occasions when he was brought home drunk and occasions when he was incapable of getting to bed. There was more than one occasion during the marriage when he suffered injury through falling when drunk, for example, an injury to his nose and face and an injury to his spine. In April, 1946, when he started as a salesman, his drinking became worse for a time. It is fair to say that in December, 1948, when the wife's mother died, the husband was kind and helpful to her though he was still drinking.

Some short while before the parties moved to their last home, the wife had to sell her engagement ring to help the husband who was in debt. On another occasion she had to be a passive party to a lie which he told as to some of his company's money which was short. These are not, of course, acts of cruelty, but they are part of the picture of the life which the wife had to lead. In April, 1952, when they moved to their new house, the wife had to borrow money from the husband's mother and gave her fur coat as security. The husband was in debt to his company and still is: the present debt is about £600.

In addition to his drinking habits and financial difficulties there were two occasions when he frightened his wife by exhibitions of temper and violence, though it is not suggested that there was ever violence towards her until the year 1954.

It is now time to mention a man called Capper. Until February, 1954, when he obtained a divorce from his wife, he was a married man, though he had been living apart from his wife for some years. He was called as a witness on behalf of the husband. It is beyond dispute in this case that at the present time the wife and Capper are in love with one another and wish to marry. The wife and Capper first met in 1952, when they went to a dance in a party organized by neighbours of the Bakers. During the ensuing twelve months or so there were similar dance parties. The husband knew about these dances and made no objection. I reject entirely the husband's evidence that on one of these occasions when the wife returned home very late she was very drunk.

BAKER v. BAKER.

On January 1, 1954, the wife contracted whooping cough and was undoubtedly seriously ill. Eventually she went to stay near St. Asaph to recuperate. There can be no doubt that something approaching a close friendship was beginning to grow up between the wife and Capper, for he visited her three times while she was at St. Asaph, at her invitation. On the first occasion he was to have been accompanied by some friends who were at the last moment unable to come.

It is, of course, important, in considering the husband's conduct in the last few months of the marriage, to consider also the wife's conduct. If a wife is provoking her husband by associating with another man to his knowledge and against his wishes, or indeed, if in consequence of such an association, even if unknown to her husband, she is, either deliberately or because she cannot help it, adopting a cold and provocative attitude to her husband, that may well explain or excuse conduct on the part of the husband which would otherwise be inexcusable. But in the present case there are two factors to be considered on the other side. In the first place, the association between the petitioner and Capper—there is no suggestion of adultery or of any impropriety apart from the fact of the association—was the result of the husband's continued drunkenness: but for the unhappiness which he had caused her, this association would never have happened. Secondly, even after the association had commenced and the wife's feelings for Capper were waxing as those towards her husband were waning, he had on two or three occasions—as will appear—a real opportunity of reconstituting the marriage if only he could have behaved nicely to her and, above all, kept off the bottle.

[His Lordship read some notes, of which the following are extracts, made by the wife in respect of a week spent in North Wales in 1954, stating that they formed a truthful and substantially accurate record and that, in general, the wife's evidence was to be accepted in preference to that of the husband, he being so sodden with drink as to render his evidence in general most unreliable:]

"Friday, March 26th: Roy [the husband] came in at 9.30. "Had been drinking and didn't stay even for a cup of coffee. "Left 5 minutes later for Salisbury Arms. Asked me to get "supper for him at 10.30. Came back late. . . . He had had far "too much whisky and everything was wrong as usual.

"Saturday, March 27th: Took Roy's breakfast up as he felt "awful. Was greeted with 'What the hell's that?' and told to "take it away. . . . Roy came in at 1.30 for his [luncheon] and "then went up to Salisbury Arms again. . . . When I asked "him not to drink any more he told me not to speak to him today. "He came back at 3 p.m. . . . Putting Rosaline [the child of "the marriage] to bed when Roy called. He was going out. Got " in at 10.45 very drunk. Had a long talk but doubt if it will " make any difference.

" Sunday, 28th March: Roy refused to get up. Had to stop " Rosaline from talking until we went down for breakfast. . . . " Impossible to hold any sort of a conversation with Roy. I don't " know how much longer I can go on. If only I had some money " or somewhere to go. He says he is a dipsomaniac and I believe " him. What a life. I told him I must leave him. Thinking it " over until the week-end.

" Monday, 29th March: . . . Was very unhappy but will get " over it. . . ."

" Wednesday, 31st March: [Capper] came in the evening and " we had a few happy drinks, then Roy came in unexpectedly. " Don't know whether he intended to go to the house to pick " me up, or perhaps he would have stayed at the Salisbury until " they closed and then come home or driven to Wallasey, I just " don't know. He stayed with us until about 11 o'clock, then " went to the Tolardy Hotel to stay the night.

" Thursday, 1st April: Roy called for us at 10.30 and we went " to Llandudno. A beautiful day but I was very edgy trying to " stop Rosaline from talking as Roy wouldn't have it. Went to " the Salisbury at night and told Roy we'd try again together, " had a nice evening and hope it will be alright now.

" Friday, 2nd April: . . . We [the parties] had a nice evening " together."

[His Lordship then referred to the evidence relating to the evening of March 31: accepting as may well being true the husband's testimony that he was most upset upon finding his wife and Capper in the bar, and that that was the only visit of Capper to see his wife of which he knew; observing that there was on April 1 something in the nature of a reconciliation; and continued:] This incident should have been a severe warning to the husband. She had told him on the 28th that she must, because of his drinking, leave him. He had found her in the company of Capper on the 31st, and it therefore behoved him to be particularly careful in his behaviour in order to win back his wife and restore her confidence in him. He did for a week or so behave better.

On or about April 19 the wife was taken ill again with bronchitis. She was in bed at home for about 10 days. He was at home for a week and no doubt did a good deal of domestic work; but on every single day, with his wife in bed, and despite her requests that he should not got out, he was out for practically the whole of the permitted opening hours of licensed premises. He says this was in order to carry on his business of selling his goods: but I have no doubt that he was with this business combining a good deal of his old pleasure. He was drinking heavily—going back to the old ways of which his wife had complained, and this at a time when his wife was seriously ill, and when a decent husband might have been expected to be more than ordinarily kind and considerate. On April 29 the wife was seen by a specialist who diagnosed virus pneumonia and ordered that she be removed next day to hospital. The husband went with the doctor to fetch some drugs and admitted that on his way home he could not prevent himself from going into the public-house and buying some bottles of beer to consume in the house in which his wife was so gravely ill.

[His Lordship referred to the wife's convalescence at Ilkley, and continued:] On June 7 the husband fetched his wife from Ilkley. He told her that her illness had been a great shock to him, that it had taught him a lesson and that he would not drink again. For 10 days they were happy and might have remained so but for the fact that the husband relapsed. On Friday, June 18, the husband came in completely drunk, hardly able to stand or to speak coherently. He said that he hated everyone in the world and his wife in particular. He called her offensive names and said that he would drink as much as he liked. The wife refused to forgive him for this conduct, and he then and on subsequent occasions said that if she wouldn't forgive him there was no point in his ceasing to drink.

From this point there are a number of very brief entries in the wife's diary which, like the earlier notes, are, I am satisfied, substantially accurate. The husband was drunk for three nights in succession and from June 19 to 23 he was constantly keeping his wife awake very late at night trying to make her forgive him, and on several occasions he actually forced her to have sexual intercourse with him against her will. On at least one occasion he said that he was using Chinese torture to make her submit and forgive him. One one occasion when the wife was refusing intercourse he put his hands round her throat but took them away when she told him not to be a fool, remarking, however, that he ought to have pressed harder. After this miserable week, the wife went on June 24 to St. Asaph with Capper in his car without telling her husband. On that evening the husband arrived home drunk and having run short of cigarettes went to her handbag for some. In her bag he found a diary with the entry "St. Asaph," and he also found two letters from Capper, in themselves perfectly harmless, written to her while she was ill.

[His Lordship referred to the evidence, and continued:] The husband's discovery led to a row between them about Capper, in the course of which the wife said that she wanted a divorce. Shortly after this the wife telephoned to Capper, and as a result they did not meet again until after the wife had left her husband. The entry in the diary for June 27 says: "Roy "went to Belgravia"—that is a public-house—"after promising "not to. Did not tell me. Pam and Norman did": for June 28: "Threatened to bribe and corrupt in order to win his case and get "Rosaline"—that is something which the wife heard him say to her aunt: for June 30: "Roy in Belgravia 12.30." On July 3 the husband demanded intercourse when in drink. The wife refused. Whereupon he said: "I am going out to get drunker "than you have ever seen me and when I come back I'll knock "you down so hard that you'll never get up again." He did not carry out either of these latter threats, but when he came in he kept her up till half past two and held her down and had intercourse with her. From July 10 to 17 they were away at Torquay on holiday, the child being with them. On two occasions during that week he kept her awake late at night with arguments and also woke the child. She says that he wanted intercourse: he, however, says that this never arose, because she was menstruating. It does not, I think, matter particularly what were the causes of the altercations. During the last few days of their cohabitation, which ended on July 26, the husband was constantly keeping the wife awake till very late—half past two or three—trying to compel her to forgive him and wanting intercourse. Sometime during July, the wife, whose endurance was plainly coming to an end, on one occasion suggested to the husband that he should divorce her for desertion. The entry in the diary for Thursday, July 22, is: "Roy in bed all day. Not "allowed out except to Belgravia so he could check on me"; for July 23: "Told me I'm a chattel and he owns me as he's "married me—especially since Rosaline was born." Then there comes the final evening and the last serious scene on July 23.

[His Lordship referred to the evidence relating to this incident; the wife's evidence being to the effect that her husband assaulted her as alleged in paragraph 15 of the petition (set out above) when she refused to take a light for a cigarette which he was attempting to compel her to take; the husband's evidence, which in substance contradicted that of the wife, being to the effect that he struck his wife a "backhander" when she became hysterical as he was talking about Capper: and continued:] He may well have had Capper in his mind. Indeed, this fact may well be the reason for his having forced intercourse upon his wife during this period and for much of his ill-treatment of her in June and July, though I do not believe that Capper was constantly mentioned. It is, I think, likely that Capper was mentioned on July 23 during the altercation; but, as to what the husband did, I accept the wife's evidence. He did use violence to her on this occasion. It is perfectly true that, despite the husband's drinking, he is not a violent man. Apart from this occasion and the perhaps not very important occasion when he put his hands on her throat, he never used violence to her except in the course of compelling her to have intercourse. That this incident happened substantially as the wife has described, I have no doubt.

It had been arranged that on Sunday, July 25, the parties would go to an hotel where the wife was to sign a contract in respect of the sale of the house. The husband proceeded to get very drunk and had to be taken home by the doctor. Subsequently he vomited on the stairs.

BAKER v. BAKER.

Davies J.

[His Lordship referred to the evidence relating to a discussion had between the parties and the husband's parents later that day, stating that he accepted the wife's evidence which was to the effect that in the course of the discussion the husband said that he was drinking because there was another man, and she told him that she could not go on and would have to leave him, that if she had a chance she would be glad to marry Capper, that she wanted her husband to give her a divorce and that she had lost all affection for him: and continued:] The upshot of the discussion was that the wife agreed to try again. This was the husband's last chance, arising out of the first occasion on which their troubles had been discussed in front of his parents. It is true that the wife did not mention violence or the fact that he had been having intercourse against her will. That does not affect my conclusion on this point: the main fault from which all the rest stemmed was his drunkenness and no doubt it was on that that she concentrated. The husband promised his parents that he would drink no more that night, and he said he could carry out his work at Sheffield the next day. But as soon as his parents left, out he went to the public-house—drinking again. And on the Monday he was too ill to go to work—as he had been on a number of previous Mondays after a week-end debauch. His explanation of his failure to go to work on the Monday was that he was suffering from a delayed nervous attack. There was at one time a suggestion that the wife voluntarily had intercourse on the Sunday night, but that suggestion was not seriously pressed, and I am satisfied that no such intercourse took place. His renewed drinking on the Sunday night and his failure to go to work on the Monday were the last straw for the wife. She left on that day, taking the child with her. It was submitted by Mr. Pigot that his failure to go to work was an odd "last straw," an odd culminating reason for her to leave. Had he gone to work that day she might have stayed. But, after all that she had had to go through, the husband's conduct on the Sunday evening and the Monday must have indicated to her that he was quite unwilling or quite unable to abide by any promises of amendment, and that, if she were to stay, it would be merely to expose herself to treatment similar to that which had been meted out to her in the past.

I am quite satisfied from the evidence of Dr. Stephens that on July 24 the wife was in a very serious nervous state. He described her as being near to a complete nervous breakdown. It is no doubt true that some part of this was due not to his treatment of her but to her belief that there was a prospect of better things with Capper. As I have indicated, the association with Capper was itself caused by the husband's conduct towards her. The husband was also near a breakdown; but he himself is the cause of this.

On the whole of the evidence in this case, I am abundantly satisfied that this charge of cruelty has been made out. The husband caused his wife great mental distress by his persistent drinking, despite warnings from both her and from others that she would not be able to stand it. In the last few months of the marriage, when she had been driven away from him by his conduct, he became worse. He attacked her with words, he insisted on intercourse when he knew that she did not want it. On two occasions he used violence to her, particularly on July 23. Even in 1954 there were three occasions when there was a chance that the marriage might be patched up, namely, on April 1, June 7 and July 25. On each of these occasions sooner or later he destroyed the chance by reverting to drink and treating her in a manner which undoubtedly did injure her and would have caused her further injury had she remained. On my finding of fact the issue of condonation is really disposed of. I am satisfied that from and after June 18, the wife never voluntarily had intercourse with her husband. The agreement for a reconciliation arrived at on July 25 was inchoate and, owing to the husband's conduct immediately afterwards, never became effective.

BAKER v. BAKER.

Davies J.

[His Lordship referred to the overtures, directed to a resumption of cohabitation, made by the husband to the wife after she left which she had rejected and, after stating that the husband was plainly incorrigible, concluded:] In the result, therefore, the wife has made out the petition and there will be a decree nisi, custody, and an order for costs.

Public Health—Nuisance—Cellar—Cellar-head in pavement—Projection after resetting by local authority—Obligation of frontager to "be "kept in good condition and repair"—Whether duty to abate nuisance created by local authority—Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 59), s. 35 (1).
Nuisance—Highway.

A local authority raised a pavement and reset in it a metal slab covering a cellar hole. Before the reconstruction the slab and the flagstones supporting it were in good condition, but after the slab had been reset it projected above the pavement. The plaintiff tripped over the projection, and brought proceedings against the frontager claiming that he had not fulfilled the obligation put on frontagers by section 35 (1) of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890 (the local authority having adopted that Act), to keep the cellar-head and supports "in good condition and repair":—

Held, that, although the cellar-head constituted a public nuisance, the nuisance was due to the lay-out of the pavement as reconstructed by the local authority and not to the condition of the cellar-head and supports; the frontager had no power or duty to abate the nuisance which the local authority had created and was not liable for the injuries sustained by the plaintiff.

APPEAL from Judge Maddocks sitting at Bury County Court.

On January 10, 1953, Catherine Penney was passing along a public highway known as Bolton Street, Ramsbottom, Lancashire, when she tripped over a metal slab set in the pavement which covered the cellar of 57 Bolton Street, the premises occupied by the defendant, H. Berry. The plaintiff brought proceedings against the defendant in respect of the injuries which she sustained and claimed £200 damages. The slab, which measured about 1 foot by 1 foot 3 inches, was laid in a concrete surround bedded on a ledge or rebate on the concrete. At the time of the accident the slab and the surround were in good condition and the slab was bedded down on the ledge but it projected about three-quarters of an inch above the level of the pavement. The county court judge found that in those circumstances the cellar head constituted a public nuisance, but he further held that the defendant was not responsible for the nuisance. The defendant had bought the house from his father in 1941, and at that time this slab had been more or less in this position, but set in a large flagstone. About 1950 the local authority raised the pavement 6 in. to 8 in. and in the course of doing that slightly altered the position of the opening into the cellar and fitted the slab into a concrete surround. The slab rested on a rebate in the concrete but the top was not flush with the pavement and projected at one side about three-quarters of an inch. The county court judge held that the defendant was under no obligation to abate the nuisance created by the local authority. He dismissed the plaintiff's claim and the plaintiff appealed.

brought by the plaintiff, Mrs. Penney, against the defendant, who was the owner of premises No. 57, Bolton Street, Ramsbottom.

On January 10, 1953, the plaintiff was walking along the street outside the defendant's house when she tripped on what has been referred to, sometimes as a grating, or a cellar-head, or a coal-hole, consisting of a metal slab, about 1 foot by 1 foot 3 inches, with six holes in it and laid in a concrete surround bedded on a ledge or rebate on the concrete. It is, in fact, the cover of the opening into Mr. Berry's cellar used in connexion with his house. The county court judge found that, although that cover was properly bedded down on its ledge, in other words, that it was not sticking up by reason of some coal dust or dirt, nevertheless part of it, one side of it at any rate, projected about three-quarters of an inch above the pavement and in those circumstances the slab constituted a public nuisance and that the plaintiff tripped on it.

In those circumstances, the only question for this court is whether the county court judge was right in holding (as he did hold) that, although this was a public nuisance, the defendant was in no way liable either for its creation or for its continuation or adoption.

Mr. Fisher, appearing for the plaintiff, has put his case in this way. He refers the court to the well-known case of Sedleigh-Denfield v. O'Callaghan [1] in which the principle was affirmed whereby a party who, with full knowledge of the existence of a nuisance, fails to take any reasonable means to bring it to an end when he has ample time to do so, continues and adopts that nuisance. Of course, in that case the nuisance in question had arisen on private land. A trespasser had run a ditch on the defendants' land into a pipe or culvert. That was well known to the defendants and, in fact, they used the water that came from the culvert for their own purposes, but they failed to take any proper means of seeing that the culvert did not become blocked. As a result of it becoming blocked with leaves damage was done to the plaintiff's land.

In the present case there is no question of a nuisance having been created on land belonging to the defendant, and in cases such as this the general principle, as I understand it, is that there can be no duty on the owner of land adjoining the highway where the nuisance is, to abate the nuisance because the liability is, primarily at any rate, on the local authority, and unless he has some statutory power to do so the owner has no right to go onto the pavement and to abate the nuisance. As Shearman J. put it in Horridge v. Makinson [2]: "In my opinion the cases "shew that a liability is cast upon the owner of the house, in "respect of a nuisance, only when such owner has a duty to "abate the nuisance, and he fails to do so." I think I might add that it is only when such owner has a duty and a power to abate the nuisance.

PENNEY v. BERRY.

The way Mr. Fisher puts it in this case is that this local authority, having adopted the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, have by reason of section 35 put on to adjoining frontagers certain obligations; by subsection (1)—reading only the relevant words—it is provided that "All . . . cellars under "any street, . . . and all cellar-heads . . . and coalholes in the "surface of any street, and all landings, flags, or stones of the "path or street supporting the same respectively, shall be kept "in good condition and repair by the owners or occupiers of "the same, or of the houses or buildings to which the same "respectively belong."

It is quite clear, therefore, that there was an obligation on the defendant to keep this slab, which is a cellar-head or coal-hole, and all landings, flags or stones of this path or street supporting the same—which, as I read it, would certainly include the concrete surround and, possibly, adjoining flagstones—in good condition and repair.

To my mind, the only question in this case is what those words "in good condition and repair" are apt to include. Mr. Fisher, in a forcible argument, says that when one is considering the unit, the slab fitting into its concrete surround, one looks at the two together and asks: "Are they in good repair and "condition?" and he says that quite clearly if they are such as to constitute a public nuisance it cannot be said that they are in good condition.

Bearing in mind the obligation which this section is putting upon frontagers and bearing in mind that it is putting the obligation on the frontagers for the benefit of the local authority, I should not be astute to make those words include more than is necessary. It seems to me that if an adjoining frontager can be called upon, and called upon at once under the section, if Mr. Fisher is right, to remedy a nuisance recently created by the local authority, it would be putting an absolutely intolerable burden on the frontager. It seems to me that, using the words in their ordinary sense, one looks at this slab and asks: "Is it "in good condition?" One looks at the surround and the flagstones and asks: "Are they in good condition and repair?" Asking myself those two questions, it seems to me perfectly clear that each of them is in good condition and repair and that what is wrong, if I may use that expression, is the design or lay-out in which they were set when the pavement was reconstructed.

In my view, they were in good condition and repair; accordingly, there was no power or duty on the defendant to abate the nuisance. and the liability for the nuisance would be on the local authority alone. Most unfortunately for the plaintiff in this case, owing to the relevant statute of limitations, it is now too late for her to start proceedings against the local authority and, accordingly, she has, in fact, no remedy. Sorry as I am for her, I am quite clear in this case that there is no liability whatever on the defendant.

C. A. 1955

PENNEY v. BERRY.

JENKINS L.J. I agree and find nothing I can usefully add.

EVERSHED M.R. I also agree. Unfortunately for the plaintiff, events have proved that this stone or grating is, or may be, dangerous. If it is a fact, as it seems it may be, that the plaintiff cannot now sue the local authority, the local authority would, no doubt, consider whether for the future they could not take some steps to put the matter right.

Factory—Dust—Elimination—"All practicable measures"—Duty not absolute—Whether danger one of which employer had or ought reasonably to have had contemporaneous knowledge—Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 47 (1).

The defendants had employed the plaintiff as a moulder in their iron foundry from 1934 to 1951. In January 1951 he was certified as suffering from silicosis, a condition which he had contracted by inhaling silica given off when the loam moulds were fractured. Up to the time when the plaintiff's condition was diagnosed the defendants did not know of the danger of the dust. They had provided throughout the period of the plaintiff's employment the then current safeguards against dust—when there was dust, masks were worn, and when the loam moulds were finally broken moulders were sent out of the shop away from the resulting cloud of dust. On a claim for breach of section 47 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937:—

Held that the duty under section 47 to take "all practicable "measures" to protect persons employed against inhalation of the dust was not absolute; it had been discharged by taking all practicable measures to overcome the dangers of which the defendants had contemporaneous knowledge; and it would be a wrong criterion to attribute retrospectively to the defendants knowledge which at the material times they lacked and could not reasonably have been expected to possess.

GREGSON v. HICK HARGREAVES & Co. LD.

ACTION.

The plaintiff contracted silicosis while employed as a moulder in the defendants' iron foundry. He claimed damages for breaches of sections 4 (1) and 47 (1) [1] of the Factories Act, 1937. The report is confined to the defendants' liability under the latter section.

The facts are fully set out in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 3. DONOVAN J. The plaintiff, who is now 58, was employed by the defendants as a moulder in their iron foundry from 1934 to 1951. In January, 1951, he was medically certified as suffering from pneumoconiosis, and it is now agreed that he was then, and is now, suffering from that species of pneumoconiosis which is called silicosis. It is further agreed that this disability has arisen out of and in the course of his employment by the defendants. The plaintiff was away from his work from January to July, 1951, when he went back to work with the defendants. He was unable, however, to secure his old job as a moulder and is now employed as a storeman. Due to silicosis he is certified as being disabled to the extent of 20 per cent., and is compensated under the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, accordingly. He now claims that this state of affairs has been brought about by the defendants' breach of sections 4 and 47 of the Factories Act, 1937, which deal respectively with ventilation and with measures against dust. No allegation of negligence at common law is now made.

The defendants carry on their iron foundry at Bolton, where large castings are made. The moulds used for the purpose are built up of bricks and loam. Loam is moulding sand mixed with manure and is used wet. It becomes dry and hard when the mould is baked preparatory to casting. During certain of the moulding processes dust is given off. The present case has revealed, it seems for the first time, that dust from loam may contain silica; that is, minute fractured particles of sand floating in the air which, breathed in over a long period, severely damage the lungs. This is what has happened to the plaintiff, and he says the cause of it is that the moulding shop was not adequately ventilated, as section 4 of the Act of 1937 requires; and that all practicable measures to prevent injurious dust being inhaled were not taken, as required by section 47 of the same Act.

Section 4 (1) requires that effective and suitable provision shall be made, first, for securing and maintaining adequate ventilation by the circulation of fresh air in each workroom; and secondly, for rendering harmless, so far as practicable, all fumes, dust and other impurities that may be injurious to health, generated in the course of any process or work in the factory. This latter requirement means that such fumes, dust and other impurities are to be rendered harmless, so far as practicable, by adequate ventilation: see Ebbs v. James Whitson & Co. Ld.[1]

[His Lordship referred to the facts bearing on the question of ventilation, held that the defendants were not in breach of section 4 (1), and continued:] Section 47 of the Act provides: "(1) In every factory in which, in connection with any process "carried on, there is given off any dust or fume or other impurity "of such a character and to such extent as to be likely to be "injurious or offensive to the persons employed, or any sub-"stantial quantity of dust of any kind, all practicable measures "shall be taken to protect the persons employed against inhala-"tion of the dust or fume or other impurity and to prevent its "accumulating in any workroom . . ." The subsection then goes on to deal with the provision of exhaust appliances, but no criticism is made of the absence of such appliances from this moulding shop. They have not been installed in any moulding shop in this country and it is considered by some that it would be quite impracticable to do so.

So far as dust is concerned, the subsection divides it into two categories: first, dust which is likely to be injurious or offensive; secondly, dust of any kind. The obligation to protect workmen against inhalation of dust likely to be injurious or offensive arises if such dust is given off to such an extent as to cause the likelihood of injury or offence to arise. In the case of some such dust, that extent may be small. The obligation to protect workmen against dust of any kind (that is, all dust, whether likely to be injurious or offensive or not) arises when a substantial quantity of dust is given off.

Dealing first with dust likely to be injurious or offensive, it is clear now that during the years the plaintiff was employed such dust was given off in the moulding shop. No one, however, knew it. The danger of silicosis in a moulding shop using ordinary moulding sand is a very recent discovery. The danger of silicosis in a loam moulding shop is revealed for the first time by this case. Up to the time when the plaintiff's complaint was diagnosed the defendants did not know of the danger, and it is not, and could not be, suggested that they ought to have known. Neither they nor anyone else had reason to suspect that loam might give off injurious dust.

What, then, is their position under section 47 (1)? One construction of the section is that knowledge on the part of the employer is immaterial; in fact, the dust was likely to be injurious, whether he knew it or not, and consequently if he took no protective measures he failed in his duty. This was not the construction which commended itself to McNair J. and Singleton L.J. in Ebbs v. James Whitson & Co. Ld.[2] They took the view that an employer could not be expected to take "all "practicable measures" against something of which he was blamelessly ignorant. It would be my duty to follow this construction even if I did not agree with it, but I respectfully do agree with it.

In the present case, therefore, so far as dust, likely to be injurious or offensive, is concerned, the defendants cannot be held to be in breach of section 47 (1), because until after the plaintiff had contracted silicosis they neither knew or ought to have known that such dust was given off by the moulding process which they used.

With regard to the second category of dust dealt with by section 47 (1), namely, "a substantial quantity of dust of any "kind," the position is this: such a quantity of dust is given off in the moulding shop when the following operations are carried on: (i) The removal of certain steel grids embedded in the mould. This takes place after casting and while the mould is still warm. The removal of these grids breaks part of the mould and dust ensues. The heat of the mould causes this dust to rise vertically and most of it escapes through the roof windows. (ii) The breaking down of the mould by manual labour after casting has taken place and the mould is no longer required for similar castings. (iii) The tipping up by a crane of the heavy steel plate on which the mould was originally built up. This is the final stage of the breaking-up operation and it gets rid of the residue of the debris of the mould in one operation, on to what is called a dust ruck. All these operations take place in the moulding shop. The plaintiff contended that another operation, namely, the removal of certain easing bars from the mould after casting, gave rise to substantial quantities of dust, but, in the face of evidence to the contrary given by reliable witnesses for the defendants, I do not find this allegation established. I come to the like conclusion in the case of the very rare operation of making a channel through the mould, which operation was also alleged to create much dust.

The measures which the defendants took to protect workpeople against inhaling the aforesaid dust were these. When the steel grids were being removed from the mould, masks were provided for and were worn by the men doing this job. To these masks a tube some 30 feet long was fitted, and the other end of the tube usually tied to a stanchion some five or six feet from the ground, the idea being that the worker should breathe uncontaminated air. So far as anyone could tell, this was the result. This mask and tube were primarily a protection against fumes which were released when the grid was taken away from the casting, though they served to protect against the inhalation of dust as well. Due to the heat, any one man could work only two minutes or so at this job and would then be relieved by another moulder who would wear the same mask, as a rule, as the man he relieved. While waiting to take their turns, the other moulders would stand around the job, and one of the plaintiff's contentions is that they were not protected at all while so waiting. I am satisfied that no such moulder was ever inconvenienced by dust while so waiting. There were no complaints. The dust, as I say, rose vertically with the heat and the waiting moulders were free to stand where they liked while awaiting their turn at the work of dislodging the grids.

As regards the breaking down of a mould when no longer required, this was done by labourers and not by moulders. The labourers were not made to wear masks, though they were available, nor were the labourers pressed to wear them. If the plaintiff had been a labourer who had had to do this work, different considerations might arise. But as a moulder the plaintiff was 60 to 70 yards from where this process, known as "knocking off," was done and there was nothing to suggest that any dust was reaching him and being inhaled by him.

With regard to the final tipping of the plate, this is the operation which gives off most dust. It takes place about twice a month, and when it was being done the doors were opened and the moulders were sent out of the shop until the resulting cloud of dust—which at times might fill the whole shop for a few moments—had dispersed. It was, whenever possible, done on a Saturday morning, when few moulders were in the shop.

The aforesaid measures appeared to have achieved their object. The plaintiff never complained to the defendants that he was inconvenienced by the dust in any way. Nor did any other moulders. No moulder ever went sick because of dust. No one ever contracted a complaint such as silicosis, giving rise to a suspicion that protection against dust in the foundry was inadequate. All the available evidence indicated the contrary. Here I should say that the plaintiff did allege that the atmosphere in the shop was dusty. "You could see the dust in the sun-"light," he said. This conflicts with the evidence given for the defendants and with my own observation on a sunny day. I cannot find it to be a fact. One other measure taken to keep the atmosphere as clear as possible was to damp the foundry floor at frequent intervals. The plaintiff now says, inter alia, that more masks should have been provided, and more persuasion used to induce him and others to wear them; and that the "knocking off" should have been done outside the shop, though due to its present lay-out, this would have meant reconstructing a substantial part of the works.

Donovan J.

The truth in this unfortunate case is that for almost 70 years everyone thought that the dust had been adequately and effectively got rid of, and the moulders protected against inhalation until this case arose. Then, unhappily, the truth became known that some invisible dust must have remained in the atmosphere and was of such a kind that breathing it over a long period of years, albeit in small quantities, had produced silicosis in the plaintiff.

How, in these circumstances, do the defendants stand under section 47 (1)? Their duty was to "protect the persons em-"ployed against inhalation of the dust." The means which they were to employ to discharge that duty were "all practicable "measures." It is important in this case not to confuse the end with the means, and also to remember that this definition of the means makes the duty less than absolute. All the evidence available at the time, and all the knowledge at the disposal of the defendants indicated that the end had been achieved. No question arose, therefore, as to the adequacy of the means. The duty imposed by the subsection had, by all the indicia available, been discharged. In 1951, however, with the diagnosis of silicosis in the plaintiff, it became apparent for the first time that protection was incomplete. This new knowledge means that further and additional measures of protection must be sought, and all such as are practicable taken. But does it also mean that retrospectively the defendants must be treated as having failed in their duty? I think not. Otherwise the defendants would be penalised for not acting upon knowledge which nobody possessed, or for not being suspicious when there was nothing to arouse suspicion. There is really no criterion which can, in justice, be applied to test this matter except the knowledge which the defendants had at the time, or ought reasonably to have had. If, as I have held, an employer is not blameworthy under the subsection because he does not know that dust injurious in character is given off by some process, and shares this ignorance with the world, should I hold that he is nevertheless blameworthy if judged by all the knowledge available at the time, he had protected his workers against inhalation of dust of any kind? I do not think so; and if that view be right the question whether some other measures were available and practicable does not arise. The end had, to all appearances, been achieved.

For the future, of course, now that the defendants know the facts, the position will be different, and they are in fact actively considering what further measures to take. But in relation to this plaintiff I do not think they have transgressed the provisions of section 47 (1). I have said nothing so far about their duty to prevent dust from accumulating. There must always be some dust somewhere in a foundry, but the evidence does not establish that preventable accumulations of dust were permitted. Had the defendants been in breach of their statutory duty and had to pay compensation as being entirely responsible for the plaintiff's silicosis, I would have awarded him the sum of £1,750 as general damages. In his present condition he has to keep away from dust and avoid colds as far as possible, for his resistance to them is weakened. Otherwise he can work still, though his earning capacity is reduced. He is now earning £2 16s. 8d. a week less than he earned as a moulder, to which occupation he will never return. He suffers from shortage of breath and is now more easily fatigued than normally he would be. As it is, my judgment must be for the defendants.

The Crown, on a claim for damages by the appellants for the loss of their steamship following a collision in February, 1945, with a Canadian ship of war, for which the latter was alone held to blame, was not entitled to limit its liability under the provisions of section 649 of the Canada Shipping Act, 1934, for there was nothing to prevent full effect being given to section 712 of the Act, which stated that the Act "shall not, except where "specially provided, apply to ships belonging to His Majesty." confer a benefit on, the Crown, and the Act contained no such specific provision. There was no sufficient justification for saying that, because the Exchequer Court in the exercise of its jurisdiction under section 19 (c) of the Exchequer Court Act (R.S.C. 1927, c. 34) as amended in 1938, applied to proceedings between subject and Crown the law which it applied between subject and subject, therefore it should apply even that law which by the terms of the statute enacting it was expressly excluded from application to the Crown.

The provision in section 16 of the Interpretation Act (R.S.C., 1927, c. 1) that "No provision or enactment in any Act shall affect, "in any manner whatsoever, the rights of Her Majesty . . . unless "it is expressly stated therein that Her Majesty shall be bound "thereby," appears to have no relevance to a statute which expressly enacted, as did the Act of 1934, how far the rights of the Crown should be affected.

Judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada [1953] 1 S.C.R. 480 reversed.

APPEAL (No. 30 of 1954), by special leave, from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada (April 28, 1953), affirming in part and reversing in part a judgment of the Exchequer Court of Canada (July 20, 1951).

The following introductory statement is taken from the judgment of the Judicial Committee: On February 13, 1945, there was a collision between H.M.C.S. Orkney and the S.S. Blairnevis, a vessel owned by the appellant company, Nisbet Shipping Co. Ld. On July 20, 1951, it was decided by Thorson J., sitting as President of the Exchequer Court of Canada, that Orkney was alone to blame for the collision and that the respondent was not entitled to limit liability under the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act, 1934. The latter part of that decision was on April 28, 1953, reversed by the Supreme Court of Canada (Rinfret C.J., Kerwin, Rand, Kellock, Estey and Cartwright JJ., dissentiente Locke J.), which held that the Crown was entitled to avail itself of section 649 of that Act. Against that decision the appellant company now appealed and the single question was whether the Crown was or was not entitled to claim the benefit of the provisions of that section.

Under the law of Canada limitation of liability for damages caused by the improper navigation of a ship rested for the purpose of this case solely on section 649, the relevant words of which were: "(1) The owners of a ship, whether registered in Canada or "not, shall not, in cases where all or any of the following events "occur without their actual fault or privity, that is to say— . . . "(iv) where any loss or damage is, by reason of the improper "navigation of the ship, caused to any other vessel, or to any "goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any "other vessel be liable to damages . . . to an aggregate amount "exceeding 38 dollars and 92 cents for each ton of the ship's "tonnage."

Section 712 provided that "This Act shall not, except where "specially provided, apply to ships belonging to His Majesty."

July 25. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by VISCOUNT SIMONDS, who stated the facts set out above, and continued: This appeal raises a question of very great difficulty. It may well be (their Lordships do not think it necessary to determine this question) that, apart from section 712, the Crown could under the circumstances of the present case claim the benefit of section 649 and limit its liability accordingly. But section 712 provides that "This Act shall not, except where "specially provided, apply to ships belonging to His Majesty." Upon this section the appellant company relies, contending that the Act contains no special provision conferring upon the Crown the benefit of section 649 and that, accordingly, that section does not apply in respect of ships belonging to Her Majesty, and the Crown cannot limit its liability under it.

It is difficult to think of words more wide and comprehensive than those of section 712, the phrase "except where specially "provided" emphasizing that no implication without express words would suffice to bind the Crown or presumably to confer a benefit upon the Crown. But this difficulty has been met in two ways by the respondent. It has been urged in the first place that as a matter of construction the section does not apply to Her Majesty as the owner of a ship but only to the ships themselves. This appears to have been the contention urged before Thorson J., and was by no means abandoned before their Lordships. But it was urged in the second place—and this is the argument which prevailed with the Supreme Court—that section 712 was in effect irrelevant to a claim by the Crown to avail itself of the provisions of section 649. This contention can only be understood against the background of the history of the Crown's liability for the tortious acts of its servants and specifically of its liability in respect of damage caused by the improper navigation of a ship.

Before 1887 in Canada, as in England, the doctrine respondeat superior did not apply to the Crown, which was therefore not liable for the tortious acts of its servants.

In that year it was enacted by section 16 of the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act, 1887, that the Exchequer Court should have exclusive original jurisdiction to hear and determine amongst other matters "(c) every claim against the Crown arising out of "any death or injury to the person or to property on any public "work, resulting from the negligence of any officer or servant of "the Crown, while acting within the scope of his duties or "employment." This section has from time to time been amended in such manner as to enlarge the jurisdiction of the court, and paragraph (c) now reads "every claim against the "Crown arising out of any death or injury to the person or to "property resulting from the negligence of any officer or servant "of the Crown while acting within the scope of his duties or "employment." It is not questioned that these are apt words to give the court jurisdiction in the present case. It must, however, be noted that it was only by an amendment made in 1938, that is, after the Canadian Shipping Act, 1934, that such jurisdiction was given.

The Exchequer Court Act both in its original and amended form purported only to confer jurisdiction, but by a series of decisions, the authority of which cannot be questioned, it has been held that it not only conferred jurisdiction on the court but also imposed liability on the Crown: see, for instance, City of Quebec v. The Queen[1]; Filion v. The Queen[2]; Rex v. Armstrong[3]; Gauthier v. The King.[4] The question, then, is what is the measure of the liability which is not defined by the Act but is to be inferred from the creation of jurisdiction. It is not in dispute that at least those circumstances which give rise to a claim between subject and subject will support a claim by a subject against the Crown. From this it is an easy step to say that a subject is not entitled to any greater relief against the Crown than he would be against a fellow subject, and this is supported by reference to section 8 of the Petition of Right Act (R.S.C. 1927, c. 158) which provides that the statement of defence or demurrer to a petition of right may raise, besides any legal or equitable defences in fact or in law available under that Act, any legal or equitable defences which would have been available if the proceeding had been a suit or action in a competent court between subject and subject. Nor can it be ignored that, though the right to limit liability for damage is not part of the common law but in England and Canada alike is the creature of statute, it is a right almost universally established in the law of nations and of considerable antiquity. It would therefore be easily assumed that the Crown, assenting to the imposition of a new liability, would secure for itself the advantage at least of limiting it in a manner so generally conceded. This view is thus cogently stated by Rand J.[5]: "Where liability, then, on the same footing "as that of a subject, is established, giving a right to damages, "I can think of no more appropriate enactment to which that "basic rule of the prerogative could be applied than to a statutory "limitation of those damages." The basic rule to which the judge refers is that under which it is said that the Sovereign may avail himself of the provisions of any Act of Parliament.

These are the considerations which prevailed with the judges of the Supreme Court, with the exception of Locke J., with whose judgment their Lordships find themselves in agreement. They are weighty considerations but, as it appears to their Lordships, they do not explain why full effect should not be given to section 712. It is true that in 1934 that section, which was itself a re-enactment of section 741 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, could have no operation in regard to any liability of the Crown, for it was only in 1938 that any relevant liability was imposed on the Crown. It does not, however, follow that, when that liability is imposed, as it is by the amending Act of 1938, the provisions of section 712 can be ignored. In the United Kingdom the same problem arose when under the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, the Crown was for the first time made liable for the tortious acts of its servants, and it was by that Act specifically enacted that the sections of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, should apply to limit the liability of the Crown. And in Canada similar provision is now made by the Crown Liability Act, 1953.[6] It may be said that this latter Act can be regarded as having been passed ex majore cautela and it certainly cannot be treated as decisive of the meaning and scope of section 712 of the Canadian Shipping Act, 1934. But it is precisely the provision which, if the liability of the Crown had been established before 1934, would have been appropriately inserted in the Act of that year as a special provision excluding the operation of section 712, and the fact that it was not so inserted because the necessity for it was not then foreseen cannot deprive section 712 of any part of its meaning and effect. The right to limit liability is, as has already been said, derived solely from a section of an Act which unequivocally enacts that the Act shall not apply, except where specially provided, to ships of His Majesty. Where, then, can the Crown find that right? It appears to their Lordships that there is no sufficient justification for saying that, because the Exchequer Court in the exercise of its jurisdiction applies to proceedings between subject and Crown the law which it applies between subject and subject, therefore it should apply even that law which by the terms of the statute enacting it is expressly excluded from application to the Crown.

Upon this part of the case a final argument was based on section 16 of the Interpretation Act (R.S.C., 1927, c. 1), which enacts that no provision or enactment in any Act affects in any manner whatsoever the rights of Her Majesty, her heirs or successors, unless it is expressly stated therein that Her Majesty is bound thereby. This provision, however, appears to have no relevance to a statute which expressly enacts, as the Act of 1934 does, how far the rights of the Crown shall be affected. In section 712 the relevant word is "apply," which appears adequately to cover any provision whether it creates an obligation or confers a benefit.

Their Lordships have so far proceeded upon the footing that Thorson J. was right in rejecting the argument that a distinction can be drawn between the words in section 712 "ships belonging "to His Majesty" and such words as "His Majesty" simpliciter. In their Lordships' opinion the judge took the correct view. An attempt was made at the bar to indicate those sections to which, if the distinction was valid, section 712 applied and those to which it did not. It soon appeared that the task was an impossible one. Nor, if such a distinction is made, does it appear at all clear why any part of Part XII of the Act, which is headed "Navigation—Collisions—Limitation of Liability," should not be properly described as provisions relating to ships belonging to His Majesty. In their Lordships' opinion this argument of the respondent also fails.

In the result, their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that this appeal should be allowed, the judgment of the Supreme Court set aside and that of Thorson J. restored. The respondent must pay the costs of the appellant of this appeal and in the Supreme Court of Canada.

Charity—Public—Bequest "to the bishop for the time being of the "diocese of the Windward Islands"—"To be used by him as he "thinks fit in his diocese"—Whether valid charitable trust. Will—Construction.

A testator gave part of the residue of his estate "to the bishop "for the time being of the diocese of the Windward Islands to be "used by him as he thinks fit in his diocese":—

Held, (1) that the gift was to the person for the time being holding the office of bishop of the named diocese by virtue of that office and was not a gift beneficially to the individual happening to hold that office at the date of the testator's death, and that, accordingly, the bishop for the time being took as a trustee.

(2) That the words following the description of the donee conferred a discretion on him limited by the charitable character of his office; the donor had not attempted to indicate or define the trusts on which the donee was to hold the property, and the final words "in his diocese" were only an expression of that which would have been implied; and that, accordingly, the gift constituted a valid charitable trust.

Decision of Danckwerts J. affirmed.

APPEAL from Danckwerts J.

By his will dated September 23, 1949, Arthur Milton Rumball, who died on October 3, 1953, disposed of his residuary estate as follows: "Upon trust to divide the same into two equal parts "and to pay one of such parts to the guardians of the shrine of "Our Lady of Walsingham at Walsingham for the purposes of "their order and to pay the other part to the bishop for the time "being of the diocese of the Windward Islands to be used by "him as he thinks fit in his diocese."

By a proviso the testator declared that the gift to the guardians of the shrine at Walsingham was conditional upon his having been elected a guardian at the time of his death and that if not so elected he bequeathed to the guardians in lieu of that gift £100 free of duty and the whole of the residue to the "bishop "for the time being of the diocese of the Windward Islands to "be used by him as aforesaid."

A summons was taken out by the trustees of the will (and of a codicil dated February 14, 1953) to ascertain, inter alia, whether the gift in favour of the Bishop of the Windward Islands was apt to create a valid charitable trust.

" the diocese as he may choose "—Harman J., expressing himself as not willing to add to the fineness of the distinctions already made, held the gift to be bad.

In this notoriously difficult field some degree of fineness of distinction is, I think, inevitable. Where the question is that of the application of principles never finally stated and perhaps undefinable, which the courts have evolved from the examples given in the preamble to the Statute of Elizabeth, to an infinite variety of forms of gift, it is inevitable that some cases will be found very near the line on one side or the other. It may, therefore, be unprofitable to lament the facts of legal experience in this class of case. Nevertheless, I think it possible to derive from an analysis of the cases the essential characteristics of those principles, so far as they are relevant, with sufficient clarity to enable the court to determine on which side of the line the present case lies; and, although I have myself been conscious of changes of view during the argument, I have in the end, and particularly after hearing the argument of Mr. Buckley, to whom I would like to acknowledge my indebtedness, come to the conclusion that Danckwerts J. was right and that the present disposition does constitute a valid charitable trust.

I begin with the language of Lord Parker in Bowman v. Secular Society[7]: " the circumstances of the gift or the direc- " tions given or the objects expressed by the donor may be such " as to impose on the donee the character of a trustee." So, a gift to a person holding a particular office, such as that of vicar of a parish or bishop of a diocese or master of a school, may, and frequently in its context will, be held to impose on the donee the character of a trustee.

The matter was recently expressed thus by my brother Jenkins in In re Spensley's Will Trusts,[8] the most recent of the reported cases: " It will be seen that inevitably those two principles must " be liable to produce fine distinctions in particular cases, and it " may often be hard to decide on which side of the line a given " case falls. Is it a gift to a holder of an office of a charitable " character virtute officii, with merely superadded words confer- " ring wide powers of disposition? If so, on the principle followed " in In re Flinn,[9] the gift will prima facie be charitable by virtue " of the charitable character of the office. On the other hand, " is it a gift to a trustee bearing a charitable character or holding " a charitable office upon trusts which according to their terms " are not, or are not exclusively or necessarily, of a charitable " nature? If so, then the scope of the trust is not to be limited " by reference to the character of the trustee."

In the present case it was not contended otherwise than that the gift to the Bishop of the Windward Islands was intended to be a gift to him virtute officii and to impose upon him accordingly, the character of a trustee; and, if the gift had stopped after the words "Windward Islands," so as not to include the final words in the clause, "to be used by him as he thinks fit in his diocese," the trusts would have been those exclusively appropriate to the office which he held. In this case, therefore, and in the other examples I have given, the trusts would accordingly, I apprehend, have been charitable trusts. If, therefore, in a gift of this character, there are no words added to the gift to the donee described by reference to his office, the trust would (where an intention not to make a gift to the donee for his own personal benefit is established) be implied by the law. The difficulties appear almost always to have arisen from general words which follow the gift, which may be words either of limitation or expansion.

The argument before us has been illustrated by a numerous list of reported cases, starting with In re Garrard [10] and ending with In re Spensley's Will Trusts,[11] to both of which I have referred; and in the future the present case may well make another link in the chain. I do not propose to travel through the cases again. The examples that I have given from them sufficiently, I think, illustrate the arguments and my judgment.

The conclusion that Mr. Russell and Mr. Warren, from their analysis of the cases and their explanation of the distinctions, seek to apply to this case is as follows. Once, they say, it is seen that the circumstances or context of the gift are such as to impose the character of a trustee upon the donee and that the trusts on which the donee holds are exclusively those properly belonging to or relating to his office, then it must follow that, if the words which follow the gift are general and unqualified—"for such purposes as he shall in his absolute discretion think "fit," and the like—the trusts must still be limited to the scope of the office held; for otherwise the gift would inevitably become repugnant in itself. The general words, that is, cannot be construed literally, because they would (if so construed) allow beneficial enjoyment by the donee, which, ex concessis, is already negatived; and the only other possible way to construe the words is to limit their significance by reference to the office of the donee. On the other hand (they say), when the words following the gift are not general and wholly unqualified, the antinomy, or, as they express it, the dilemma, is no longer presented. The presence of the limitation or qualification of itself negatives the unlimited discretion which would create the conflict with the donee's character as a trustee. It becomes, then, necessary to see, in such a case as the present, whether the words following the gift, not being entirely general, are, upon ordinary principles of construction, such as to comprehend non-charitable as well as charitable objects.

The argument has great force and cogency and, if it is correct, it is obviously fatal to the validity in the present case of the gift in favour of the Bishop of the Windward Islands: for clearly the uses to which the bishop might, as a trustee, seek to apply the fund within the confines of his diocese would not be all charitable purposes. But on the whole, as I have already indicated, I prefer the explanation put forward by Mr. Nesbitt and Mr. Buckley. According to their argument, the true analysis of the cases is to this effect. The question is, upon the construction of the language used, whether the words following the gift are intended merely to indicate that, within the scope of the trusts properly appropriate to the nature of the office by which the donee is described, the discretion is entirely the donee's; or whether, by the added words, the donor is himself intending to state, or at least to indicate, the trusts upon which the donee is to hold the property. If the latter is the true interpretation then the further question of construction arises whether the trusts so indicated or stated comprehend non-charitable objects. But where the words following the gift to the donee are absolutely general, the first is the right inference to be drawn: that is, that the words are intended merely to indicate that, within the scope of the trusts already implicit in the gift, the discretion is the donee's; for otherwise the added words would permit the beneficial enjoyment by the donee of the fund disposed of.

The two arguments do not widely diverge but the difference between them, as will be seen, is vital in certain characteristics, and sufficient, in my judgment, to determine the present case. For, according to Mr. Nesbitt and Mr. Buckley, in cases like Farley v. Westminster Bank [12] and Dunne v. Byrne,[13] the language, from the point of view of validity as a charity, was such that the testator had not been content to leave the trusts as those implicit in the office of the donee, but had himself indicated the scope of the trusts—although he did so in the broadest possible sense and in such a way that within the general bounds of those trusts the discretion should be that of the donee.

For my part, I think this argument is the sounder. I come to that conclusion for two reasons. In the first place, I think that the argument more truly accords with the principle of the decision in Farley's case,[14] which was, as I have already mentioned, a case decided by the House of Lords. In Mr. Russell's and Mr. Warren's formulation, a qualification inserted in, or an addition made to, the words which follow the gift itself would (prima facie at least) be fatal, though, on the face of those words, they amounted to no more than a limitation. Such, indeed, is the present case, where the words of qualification added to the more general formula are "in his diocese," and are, therefore, as a matter of construction, merely effective to limit the operation of the trusts to the diocese as distinct from the whole of the world.

It seems, therefore, that the rule as worked out by Mr. Russell and Mr. Warren would be an automatic rule of thumb, so that any qualification of any kind would always be fatal to the validity of a gift of this kind as a charitable discretion. On the other hand, upon the view submitted by Mr. Nesbitt and Mr. Buckley, the real vice of any qualification or particularization, when added to the general formula, is that, on its true construction, it operates not as a limitation, but as an extension or expansion of what otherwise would be the scope of the trusts.

If Farley v. Westminster Bank [15] is taken as an example, the words which were there added by way of what I have called qualification were "for parish work." In this court, to take the language of Farwell J.,[16] those words "parish work" were construed as meaning "that which is sometimes compendiously "called 'good works' in the particular parish; that is to say, "the various activities which the vicar and churchwardens "promote and carry on in the parish for the good of the "parishioners not only for their religious good but for their good "generally, some of which, although benevolent, are not charit-"able in the strict sense of the word." In the House of Lords the matter was thus expressed by Lord Russell of Killowen, where, after stating the argument that the words "for parish "work" were limited to the work which the vicar and churchwardens were strictly appointed to perform (namely, the religious purposes of the parish), he said [17]: "For myself, I am unable "to put so narrow a construction upon the words . . . In my "opinion, upon the true construction of this will, the words in "brackets mean that the gift is not a gift for ecclesiastical or "religious purposes in the strict sense, but is a gift for the "assistance and furtherance of those various activities connected "with the parish church which are to be found, I believe, in "every parish, but which, unfortunately for the donees here, "include many objects which are not in any way charitable in "the legal sense of that word."

By making that addition of "for parish work," therefore, the testator was indicating that the trusts upon which the vicar and churchwardens should hold the fund were those expressed by Farwell J. and Lord Russell, and the vice of them was, as I have said, that they had enlarged what would otherwise have been implicit from the nature of the office of the donee, so as to comprehend non-charitable as well as charitable purposes. Lord Atkin stated that conclusion quite plainly [18]: "I am entirely "unable to accept that construction"; that is, the construction put forward by the respondents. "I think the words are quite "plainly enlarging words. They are words of definition, it is "quite true, but I think they were used for the very purpose of

" defining what the testatrix meant as the purpose for which the " money was to be applied."

There is, however, a further, and second, reason which seems to me also to support the view of Mr. Nesbitt and Mr. Buckley. If Mr. Russell and Mr. Warren are right, the result would appear to me, as I have already indicated, to be to bring into existence what I have ventured to call a rule of thumb method of determining this class of case; and prima facie I am disposed to reject, in a matter which in the end rests upon the construction of particular documents, anything in the nature of a rule of thumb method, and more particularly when its application would appear to offend against the plain logic and common sense of the matter. That such would be the effect of the rule I attempted to illustrate during the course of the argument by an example given, which, as Mr. Russell pointed out was not, as I presented it, appropriate, but which, as amended, is, I think, appropriate and illustrates the point I am seeking to make. I take the language in In re Flinn,[19] which was held to be a good gift, namely, to " the " Archbishop of Westminster . . . to be used by him for such " purposes as he shall in his absolute discretion think fit." Let it then be supposed that there were added to those words " other " than for the repair of the cathedral." The words I have added are not such as to imply that the earlier general formula included personal enjoyment by the archbishop or included purposes which were not charitable. The effect, on the face of the words, is merely to limit the general purposes to which the archbishop, in the exercise of his official calling, could apply the fund, and to limit them by the exclusion of one purpose only, namely, the repair of the cathedral. Yet, as I follow the argument of Mr. Russell and Mr. Warren, the addition of those words " other than " the repair of the cathedral " would render the gift inevitably and automatically invalid. It seems to me, on the other hand, that if the test of Mr. Buckley and Mr. Nesbitt's analysis is applied, the effect is that which it appears to be—namely, to exclude one, and one only, of the trusts implicit in the office of the archbishop, but not so as to substitute for those trusts some new and different trusts which the testator himself lays down or defines.

I must not be taken to be saying that the analysis which has been put before us is necessarily applicable in every case of this broad kind when the charitable or non-charitable character of a gift has to be determined. As I said a moment ago, all these questions in the end turn upon the construction and effect of the particular words used. But in the class of case in what I may call the In re Garrard [20] to In re Spensley's Will Trusts [21] category I think that the analysis points the way to the correct conclusion.

In the course of the argument we were referred to a New South Wales case of In re MacGregor,[22] where the essential words were "for diocesan purposes generally"; and Long Innes J. there held that that was a valid charitable gift. I do not, for my part, think that it much assists us in the present case, because the phrase "for diocesan purposes" was held by the judge, upon the evidence before him, to mean exclusively ecclesiastical purposes. What seemed from the report more striking was the reference in the argument before the judge in Sydney to a case which had been decided by Parker J., in 1911, In re Van Wart.[23] The official number of that case is 1910 V. 823. According to the reference, it appeared that Parker J. had required, in making his order, an undertaking on the part of the then cardinal archbishop that the property would, in his hands, be used by him "for diocesan purposes"; and it seemed that, if that were so, at any rate Parker J. also thought that "diocesan purposes" as such were exclusively ecclesiastical and, therefore, charitable.

In the circumstances, I thought it proper to send for the order from the public records office, and, in case this matter should come again before the courts, it may be useful if I state what in fact was the order, as it appears from the record. After a statement of the evidence which had been read, the order proceeded: "And the defendants, the Most Reverend Francis Bourne, "Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster, and the Very "Reverend Patrick Cooney, the Provincial of the Order of the "Friars Minor of St. Francis, by their counsel stating that they "respectively intend and hereby undertake to apply the gifts or "bequests of the third parts of the said testatrix's residuary "estate bequeathed to each of them respectively by the said will "for the purposes therein expressed, and the defendant His "Majesty's Attorney-General by his counsel expressing himself "satisfied with the said undertakings, this court doth declare "that upon the true construction of the said will the plaintiffs "ought to pay one-third part of the residuary estate of the said "testatrix to each of the defendants the Most Reverend Francis "Bourne and the Very Reverend Patrick Cooney on their sole "receipts and that the gift of the remaining one-third part "of the said residuary estate which became operative by virtue "of the said codicil is given to the defendants the Most Reverend "Francis Bourne and the Very Reverend Patrick Cooney in equal "shares for their own respective use and benefit free from any "trust and doth direct the same to be paid to them accordingly."

It will be seen, therefore, that, on the face of the order, it looks as though the view taken by Parker J. was that there was, as far as the relevant shares of residue were concerned, no effective trust at all; but that the bishop and his co-defendant in fact undertook to apply the funds according to the trusts or purposes declared by the testator and that that undertaking satisfied the Attorney-General. The order went accordingly. The case quite obviously does not, therefore, give any assistance in the present case, save to the extremely limited extent that, if the purposes expressed by the will were described, or to the extent to which they were described, as " diocesan purposes " it might lend some slight support to the view that diocesan purposes were exclusively ecclesiastical; but beyond that, I think the case carries us no further.

[23] The Times, Feb. 17, 1911. The words used were "in trust . . . for "the Archbishop of Westminster for "the time being absolutely, and I "desire that he will employ . . . a "half . . . of such bequest for the "completion of the cathedral . . . and "the remainder in any way he likes "for other parochial purposes of his "diocese of Westminster."

My last word shall be about In re Beddy,[24] the case before Harman J., to which I earlier alluded. Having regard to the view which I reach in the present case, the question may be asked whether I am also of opinion that Harman J.'s decision ought not to be supported. In my view, it is unnecessary to express any conclusion upon that matter. The words are, I think, materially different. In this case the words are " to be used by him as he " shall think fit in his diocese ": in In re Beddy [24] the words were " to use for such purposes in the diocese as he may choose." These matters always being questions of construction, it might, I say no more, well be that the correct answer to In re Beddy [24] was that the words " for such purposes in the diocese as he may " choose " are substantially the same as, or at any rate not materially different from, the words in Dunne v. Byrne,[25] namely, for such purposes as the archbishop " shall judge most conducive " to the good of religion in the diocese." If that is so then, although the distinction is no doubt a fine one, it would follow that In re Beddy [26] was rightly decided, and that the decision of Danckwerts J. in the present case to the contrary effect involves no inconsistency with Harman J.'s decision.

However that may be, for the reasons which I have stated, I have come, on the whole, to the same conclusion as that reached by Danckwerts J., and I think, therefore, that this part of the appeal should be dismissed.

JENKINS L.J. The question we now have to decide is whether, as Danckwerts J. has held, the gift of residue to " the bishop for " the time being of the diocese of the Windward Islands to be " used by him as he thinks fit in his diocese " is a valid charitable gift.

It is not, and could not well be, disputed that the gift is to the person for the time being holding the office of bishop of the diocese named virtute officii, and not a gift beneficially to the individual happening to hold that office at the date of the testator's death.

Accordingly, it is not open to doubt that the bishop for the time being takes as a trustee and that, if the gift had been to the bishop for the time being of the diocese named simpliciter, without the addition of the words " to be used by him as he "thinks fit in his diocese," it would have operated as a gift to the bishop for the time being on a charitable trust for ecclesiastical purposes. See, for instance, Thornber v. Wilson[27] and In re Delany.[28]

It follows that the gift in question is a valid charitable gift unless the addition of the words "to be used by him as he thinks "fit in his diocese" has the effect of converting what would otherwise be a valid charitable trust into a trust capable of including objects which are not charitable and, therefore, void for uncertainty.

Cases concerning gifts of this type have been only too often before the courts. The authorities were discussed in some detail in In re Flinn,[29] and their effect has been recently summarized by this court in In re Spensley's Will Trusts.[30] I, therefore, find it unnecessary to go into them all again. I think the principles to be applied are sufficiently stated in the following passages from my own judgment in In re Spensley's Will Trusts.[31]

I said[32]: "Vaisey J. founded himself on the principle "deducible from the cases summarized and followed in In re "Flinn.[33] I find it unnecessary to review those authorities at "length, because Mr. Warren, in the course of his argument on "behalf of residue, stated the principle deducible from them in "terms which, if I may say so, appear to me to be wholly "adequate, and from which Mr. Buckley, for the Attorney-"General, did not dissent. The principle deducible from those "authorities was thus stated by Mr. Warren: 'Where there is a "'gift to a person who holds an office the duties of which are in "'their nature wholly charitable and the gift is made to him "'in his official name and by virtue of his office, then, if the "'purposes are not expressed in the gift itself, the gift is assumed "'to be for the charitable purposes inherent in the office.'

"On the other hand, it is necessary also to bear in mind the "principle stated in such cases as Dunne v. Byrne[34] and In re "Davidson.[35] The principle deducible from those cases is of this "nature—to contrast it with the principle deducible from In re "Flinn[36] and the cases there followed it can appropriately be "introduced with a 'but'—'but where the purposes of a gift "'are plainly expressed in terms not confining them to purposes "'which are in the legal sense charitable, they cannot be confined "'to charitable purposes merely by reference to the character "'of the trustee. . . .' It will be seen that inevitably those "two principles must be liable to produce fine distinctions in "particular cases, and it may often be hard to decide on which "side of the line a given case falls. Is it a gift to a holder of an " office of a charitable character virtute officii, with merely super-" added words conferring wide powers of disposition? If so, on " the principle followed in In re Flinn,[36] the gift will prima facie " be charitable by virtue of the charitable character of the office.

" On the other hand, is it a gift to a trustee bearing a charitable " character or holding a charitable office upon trusts which
" according to their terms are not, or are not exclusively or " necessarily, of a charitable nature? If so, then the scope of " the trust is not to be limited by reference to the character of
" the trustee."

The question in the present case, therefore, is whether the words " to be used by him as he thinks fit in his diocese " are merely superadded words conferring wide powers of disposition, or are words imposing trusts which according to their terms are not, or are not exclusively or necessarily, of a charitable nature. In other words, has the testator here left the purposes of the gift to be implied from the charitable character of the bishop's office, and merely added a provision to the effect that the bishop is to have full discretion in the application of the fund for those purposes, or has he defined the trusts on which the property is to be held in terms capable of including objects which are not charitable?

In my judgment, it is reasonably plain that this question should be answered in the former sense. The testator has not defined the trusts on which the fund is to be held. He has merely given the bishop for the time being an absolute discretion as to its application by the words " to be used as he thinks fit " and limited that discretion to the use of the fund in the area under the bishop's ecclesiastical charge by the final words " in " his diocese."

Were it not for those final words, the gift in the present case would not be distinguishable in any material respect from the gift upheld in In re Garrard,[37] and would even more closely resemble the gift upheld in In re Flinn,[38] which was in these terms: " To His Eminence the Archbishop of Westminster " Cathedral London for the time being I bequeath all the rest, " residue and remainder of my property of every nature and " kind . . . to be used by him for such purposes as he shall in " his absolute discretion think fit."

We were not invited, even if it were open to us to do so, to hold that In re Garrard[39] and In re Flinn[40] were wrongly decided. The burden of the argument for the next-of-kin was to the effect that the presence here of the words " in his diocese " sufficed to distinguish this case from those, and to bring it within the principle of Dunne v. Byrne.[41] So to hold would, to my mind, be carrying refinement of distinction too far. In In re Garrard[42] the gift was to the vicar and churchwardens for the time being of a specified parish "to be applied by them in such "manner as they shall in their sole discretion think fit," and Joyce J., after observing that a legacy to the vicar and churchwardens for the time being of a parish, without more, is a gift or charitable legacy to them for ecclesiastical purpose in the parish, went on to say [43] that to his mind, "The words 'to be "'applied by them in such manner as they shall in their sole "'discretion think fit,'" merely directed that the particular mode of application within the charitable purposes of the legacy was to be settled by those individuals.

If the charitable purposes to be implied from a gift to the vicar and churchwardens for the time being of a parish, without more, are ecclesiastical purposes in the parish, and the words "to be applied by them in such manner as they shall in their "sole discretion think fit" merely indicate that those individuals are to settle the particular mode of application within the charitable purposes of the legacy (that is to say, "ecclesiastical "purposes in the parish"), I fail to see how the express addition of the words "in the parish" (which, if not expressed, would have been implied from a gift to the vicar and churchwardens for the time being simpliciter) could reasonably be held to alter the result.

So in this case a gift to the bishop for the time being of the diocese of the Windward Islands, without more, would have been a charitable legacy to him for ecclesiastical purposes in his diocese. The words "to be used by him as he thinks fit" merely direct that he is to settle the particular mode of application within the charitable purposes of the legacy (that is to say, ecclesiastical purposes in his diocese); and the addition of the words "in his "diocese" is no more than an expression of that which, if not expressed, would have been implied.

Accordingly, I regard this case as indistinguishable from In re Garrard [44] and In re Flinn. [45] It follows that, in my opinion, In re Beddy, [46] where a gift "to the Roman Catholic prelate who "shall be Archbishop of Westminster at the time of my death "to use for such purposes in the diocese as he may choose" was held to be distinguishable from In re Flinn [47] and void for uncertainty on the principle of Dunne v. Byrne [48] and In re Davidson, [49] cannot be supported so far as it is to be regarded as turning merely on the presence of the words "in the diocese." I express myself in that way because I prefer to reserve my opinion on the question whether the form of words used in In re Beddy, [50] taken as a whole, may not provide a valid ground for distinguishing it from the present case.

*RICHARDS v. HIGHWAY IRONFOUNDERS (WEST BROMWICH) LD.

[R. No. 114.]

Factory — Dust — Elimination — "All practicable measures" — Substantial quantity of dust—No masks or exhaust appliances provided —Dust not known to be injurious until 1950*—Silicosis contracted by workman—Whether all practicable measures taken by employers —Factories Act,* 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 47 (1).

Damages — Personal injuries — Life shortened — Loss of prospects of making provision for family.

From 1930 until 1952 the plaintiff was employed by the defendant company as an iron moulder, working with other men in one workroom. The last process in the moulding, known as "knocking "out," was carried out on the floor of the workroom and resulted in the emission of clouds of dust. About one half of each working shift was occupied by the process of knocking out, conducted by one or other of the men in the workroom, so that the plaintiff was exposed not only to the dust from his own operations but also from that of his fellow workmen. In 1946 the plaintiff became seriously affected with silicosis, and subsequently became dangerously and incurably ill as a result of his work, and lost the prospect of living the normal span of his life. He left the defendants' employment in 1952.

The defendants had not provided their workmen with masks, nor had they provided any exhaust appliances. It was not until 1950 that it became known that dust of the kind in question was liable to cause silicosis. During the relevant period there were a number of types of mask on the market to protect workers against the inhalation of dust, but only the one, known as mark IV, would have been effective against the dust in question.

On a claim by the plaintiff for breach of section 47 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, Devlin J. held that the supply of mark IV masks was a practicable measure which should have been taken, and he awarded to the plaintiff £9,645 6s. 5d. Of that sum £7,000 was in respect of loss of earning capacity and £1,000 was in respect of the plaintiff's loss of the prospect of making some provision for his wife and dependents by reason of his shortened expectation of life:—

Held, (1) that having regard to the then state of knowledge the dust was not dust "injurious to persons employed" within the first branch of section 47 (1), since it could not be fairly regarded as likely to cause silicosis, but that, on the other hand, the dust was emitted in substantial quantities so as to fall within the second branch of the section.

(2) That the question whether the defendants had taken all "practicable measures" to protect persons employed against inhalation of the dust must be judged in the light of the state of the relevant knowledge at the date of the alleged breach of the statutory duty.

(3) That the requirement of the provision of "exhaust appliances" in section 47 (1) was directed to the case where the dust or fume was emitted at some fixed point or points on a machine and was inapplicable to a case where there were no points which could be said to be the origin of the dust; and that the plaintiff had failed to establish any breach on the defendants' part of failure to provide exhaust appliances.

(4) That in the absence of any finding whether, when the mark IV mask became available ten years after the plaintiff had entered the defendants' employ, its use for the period during which it could be worn would have been effective, and of any finding whether its absence did more than aggravate a disease which had already been contracted, the case should be remitted for retrial upon the question whether the defendants had failed to comply with the statutory obligation under section 47 by the omission to supply masks and, if so, to what extent the damage which the plaintiff had suffered was properly attributable thereto, including the question whether, in the event, the absence of masks merely aggravated rather than caused the injury.

(5) That the sum of £1,000 damages for loss of prospects of making provision for the plaintiff's dependants should not have been included in the damages awarded.

Harris v. Brights Asphalt Contractors Ld. [1953] 1 Q.B. 617; [1953] 1 W.L.R. 341; [1953] 1 All E.R. 345 considered.

Decision of Devlin J. reversed.

APPEAL from Devlin J.

The plaintiff, Walter Richards, claimed damages for injury to his health, namely, silicosis, caused by the breach of statutory duty or the negligence of the defendants. The plaintiff did not proceed with his claim based on negligence. The breach of statutory duty alleged by the plaintiff was that the defendants had failed to take all practicable measures to protect him against the inhalation of the dust or to prevent its accumulation in the factory premises in accordance with the provisions of section 47 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937.[1]

Devlin J., finding for the plaintiff, held that the provision of mark IV masks was a practicable measure which the defendants ought to have taken and awarded to the plaintiff £9,645 6s. 5d. damages made up as follows: £1,645 special damages, £200 for loss of expectation of life, £7,000 for loss of earning capacity during the remainder of his life (subject to a deduction), and the balance of £1,000 in respect of the loss of the plaintiff's prospects, during the period in which his life had been cut short, of making provision for his wife and other dependants.

The facts are fully set out in the judgment of Evershed M.R.

The defendants appealed.

F. W. Beney Q.C. and Patrick O'Connor for the defendants.
Marven Everett Q.C. and Geoffrey Green for the plaintiff.

The following cases, in addition to those mentioned in the judgment of Evershed M.R., were referred to in argument: Marshall v. Gotham & Co. Ld.[2]; Wardlaw v. Bonnington Castings[3]; Roberts v. Dorman Long & Co. Ld.[4]; Watts v. Enfield Rolling Mills (Aluminium) Ld.[5]; Knight v. Demolition and Construction Co. Ld.[6]; Crookall v. Vickers-Armstrong Ld.[7]

EVERSHED M.R. In this extremely difficult case I have felt myself forced to the conclusion that we should order a new trial. I need not say with what reluctance I have arrived at that conclusion, for it is a principle of our law that there should be an end to litigation and, as a corollary to that principle, that a plaintiff, who has failed at a trial to prove his case, should not be given a second chance to do so. But the present case is remarkable in three difficulties of most unusual character.

In the first place, the evidence upon which the judge primarily, if not exclusively, acted did not emerge in the ordinary course, but appears to have come out after final speeches had been delivered, and in one vital respect the evidence of the plaintiff's chief witness was in complete contradiction to what he had in terms said at the beginning of the case. In the second place, certain vital matters of fact do not appear to me to be the subject of express findings on the part of the judge, nor, so far as I am able to inform myself from the shorthand notes, was the evidence in every case directed to those points. Thirdly, in so far as evidence was directed to those points, it was, as I have already said, so directed after speeches, and would no doubt be apprehended in the light of those speeches; so that I have felt myself unable to reach a conclusion upon those matters to my own satisfaction. I should add that the judge may have been able in some degree to rely upon other cases of a somewhat similar character. For this judge is a highly experienced judge in these matters, and in those respects I am conscious of having no similar experience myself.

The result then is, on the one hand, that if the appeal were, or were in substance, to fail, it would have to be on the basis that the plaintiff had proved the essential matters of fact which I find it difficult to be satisfied that he did prove. On the other hand, if the appeal were to be allowed, it would be on the strict basis that, to judge from the shorthand notes, the plaintiff had failed to show a sufficient link between his injury and the actionable wrong alleged. I cannot exclude from my mind, first, that the plaintiff here was an employee of the defendants and, as such, contracted a deadly disease from which he has suffered the gravest injury. Secondly, that the subject-matter is one, as I have already indicated, which has been on several occasions before judges who have acquired much greater experience of such matters than I have. To allow the appeal in those circumstances might, to my mind, and in the very special circumstances which I have indicated, involve a real injustice. In view of the course which I think we should take, it would obviously not be desirable for me to say more than is strictly necessary in order to explain my judgment.

The defendants carry on business, as their name implies, as iron moulders. That business involved in the present case that several men in a single room, which was called Room " C " in their factory, on a floor of sand (save for a concrete alley-way), filled moulds with molten metal and then, when the moulds had somewhat cooled, opened them and took out the cooling forms. This last process is known as " knocking out " and involves, among other things, knocking off by ordinary physical and manual means adherent grains of sand from the forms or castings. This process is indubitably very dusty. Clouds of sand are emitted. Moreover, there is no synchronization among the men employed in the room and it may therefore be taken that approximately half of any working shift will be occupied by the process of knocking out conducted by one or more of the operatives in the room. It follows that, even if a man is not subjected to thick dust clouds emitted from his own moulds, he is more or less involved in the clouds emitted by the operations of some of his fellow workers.

Until somewhere in the region of the year 1950, it was not appreciated by any competent person that the process which I have described, however uncomfortable, was dangerous to health in that it was liable to cause silicosis. It is now, and since the date I have mentioned, established beyond a peradventure that, in the process described, the grains of sand are fractured and that there are then emitted into the atmosphere minute fragments of silicon-dioxide, measured in terms of microns or one-thousandth parts of millimetres, which, if inhaled in sufficient quantities, produce, or are liable to produce, the deadly disease of silicosis.

When knocking out is going on the semi-gaseous and highly volatile fragments are present in quantities which were estimated as being between 7,000 and 8,000 per cubic centimetre. Their density falls fairly rapidly and in the space of, say, 15 to 20 minutes it is generally reduced to a degree probably below the danger level. As I have said, however, a man may be affected by clouds emitted, not by himself, but by his neighbours; clouds which for a time at any rate are lethally charged. All these matters of fact have lately become known, but before the year 1950 or thereabouts it was not at all appreciated that these dust clouds, however distasteful, were thus dangerous.

The plaintiff was a moulder in the defendants' employ from the year 1929 or 1930. According to the agreed medical report, by the year 1946 he had become seriously affected with silicosis and by 1948 he was spitting blood. In other words, as I understand the medical evidence, he had then become dangerously and incurably ill from the disease. At the date of the commencement of proceedings in the year 1954 (the plaintiff then being in the 40's) he had not only become largely incapacitated from his ordinary work, but he had also lost the prospect of living the normal span of his life. It was said that he then had about fifteen years of life to which to look forward. It was also proved that this disease, once contracted, cannot properly be eliminated, though perhaps it may be arrested. The evidence seemed to be that in an ordinary case it would take fifteen years, perhaps more, possibly in some cases less, of exposure to the lethal fragments of sand in order that a man in this occupation might become dangerously and incurably afflicted.

The plaintiff brought his action claiming damages based both on common law and on section 47 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937. In the circumstances, and having regard to the state of knowledge which I have indicated, he made no claim good under the common law and he does not now pursue that claim; but he succeeded under the Factories Act, 1937, and recovered by way of damages a total sum of £9,645 6s. 5d. The claim under the Factories Act, 1937, was formulated under several heads, of which two in the end became material at the trial.

RICHARDS v. HIGHWAYS IRON-FOUNDERS (WEST BROMWICH) LD.

Evershed M.R.

[His Lordship read section 47 (1), and continued:] The first thing to notice about section 47 (1) is the dichotomy, which the judge observed, between cases of the emission "of dust or "fumes of such a character as to be likely to be injurious" on the one hand, and "substantial quantities of dust of any kind" on the other hand. In my judgment, the dichotomy was correctly noticed by the judge. Having regard to the state of knowledge, it may be taken that the dust, with which we are here concerned, was not at any material date dust within the first branch of the section, since it could not fairly be regarded then as likely to cause silicosis. On the other hand, there is no doubt that the dust was emitted in substantial quantities, so that it fell within the second branch of the language which I have read.

From this it follows that, since the dust was in substantial quantities, there arose an obligation, from the date of the coming into operation of this section (namely, on July 1, 1938), to take, as stated by the section, "all practicable measures to protect "the persons employed against inhalation."

It is at this point the first difficulty arises. What is meant by the phrase "all practicable measures"? The matter was discussed by my brother Parker and by this court in Adsett v. K. & L. Steelfounders & Engineers Ld.[1] It will suffice for my purposes to take a short sentence from the judgment then given by Singleton L.J.[2]: "In deciding whether all practicable "measures were taken one must have regard to the state of "knowledge at the time, and particularly to the knowledge of "scientific people. It is easy to be wise after the event, but "I find it impossible to say, on my view of the section, that it "was shown that the defendants were in breach of the duty "imposed upon them by the section."

The nature of the obligation has been epigrammatically expressed as being that the measures taken must be possible in the light of current knowledge and according to known means and resources. It is clear then, in my judgment, that the matter must be judged in the light of the state of the relevant knowledge at the time of the alleged breach. Thus the fact that at some later date some method of protection has been discovered which was not at the date of the alleged breach dreamed of, even though all the individual materials therefor were known and available, will not suffice. On the other hand, I must not be taken to be saying that the state of knowledge, or absence of knowledge, within the limited scope of a particular industry, or branch of an industry, is by any means necessarily conclusive. It must be a question of fact and of the weight of all the material evidence in any particular case, to assess what was in truth known, or what ought to have been known, by the employers charged at the relevant dates.

I have said that at the relevant dates here (that is to say, when the Act came into force, and later until the time when the plaintiff had become incurably and fatally affected) it was not appreciated by anyone that the dust emitted in this iron moulding process was liable to produce silicosis. On the other hand, it seems equally clear (though the manner of proof was highly peculiar, as I have already indicated) that there were available and known methods of protecting workers against the inhalation of large quantities of dust, as such, namely, various forms of respirators and masks. Of these it is said that there were as many as twenty types. One of them has been called mark IV and has, indeed, figured in other similar cases in the courts. The fact is now known that of all the masks or respirators that were then available, mark IV was the only one (though the others might give relief from discomfort) which had any effectiveness whatever against the minute particles which were dangerous in the grains of sand.

The nature of the case now emerges. Though the dust was not thought likely to be injurious, still it was beyond question given off in substantial quantities. Therefore, it follows, the defendants were bound to take all practicable measures. They took, as the judge found, none. The plaintiff then says: "Among "these measures which were practicable must at least be "included the supply of mark IV masks which would have been "of some effectiveness against my injury. The defendants, "having therefore taken no steps, must be responsible for the ill "consequences, which, had they taken measures including the "supply of mark IV masks, would have been at least of some "protective quality." The discussion has involved considerations, amongst other things, of the onus of proof and of causation; and, having regard to the dates which I have already indicated, including the fact that when the Act came into force the plaintiff had been in the service of the defendants for eight years, exposed to this inhalation, there has also arisen the question of aggravation, assuming that at any material date the plaintiff had become, to some degree, afflicted with the disease.

Among the cases to which our attention was drawn were Ebbs v. James Whitson & Co. Ld.[3] in this court, and also the cases there mentioned and discussed, Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros. Ld.[4] and Mist v. Toleman & Sons.[5] I will not take up time by further references to those cases, for they are not, in my judgment, directly in point. The problem which arose in those cases was of this nature: if a plaintiff proves that, having been exposed to contact with fumes, he contracted a disease of the kind against which the relevant sections of the Act were designed to protect him by requiring that measures should be taken against the inhalation of the fumes, then, if the defendants are to escape liability, they must show that the disease did not in fact result from that inhalation. In Mist's case,[5] on the other hand, the tuberculosis from which the plaintiff suffered was not a disease of the kind against which, through inhalation of dust, the Act was designed to give protection; and was not shown by the plaintiff in fact to have resulted from such inhalation. It might have done so and it might not. It was accordingly held in that case that he had failed to make good the first limb of the case which it was incumbent upon him to prove.

In the present case there is no doubt whatever that the disease of silicosis, which afflicted the plaintiff, did result from the inhalation of this dust emitted at the defendants' factory. But the question is: did it so result by reason of a failure on the defendants' part to do that which they were by the statute bound to do?

I have said, first, that the fact that dust caused the silicosis was not known until, say, the year 1950; and, secondly, that of the numerous masks or respirators which were known to give protection against dust as such, only mark IV was in fact later shown to have been effective against silicosis. Therefore, of all the possible means of protection, only the mark IV mask would have protected the plaintiff against the particular damage or aggravation of the damage which he has suffered. In other words, as Mr. O'Connor put it in the course of his reply: "Must "not the plaintiff show that the defendants' fault was a failure "on their part to supply, not any masks, but mark IV masks?"

The words in the section are "all practicable measures." But it cannot, I think, be sensibly supposed that it was the defendants' obligation to render available a sufficient supply of every mask of every known type. Has then the plaintiff shown that at the relevant dates—I take those dates to be 1938 to 1946—the mark IV mask was regarded by competent persons, including technicians qualified to speak upon these matters, as what I will call the best all-purpose mask; so that in the natural course of events an obligation to take all practicable measures would inevitably involve, or properly and naturally involve, a supply of mark IV masks? That seems to me to be the vital question. If the answer to that question is in the negative, then can it not be said that the plaintiff has failed to prove his case? The judge has, as I think, assumed that the mark IV mask had the kind of primacy at the date I have mentioned which I have described. But it is upon this point that I have found the evidence so unsatisfactory that I have been unable for myself, and upon reading that evidence, to reach a satisfactory conclusion.

Before I deal further with it I can at this point dispose of two other matters. It was also part of the case made good in the court below by the plaintiff that the defendants should have provided exhaust appliances in pursuance of the obligation imposed by the last few lines in section 47 (1). Upon that matter the evidence—which I have already described as being in its nature unusual—was briefly as follows: In the second day the principal witness for the plaintiff, Mr. McKie, an engineer, went so far as to say this in answer to Mr. O'Connor in cross-examination. The question was: "Do you think any section "of the Factories Act had anything to do with it," to which he boldly answered: "No. I do not. I do not think it is a question "of any breach of statutory duty." Of course, whether or not there was a breach of section 47 was a matter for the judge and not for the witness; but I think that Mr. O'Connor was fairly entitled to assume that by that answer this expert witness, whom the plaintiff had called, was saying that there were in his view, in his experience, no "practicable measures" which ought to have been taken, and that the circumstances which are set out at the end of the paragraph, when applied to this case, excluded the practicability or duty of supplying exhaust appliances. So when the evidence for the defendants was called, not unnaturally none of it was directed to dealing with these—largely technical—matters of fact.

As I have said, the junior counsel who conducted the case on the one side and the other then proceeded to address the judge; and at the end of all—and who finally asked the judge for the necessary indulgence does not seem to me to matter—this same witness, Mr. McKie, was recalled and sang, as will be seen, a song of somewhat different tune. There was also recalled on the defendants' side their own expert, Mr. Ottignon, who, if anything, added, and added considerably in one respect, to the weapons which were put into the plaintiff's hands.

Upon this matter Mr. McKie made the following observations. In examination-in-chief Mr. Green asked: "If one used that "form of dust removal system, would it necessitate any altera-"tion of the system of work within the foundry itself, or could "the system go on as it is at the moment?" and then the witness, after being given an explanation of the question, said: "I think it is practicable to do it and I think it will be done some "time although I have not seen it yet." (Devlin J.:) "Would "it involve any alteration in the system of the foundry? (A.) I "do not think it would. (Q.) Would it involve any cost other "than the cost of putting in these devices? (A.) It would involve "no main structural alterations at all."

Then Mr. O'Connor, who might, I suppose, be somewhat surprised when he compared those answers with the earlier answer, asked questions which gave rise to the following evidence of the same day. He mentioned the size of this shop or Room "C" and said: "Of course a system of local exhaustion by "forced draught and trunking has been known a good many years. "For one thing it has been applied to several things under the "abrasive metal legislation that came into force in 1925, but as " far as foundries are concerned you have never heard of any such " apparatus being used, have you? (A.) Not in this type of " foundry. In the non-ferrous foundries they are quite common " round about the furnaces. (Q.) Not around the moulders? " (A.) They are over the moulders as well because the moulders " are near the furnaces. They empty very often straight from " the furnace into the moulds."

Then on the following page, the apparatus having been called a hood or hat, the witness was asked where he would place it, and he said: " It would come down on top of him "—that is, the workman. " When I say the hood, it would be perhaps a low " grid taking the dust sideways. I do not think you could take " it down, I think the main dust will fall there, but the main " thing is to induce a current of air downwards over the head " of the man to the grid, and I think that will be done some time. " I have never known it to be done, but if I had been designing a " foundry today I should certainly have put something of that " kind in . . . I know what its effect would be, there cannot be " any argument about that. It is practicable, it is possible, but " it has never been done." In re-examination he said: " I have " no doubt whatsoever that a dust exhaust system could be " installed which would prevent any or very little dust, at any " rate, 99 per cent. of the dust that a man normally inhales from " these processes reaching him."

Then, finally, Mr. Ottignon upon this point said, in answer to a question, that in a mechanized foundry you could do certain things, " but on a jobbing foundry the knock-out takes places over " the whole of the foundry floor. The whole of the floor is a work- " ing area and it takes place over the whole area. You must have " rows of continuous hooding. It can be done, there is no funda- " mental impossibility for it, but again you would have to have " double the space for moulding. You would want space for the " moulding and space for the extraction hood. There would be " the mould and there would be the extraction hood pulling the " dust." Then, in answer to the judge's question: " If it ran " the full length, you say, you wound want the space for the hood " and space for the boxes? " he said: " Yes; probably rather less " in that two moulders could work back to back, but certainly " you would need 60 per cent. more floor space."

It will be noticed from those answers, at any rate as I read them, that there seems to be no very clear distinction between a hood over the worker's head, which sucked the particles of dust out, and some rather different type of apparatus consisting of grids in the floor or grids in the floor together with some down draught which would push the dust particles down and sideways out of harm's way; and what the finally recommended conclusion was, as I have said, I am left in grave doubt about.

The judge upon this question said: " The two other measures " that have been suggested are, first of all, that there should " be what Mr. McKie called a hood. Again I do not think I need

" describe it more than to say that it is a method of extracting " air or creating an artificial draught immediately above the " place where the workman is employed which will draw out or " exhaust the dust very rapidly and remove it. Nobody has ever " heard of it being used in foundries but it is in fact a method " which has been used a long time elsewhere. It has been used " for getting rid of dust in the metal polishing trade. It is, in " fact, and has been for forty or fifty years, a well-known way of " getting rid of dust where it is thought important that dust " should be got rid of. It would not involve any structural " alterations in this foundry. It would not involve alteration in " the system of work except to this extent, that, of course, the " hood, which would be a pretty elaborate thing, would require " a good deal of space, and it would require about 50 or 60 per " cent. more floor space if the same amount of work was to be " done in the shop in this case as was in fact being done." Then later, having dealt with masks, he said: " I am satisfied that both " measures, including the hood measure, were practicable " measures."

As I have said, I feel great difficulty in following the evidence with its variation between hoods and grids into the summary in the judge's judgment; but in any case I venture to think, with all respect, that the judge has omitted to notice that the added obligation about exhaust appliances, unlike the first obligation for protection against inhalation, is qualified. Let me re-read the material terms of the section: " And where the nature of the " process makes it practicable exhaust appliances shall be pro- " vided and maintained as near as possible to the point of " origin of the dust or fume, so as to prevent it entering the air " of any workroom." I think that those words are plainly directed to the case where the dust or fume is emitted at some fixed point or points on a machine and the exhaust appliance is intended, therefore, to be fixed in such a manner that the dust, instead of being emitted into the atmosphere, is drawn off outside or elsewhere. I am not saying that it is necessarily limited to that particular case, but I do say that, in my judgment, it is inapplicable to a case where, for one thing, there are quite certainly no " points " which are definable and fixed which can be said to be the origin of the dust. The moulds are separate, loose objects which may be opened at any place on the floors. I further think that the earlier qualification " where the nature " of the process makes it practicable " is such, that on the evidence, as I understand it, the plaintiff did clearly fail in this respect to establish any breach on the defendants' part. I therefore think upon that matter, with all respect to the judge, that the plaintiff failed to make good his claim for a breach based on failure to supply exhaust appliances, and that that matter should now be taken against the plaintiff to have been finally disposed of.

I have earlier mentioned that the plaintiff also sought to make good breaches consisting of failure to do other things, for example,

1955
RICHARDS v. HIGHWAYS IRON-FOUNDERS (WEST BROMWICH) LD.
Evershed M.R.

what has been called cold knocking out rather than hot, and mechanically knocking out instead of manual knocking out, and there were also one or two other matters. On all those other suggested breaches the plaintiff also failed, and no attempt has been made in this court to rehabilitate them. Those matters also are now out of the way. I will turn back, therefore, to this matter of the masks.

I have referred already more than once to the extraordinary course, through no fault of anyone—and I must not be taken to be casting blame on anyone—which the action took. After Mr. McKie had apparently repudiated any claim on the plaintiff's part to rely on the Factories Act, 1937, he also dealt with the matter of respirators. Mr. O'Connor's last question to him in cross-examination was: "You did say that masks could have been "used. You have never heard of anybody in these foundries "using masks, have you? (A.) I have never known of moulders "using them. I have heard of fettlers and cupola men, but never "a moulder. If you provided them I do not think they would "use them."

Notwithstanding that answer, however, I think it may fairly be said that the defendants did not establish that the supply of masks would necessarily have been futile because they would have been cast aside. Such was shown to have been the fact before my brother Parker in the Adsett case.[6] But I do not think here that the defendants, not having made any attempt by suggestion or exhortation to encourage their use, can be heard to say that the measures were not practicable, because the men would not in any circumstances use them.

But notwithstanding that limitation on the answer, it seems to me natural enough that Mr. O'Connor, upon this matter of masks, should also have left the point severely alone in his own later evidence, and so once more one comes to the speeches and the recall of Mr. McKie and Mr. Ottignon.

By way of contrast to what he had formerly said, Mr. McKie —in saying that I am not, of course, seeking to cast aspersions upon the integrity of Mr. McKie; I simply observe that he did, on this occasion, say this in cross-examination: "(Mr. O'Connor:) "You have never heard it recommended from 1930 to 1950 that "moulders should wear masks? (A.) I have not seen any recom- "mendation to that effect. (Q.) You say that they could have "worn a cotton gauze pad. Is that right? (A.) That is the only "thing one would normally wear, if they wore anything at all. "(Q.) Have you any idea whether it would be any good? "(A.) Yes. (Q.) I suggest that it would not catch any of the "dangerous particles? (A.) I believe it would; I am sure it "would."

Then I can pass, I think, to where Mr. Ottignon, on this matter, gave evidence thus: "Now, as to the efficacy of a mask,

" a cotton gauze pad, would that catch the small particles? " (A.) No; the cotton gauze pad is the simplest form of all pro- " tection. Better than that there are probably about twenty " proprietary brands of that, all with improved efficiency to " cotton wool, but only two of those are approved by the Factory " Inspectors' Department as being satisfactory under the new " regulations."

Then there is discussion about that. The new regulations he referred to were dated 1954. There was this discussion about the nature of the requirements. " (Q.) How long have those masks " been known which can catch small particles? (A.) One of " them, the least satisfactory, for a number of years, probably " fifteen years, and the other one, the most satisfactory, from " 1951 or 1952. (Devlin J.:) One has been satisfactory for " fifteen years? (A.) Possibly fifteen years. (Mr. O'Connor:) " Where did that originate? What is it called, ' mark IV '? " (A.) Yes. I do not know its origin. The other is the micro " filter. (Devlin J.:) What was it used for in the course of the " last fifteen years? (A.) All sorts of dusty operations, in quarry- " ing, odd foundry operations, cement work and pottery work."

In cross-examination on this matter Devlin J. asked: " When " do you say you have seen them worn? (A.) On light bench " work. (Q.) Mr. Green did put, ' For the whole time? ' and did " you agree? (A.) For a reasonable time. I have not seen them " worn the whole day. (Mr. Green:) The men in a foundry like " this would not want to wear them more than fifteen minutes at " a time? (A.) No; because although the knocking-out process " is not continuous with one man there is the man next door who " may be. (Q.) In other words, there is a hazard coming from " the next door neighbour? (A.) Agreed." Later: " Is he in a " position of danger, continuously from his neighbour's work? " (A.) One neighbour or the other during most of the day. " Knocking-out probably takes place four or five times within an " eight-hour day."

Cutting this matter short, what it came to, I think, is this: It was conceded that, owing to the heavy nature of the work, the workman could not wear the mask the whole time. But he could wear it for periods of fifteen or twenty minutes. Thus, at the very end of the evidence, Devlin J. asked two very pregnant questions. The first was this: " Then is not the position this: that while " you could not guarantee safety unless a man wore a mask the " whole time, if he wore a mask when he was actually doing his " own operation for a quarter of an hour it would give him a " measure of protection over the most dangerous period? (A.) " It would undoubtedly. (Q.) And would presumably be worth " doing? (A.) It would."

On that I turn to the judgment: " The fourth method, and " perhaps the simplest, is that the men should be equipped with " a mask. Mr. McKie said that a cotton gauze pad over the " mouth and the nose, such as was used in many industries,

Evershed M.R.

" would be quite sufficient. It would only require to be used " during the actual process, that is, I suppose, during the " five, ten or fifteen minutes in which the knock-out was " taking place, and this dust is being given off. The criticism " that was made against it was that the cotton gauze would not " in fact keep out the small particles which were the cause of " the damage in this case. Of course, one has to keep the thing " rather distinct in one's mind there. Nobody knew that these " small particles had in particular to be kept out; what had to be " done under the Act was to prevent the inhalation of dust. The " cotton gauze pad would, it seems to me, certainly have done " that, though it might be said that the failure of the defendants " to cause it to be used in this case did not really matter since, " in fact, it would not have kept out those particles that turned " out to be injurious. But there is in fact a mask which would " have done that. That is something which has also been known " for some time "—in the note it says about fifty, but I think it must be about fifteen years, " and it is called mark IV mask. " It is used in cement works where, for example, the cement is " being got out of paper sacks. The criticism which has been " made by the defendants' experts against masks generally was " that the mask was no good unless it restricts breathing, and if " it restricts breathing it cannot be worn for any prolonged period " when any manual work is being done. I think the answer to " that in this particular case is that it is not necessary that it " should be worn for a long period. It may be desirable but it is " not strictly necessary. The defendants' expert thought it could " be worn for twenty minutes to half an hour, and that would be " ample to cover the period of greatest danger. It is perfectly " true, of course, that dust may be given off by other moulders— " all the knock-out is not done at the same time—and to some " extent, even though the mask may be worn by the man himself, " he may be subject to dust while the other knock-out is going " on. But it seems to me that with a little adjustment in the " manner of doing the knock-out a great measure of assistance " could be obtained by wearing masks for a quarter of an hour " during the period of knock-out." Then the judge says, as I have earlier stated, that the supply of mark IV masks (I think he meant) was a practicable measure which ought to have been taken.

Without going too much into it, that finding is open to two criticisms. It seems to me, if I may say so, not fully to appreciate the vital dates and times (that is the fact that the plaintiff had already, when these masks became available, been in the defendants' employ, exposed to these lethal particles, for ten or more years); and also to neglect to pay sufficient attention (because the evidence does not seem to me to have sufficiently dealt with them) to the questions—in those circumstances and having regard to the nature of the work, would the wearing of a mark IV mask in any case for about fifteen minutes or twenty minutes while the man was doing his own knock-out have been effective at all? Has its absence in any event done more than aggravate to some extent the disease which had already been contracted? Would it indeed have been any good in any event? And would it have been any good if it was only worn for a limited time?

The absence of precise findings upon these matters and of clear evidence directed to them, as I read the evidence, has caused me to reach the conclusion which I have stated at the beginning of my judgment. I have, as I also stated, wondered to what extent the judge may have assumed, perhaps from his experience elsewhere, that this mark IV mask was what I have called the best all-purpose respirator in the years to which he was directing his attention. Unless he so assumed, there is the difficulty: Why is it said that the defendants' breach lay in failing to supply those particular masks? It is for those reasons that I have reached the conclusion, unsatisfactory as it is, that upon this matter of the supply of respirators there should be a new trial.

There was one other separate question argued with which it is possible for me to deal finally, and I can do so shortly. The figure of damages, £9,645 6s. 5d., was made up as to £1,645 of special damages; a sum of £200 for loss of expectation of life; a sum of £7,000 for loss of earning capacity during the remainder of his life (subject to a deduction); and, as to the balance of £1,000, for what the judge I think has regarded, or certainly for what Mr. Everett contended to be, loss of his prospect, during the period which has been cut off from his life, of making some provision for his wife or other dependants.

In the course of his speech to us, Mr. Everett made it quite clear that as regards this £1,000 he was not putting his claim forward as being one of lost earning capacity during the lost years. What the plaintiff has lost, says Mr. Everett, is the prospect of making this provision for his family. In that respect the claim differs from a somewhat similar claim made and rejected by Slade J. in Harris v. Brights Asphalt Contractors Ltd.[7] The matter is put in this way by Devlin J.: "I must say a word about the effect of the reduced expectation "of life. The defendants rely upon that as I think in law they "are entitled to do. They are entitled to say that I must regard "him as a man whose prospects of earning will in any case be "diminished. I do not think the contrary has been argued by "Mr. Green, but I think that if the defendants rely on it the "plaintiff is also entitled to rely on it for another purpose. He "is entitled to ask for something more than an ordinary formal "estimate of loss under this head. What the plaintiff loses, and "it seems to me to be a real loss, is the prospect of making "provision for his wife and family. He is a married man. "There will be a time, a longer time than there should have "been, when they are left without the support of the wage "earner. If he had died, of course, they would have been able "to make a claim under the Fatal Accidents Act. I think it is "a proper claim to be taken into consideration in a case of this "sort under the head of expectation of life."

Then, having dealt with the other heads, including £200 for the loss of expectation of life in the ordinary case, loss of amenities, and so forth, he said: "I shall add to that, for the "reasons that I have given already, the figure of £1,000 . . . "I wish to make it quite clear that if I had not taken expecta- "tion of life into consideration at all the sum which I should "have awarded would have been higher and not lower, because "I should have taken a longer period of loss of earnings for the "benefit of the plaintiff. The sum that I have awarded, as it "were, in relation to the wife and family is small in comparison "because, of course, the loss of expectation of life takes effect "at the time when the earning power would have been diminished "anyway—indeed, for a large part of it the earning power might "have ceased—and because I think all I have to consider under "that head is the provision which he might reasonably have been "expected to make, if he had continued to live."

As appears elsewhere in the judgment, the sum was arrived at really by considering what he might have earned over and above what he might have spent. As regards the claim for lost earning power Mr. Everett conceded that, the judge having accepted the evidence that the expectation of life was X years, the lost earning capacity must be calculated accordingly; but he has also said that this claim for lost prospects of making provision for his wife is based upon authority, for example, the language used by Lord Wright in Rose v. Ford.[8] Rose v. Ford[8] was a case, it will be remembered, in which a young woman was seriously injured and in fact died four days after the injury.

Lord Wright, in discussing the various heads of damage, used the phrase[9]: "one of the fruits of continued life is general "provision for dependants." I am bound to observe here that there was no evidence at all, so far as I know, as to the circumstances or frugal habits of this plaintiff. But in any case, once the suggestion of the figure here discussed being in any sense lost earning capacity is out of the way, it seems to me that you are left with something which is either quite incapable of estimation at all as a piece of property belonging to the plaintiff, or is necessarily comprehended in the kind of general loss of happiness and amenities which is covered by the award given, and already given in this case, for loss of expectation of life. After all, if a man is prevented from making provision upon his death to somebody else, it is that somebody else who materially suffers, not the man himself—except to the extent that his conscience and mind may be the less easy when he reflects upon his forthcoming incapacity. Where a death takes place soon after the accident, then such a claim might be made by the dependants, for the time which has elapsed would not bar it. In such cases there would be available a claim under the Fatal Accidents Act. But, in this case, and in many cases, it is, no doubt, true that the claim on the part of the dependants would have been barred by lapse of time. Still, it does not seem to me to justify the creation of a head of claim which I cannot think has any logical and sensible foundation, at any rate when it comes to estimation of the money's worth to the man himself at the time of the accident. Not only that, but it seems to me to be in conflict with what was laid down in the case of Benham v. Gamblin [10] in the House of Lords.

I will read one passage from the opinion of Lord Simon L.C. After referring to Rose v. Ford,[11] the noble Lord said [12]: "I "would further lay it down that, in assessing damages for this "purpose,"—that is, the loss of expectation of life—"the "question is not whether the deceased had the capacity or "ability to appreciate that his further life on earth would bring "him happiness; the test is not subjective and the right sum to "award depends on an objective estimate of what kind of future "on earth the victim would have enjoyed, whether he had justly "estimated that future or not. Of course, no regard must be "had to financial losses or gains during the period of which the "victim has been deprived. The damages are in respect of loss "of life, not of loss of future pecuniary prospects."

As I have indicated, it seems to me that the award of £1,000 under the head which I have mentioned is really not consistent with the principles that were then laid down in the speech of Lord Simon which I have read.

I should, in conclusion, mention the case (to which I rather think Devlin J.'s attention was not drawn) of Harris v. Brights Asphalt Contractors Ld.[13] It suffices to say that in that case Slade J. considered fully the possibility of a claim of this character, though it was based somewhat differently from the way in which the present case has been based. In Harris's case [13] what was suggested was that the plaintiff ought to be entitled to a sum which would somehow represent the earnings, or the net earnings less expenses, that he would have received and enjoyed had he lived during the years when, because of the accident, he would not be alive at all. Slade J., I think rightly in view of Benham v. Gamblin,[14] rejected that contention. But as I have also said, Mr. Everett does not base his claim in the present case upon parallel grounds and I need not therefore, I think, further discuss it, except to acknowledge the care with which Slade J. examined the various arguments which were there put forward including language which fell from members of this court in Roach v. Yates.[15]

For the reasons which I have stated, I think that the claim for £1,000 damages for loss of prospects of making provision for relatives should not have been included; but I think that in all the circumstances the case should be remitted for retrial upon the one question whether the defendants failed to comply with the statutory obligation under section 47 by the supply of masks, and, if so, to what extent the damage which the plaintiff suffered is properly attributable thereto, including under that head the question, of course, whether, in the event, the absence of masks merely aggravated rather than caused the injury.

* MOTTURE v. MOTTURE.

Husband and Wife—Marriage—Foreign marriages—Proof—Evidence (France) Order in Council, 1937, No. 515.

Neither an official certified copy of the entry of a French marriage in the appropriate public register which has been issued more than twelve months before it is put in evidence, nor the livre de famille, is of itself, prima facie, evidence in England of a valid marriage.

PETITION for divorce.

The parties were married on October 17, 1949, at the Town Hall at L'Orient Morbihan in the district of Keryadu, France. On April 30, 1954, the husband filed a petition for divorce alleging desertion. The wife by her answer denied that she had deserted the husband and prayed for an order for restitution of conjugal rights. By an order of June 16, 1955, the prayer of the petition was stayed and the reply was struck out. The wife proceeded on her answer.

B. L. A. O'Malley for the husband.
H. S. Law for the wife.

Before the case for the wife was opened Karminski J. asked what evidence counsel proposed to adduce as to the validity of the French marriage.

H. S. Law.—An official certified copy of the entry of the marriage in the appropriate public register has been filed and I have available an expert in French law, M. Allemès, who will say that the certificate would be accepted by the French courts as prima facie evidence of the validity of the marriage.

KARMINSKI J. said that the evidence of an expert though not always required was necessary in the present case. The certificate of marriage, having been issued more than twelve months before, was expressly excluded from the provisions of the Order in Council for France made under the Evidence (Foreign, Dominion and Colonial Documents) Act, 1933,[1] and was not, therefore, in itself prima facie evidence of a valid marriage.

Counsel, when seeking to prove the validity of foreign marriages accordingly to the Practice Direction of May 16, 1955,[2] should not overlook the limitations of the Order or that the livre de famille was not a document referred to in the First Schedule to the Order and, therefore, was never in itself prima facie evidence of a valid marriage.

[The validity of the marriage having been proved and the evidence heard his Lordship made an order for restitution of conjugal rights within fourteen days.]

Practice—Inspection—Land—Not in possession of party—Specific performance—Sale of leasehold property—Building still requisitioned and in possession of the local authority—Order for inspection—Jurisdiction—R.S.C., Ord. 50, r. 3.

A purchaser entered into a contract for the sale to her of certain leasehold premises. The particulars were stated to be as follows: "Lot 7. Practically rebuilt under War Damage Act. Requisi- "tioned by the local authority at a compensation rental amounting "to £67 10s. 0d. ann." The purchaser took no steps towards completion and the vendor commenced an action for specific performance. The purchaser, suspecting that the premises had not been "practically rebuilt," requested the vendor to allow her surveyor to inspect them before delivery of defence. The vendor having refused inspection until after close of pleadings, the purchaser took out a summons, asking for inspection, under Ord. 50, r. 3:—

Held, that the general power under Ord. 50, r. 3, to make an order for the inspection of property is not limited by the provision in the rule for authorizing persons to enter land in the possession of a party; and that, accordingly, in the present case an order should be made for inspection, subject to the consent of the requisitioning local authority; in the event of their refusal, they could be added as parties to the action, solely for the purpose of having the inspection authorized.

Coomes & Son v. Hayward [1913] 1 K.B. 150 considered.

PROCEDURE SUMMONS.

By a contract in writing contained in a memorandum dated January 27, 1955, Beatrice Pearlberg agreed to buy from William Penfold the leasehold premises known as No. 1 Aldershot Road, Kilburn, for the sum of £680. The particulars of the property were stated to be as follows: "Lot 7. Practically rebuilt under "War Damage Act. Requisitioned by the local authority at a "compensation rental amounting to £67 10s. 0d. ann."

The vendor, alleging that the purchaser had wrongfully refused and neglected to take any steps towards completion, commenced an action for specific performance. The purchaser considered that the premises had not been practically rebuilt under the War Damage Act, and a letter, dated July 1, 1955, was written by her solicitors to the vendor's solicitor as follows: "Our client is "advised that she should have an inspection made of the above "property as soon as possible for certain purposes concerning her "defence in these proceedings. We shall be glad to learn, "therefore, whether your client is prepared to afford facilities for "an inspection at a reasonable time and upon reasonable notice "being given of the surveyor's intention to visit."

The vendor's solicitor answered: "I duly received your letter "and my client is advised that your client should not be granted "facilities for inspection of the property until after the pleadings "are closed, when I shall be glad to give you the necessary "facilities for inspection."

The purchaser took out a summons under Order 50, r. 3,[1] for an order that she might be at liberty to inspect the property the subject-matter of the action.

The question before the court was whether an order for inspection could be made, having regard to the fact that the plaintiff was not in possession of the property.

ROXBURGH J. This is an interesting and, I think, important point, on which I must confess I have some doubt; but I propose to construe the rule in a manner which may perhaps be called robust, because I think that a great waste of costs might in this case and in other similar cases result if the rule is construed otherwise.

By a contract in writing contained in a memorandum dated January 27, 1955, the defendant agreed to buy from the plaintiff the leasehold premises known as No. 1 Aldershot Road, Kilburn, for the sum of £680. The premises are held under a lease dated November 12, 1885, for a term of 99 years from December 25, 1884, at the yearly rent of £8. A deposit was paid. In an action for specific performance the statement of claim alleges that the plaintiff duly delivered an abstract within the time limited, that the defendant did not deliver any requisitions within the time limited or at all, and that the defendant must be deemed to have accepted the plaintiff's title. The statement of claim further alleges that, notwithstanding repeated requests by the plaintiff's solicitor and in breach of the said contract, the defendant has wrongfully refused and neglected to take any steps towards completion; and it further alleges that the plaintiff at all material times has been and is now ready and willing to fulfil all his obligations under the said contract.

PENFOLD v. PEARLBERG.

Roxburgh J.

The particulars of the property in question are stated to be as follows: "Lot 7. Practically rebuilt under War Damage Act. "Requisitioned by the Local Authority at a compensation rental "amounting to" a certain sum. Nothing turns on that.

In those circumstances, no defence having been delivered, counsel tells me that the defendant suspects (I think that is the fair way of putting it) that the property was not practically rebuilt under the War Damage Act. If it was, the defendant, as far as I know, has no defence to the action, and presumably the defence will collapse. On the other hand, if it was not practically rebuilt, the action would appear certain to fail. In other words, the whole fate of the action is likely to depend on this question whether the premises were practically rebuilt under the War Damage Act; and once the premises are inspected, I should think that two competent surveyors, if they met together, could not possibly disagree on the subject. That is the sort of action with which I am concerned.

In those circumstances, the defendant's solicitors wrote to the plaintiff's solicitor as follows: [His Lordship read the two letters above set out, and continued:] It is to be noticed, and though it does not really affect the construction of the rule it does go very strongly to the merits or demerits of the resistance to inspection, that there is no suggestion that the plaintiff is not in a position to give inspection; on the contrary, there is a positive allegation that after the pleadings are closed, inspection will be given. That is how the matter stood when the defendant took out a summons asking for inspection under Order 50, r. 3.

At the hearing counsel took (and most properly took, because I do not think the point is an easy point) the objection that the plaintiff was not in possession of the property, and I think that that is well founded. The precise position of a requisitioning authority is always a question of some difficulty, but the one thing that I think is quite clear is that the requisitioning authority is in possession of the premises during the period of requisition, and I shall certainly assume, though there is no evidence on this point, that the premises are still requisitioned as they were stated to be at the date of the contract. It is said that I cannot do anything, notwithstanding the positive refusal of the plaintiff to give inspection now, unless I, by the pressure of my decision, compel the defendant to add the local authority as a party to the action, solely for the purposes of the inspection. There is no reason whatever to suppose that the local authority would raise any objection, and the whole of that procedure would, as far as I can see, be almost certainly a pure waste of money.

That there is no reasonable alternative I think is clear from Coomes & Son v. Hayward,[1] where the Divisional Court, in dealing with an unconditional order for inspection made by the registrar of a county court—and if I may say so, such an order was plainly wrong, and I am not suggesting for a moment that I can make an unconditional order—made some observations which are, I think, obiter dicta so far as the present case is concerned, but which certainly do lead to the suggestion which emerges at the end of the judgment of Scrutton J. that the proper course would be to add the local authority.

I do not find myself bound by any authority to put such a narrow construction on Order 50, rule 3. It is, as I believe, in two separate parts; and, on what I conceive to be the true construction, I do not consider that the second part necessarily governs the first. The order says: "It shall be lawful for the "Court or a Judge, upon the application of any party to a cause "or matter, and upon such terms as may be just"—and I do stress that, "upon such terms as may be just"—"to make any "order for the detention, preservation, or inspection of any "property or thing, being the subject of such cause or matter, "or as to which any question may arise therein." Pausing there, it seems to me that I have the plainest possible authority for making the order which I propose to make. But then the rule goes on: "and for all or any of the purposes aforesaid, to "authorize any persons to enter upon or into any land or building "in the possession of any party to such cause or matter. . . ."

This is not land or building in the possession of any party, and it is therefore said that because of that consequential provision in the rule, the ambit of the general words which precede are restricted to land in the possession of the party. Nobody has ever so held. I quite agree that there are passages which suggest that perhaps, if the matter had been considered, it might have been so held; but in my view so to construe the rule is quite unnecessary and would do nothing but increase costs in a case like the present. There is not the slightest reason to suppose that the local authority would refuse to allow inspection. On the other hand, the plaintiff has deliberately refused it now, assuming for himself that he has the power to grant or refuse it, while his argument is based on the hypothesis that he has not power to do it and that, therefore, the order might be futile.

In my judgment, the proper course in such a case as this, where that is the attitude of the plaintiff, is to make an order for inspection subject to the consent of the requisitioning authority now in possession of the premises. Such an order is not futile. It may be that by reason of the term—and quite plainly, under the first part of the rule, I am entitled to impose terms—no inspection would ever take place under the order. Then no doubt it would be necessary, if the local authority refused, to add them as parties to this action, solely for the purpose of getting inspection, with the considerable possibility that they might have to pay the costs thereby incurred; but if, in fact, the order did not become operative, it would be because the condition precedent never took effect; it would not be because it was a futile order; and I have no reason whatever to assume that the order will not take effect, because I think there is every probability that the condition will be fulfilled.

PENFOLD v. PEARLBERG.

Roxburgh J.

As I have said before, I think that it is in the interest of saving costs that this kind of case should be within and not outside the scope of this rule, and I feel no difficulty in construing it in that way.

Order accordingly.

Legal Aid—Costs—Taxation—Consent order—Conveyancing work pursuant to terms of order—Whether conveyancing costs within ambit of legal aid taxation—Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949 (12, 13 & 14 Geo. 6, c. 51), s. 1 (5).

The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant, his daughter, seeking (a) a declaration that he was the beneficial owner of certain property standing in her name, and/or (b) an order that the property be conveyed to him, and/or (c) rectification of the existing conveyance. At the hearing the matter was compromised and a consent order in the Lord Tomlin form was made. The order provided, inter alia, "that it be referred to the taxing "master to tax as between solicitor and client in accordance with "the provisions of the Third Schedule to the Legal Aid and Advice "Act, 1949, the costs to which that Act applies incurred on behalf "of the plaintiff and the defendant respectively." The schedule to the order provided that the defendant would convey to the plaintiff the property in question subject to an existing mortgage, and paragraph 3 thereof provided that "the documents necessary "to carry out the foregoing terms shall be in such form as counsel "for the plaintiff and for the defendant shall agree and in default "of agreement as the judge shall direct."

On the taxation of the plaintiff's solicitors' bill of costs the taxing master disallowed the whole of the costs of conveyancing work under the order incurred in giving effect to paragraph 3 of the schedule thereto, on the grounds that costs of conveyancing work as such were not covered by the Act of 1949, "as at present "operated," and the costs were not therefore recoverable under the Act unless they came within Schedule 1 of Part 1 (1) (c) thereof, viz., "Proceedings in the Supreme Court of Judicature."

On an appeal from the taxing master's overruling of the plaintiff's solicitors objections to the taxation:—

Held, that the order was an order specifically designed to include every item of costs to which the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, could apply; and that, as paragraph 3 of the Schedule to the order directed documents to be prepared for the purpose of carrying out its terms, the costs in question were costs necessarily incurred in arriving at a compromise to bring an end to proceedings within the meaning of section 1 (5) of the Act,[1] so that conveyancing costs proper as regards quantum could properly be allowed on taxation. Lancaster v. Lancaster [1896] P. 75 (C.A.) 118 explained.

SUMMONS TO REVIEW TAXATION.

The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant, his daughter, seeking a declaration that he was the beneficial owner of certain property standing in her name and/or an order that it be conveyed to him, and/or rectification of the existing conveyance. Both parties were in receipt of legal aid. The matter was compromised at the hearing on May 10, 1954, and Upjohn J. made an order in the Lord Tomlin form which provided: "This "action and counterclaim coming on for trial this day before this "court in the presence of counsel for the plaintiff and for the "defendant and upon reading the pleadings two certificates dated "July 17, 1952, and August 25, 1953, granted to the plaintiff "and a certificate dated October 15, 1952, granted to the defendant under the provisions of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, "1949, and Upon Hearing what was alleged by counsel for the "plaintiff and for the defendant and the defendant by her counsel "admitting that she holds the above-mentioned property on trust "for the plaintiff.

"AND the plaintiff and the defendant by their counsel stating "that they have agreed to the terms set forth in the Schedule "to this Order

"THIS COURT DOTH ORDER that it be referred to the taxing "master to tax as between solicitor and client in accordance with "the provisions of the Third Schedule to the Legal Aid and Advice "Act, 1949, the costs to which that Act applies incurred on "behalf of the plaintiff and the defendant respectively.

"AND IT IS ORDERED that all further proceedings in this action

[1] Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, s 1: "(1) This and the three next "following sections provide for, and "(save as hereinafter mentioned) "relate only to, legal aid in connection with proceedings before courts "and tribunals in England and "Wales, not being proceedings in "which free legal aid may be given "under the enactments amended by "Part II of this Act. (2) Unless "and until regulations otherwise provide, the proceedings in connection "with which legal aid may be given "are any proceedings of a description "mentioned in Part I of the First "Schedule to this Act, except proceedings mentioned in Part II of "that Schedule. . . . (5) Legal aid "shall consist of representation, on "the terms provided for by this Part "of this Act, by a solicitor and so "far as necessary by counsel (including all such assistance as is usually "given by solicitor or counsel in the "steps preliminary or incidental to "any proceedings or in arriving at "or giving effect to a compromise to "avoid or bring to an end any proceedings)."

S. 2: "(2) Where a person receives "legal aid in connection with any proceedings— . . . (b) his solicitor and "counsel shall not take any payment "in respect of the legal aid except "such payment as is directed by this "Part of this Act to be made out of "the legal aid fund."

COPELAND v. HOULTON.

" and counter-action except so far as may be necessary for giving " effect to the said terms and this order be stayed.

" AND the parties are to be at liberty to apply to enforce the " said terms.

" SCHEDULE.

" 1. The defendant will convey the above-mentioned property " to the plaintiff but subject to existing mortgage thereon in " favour of [a named building society] if necessary the plaintiff " will indemnify the defendant against all future liability to the " said building society in respect of the said mortgage. . . .

" 3. The documents necessary to carry out the foregoing terms " shall be in such form as counsel for the plaintiff and for the " defendant shall agree and in default of agreement as the judge " shall direct."

In due course the matter went to taxation. The solicitors for the plaintiff brought in their bill and, inter alia, they sought to have allowed a total sum of twelve guineas for the costs incurred in giving effect to paragraph 3 in the schedule to the order. The taxing master disallowed the whole of the item, he expressing no opinion as regards the question of quantum.

The plaintiff's solicitors thereupon made objections to the taxation in respect of that amount in the following terms: " We " sought to charge twelve guineas in respect of the conveyancing " work we were obliged to do for the plaintiff as a result of the " order and understood that this sum has been disallowed, first, " because legal aid does not apply to conveyancing, and, secondly, " because the work was not covered by the wording of the order. " We submit as follows:

" 1. The legal aid certificate covers the taking of proceedings " and everything necessary to bring those proceedings to a " conclusion.

" 2. The order of May 10, 1954, obliges the defendant to " execute a conveyance and the plaintiff to execute a second " charge and should, for example, either of the parties default, " or fail to reach agreement on the form of the documents further " proceedings could have been taken under the legal aid certificate " under the liberty to apply.

" 3. The exclusion of the conveyancing work in a case of this " nature leads to an absurd position: The plaintiff is ordered to " undertake certain conveyancing and to have perused certain " conveyancing documents offered to him by the defendant but " unless he is able or willing to pay for this out of his own pocket " he cannot have the order of the court completely enforced, " although, presumably, if for example the defendant defaulted " in tendering a draft second charge the plaintiff would be entitled " to use his legal aid certificate to apply to force the defendant " to tender such a charge. It is submitted that this position leads " to an absurdity and cannot be correct.

" 4. The prior authority of the area committee, if any was " required, was obtained prior to the conveyancing work being " undertaken, a solicitor carrying out work on the faith of that " authority should not be penalised.

" 5. The Law Society has a charge on the property recovered. " If the conveyancing work were not done the legal aid fund " might suffer. It was, therefore, necessary work from this point " of view arising out of the proceedings for which the legal aid " certificate was granted, and in our submission, apart from the " authority of the area committee, its costs should not be " disallowed.

" 6. If in the opinion of the taxing master the area secretary " has exceeded his authority then it is submitted that the " solicitors should be paid, but that representations should be " made by the Taxing Office through the Law Society to ensure " that there be no recurrence."

The taxing master, in his answers to the objections dated April 28, 1955, stated: " The costs of conveyancing work as such " are not covered by the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, as at " present operative, and the costs under objections are not, there- " fore, recoverable under such Act unless they come within the " provisions of Schedule 1 of Part I (1) (c) thereof, viz., ' Pro- " ' ceedings in the Supreme Court of Judicature.'

" Legal aid certificates dated July 17, 1952, and August 25, " 1953, gave authority ' to take ' and ' to continue proceedings " ' that he [the plaintiff] is the owner of No. 26 Clarendon Villas, " ' Hove, and/or for the recovery of the said property and/or for " ' rectification of the conveyance of the property to his daughter " ' Marjorie Anne Houlton and further or other relief.'

" The action was settled on terms agreed between the parties " as set out in the schedule to the judge's order which latter " directed the costs of both parties to be taxed in accordance " with the provisions of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, with " liberty to apply.

" It has always been the practice of the Taxing Office that " the costs of working out an order under any basis of taxation " are not allowed unless otherwise so ordered by the trial judge " or unless specifically referred to in and forming part of the terms " of settlement as not being within the terms of the order. " (Lancaster v. Lancaster.[2])

" If, as in this case, there is liberty to apply and such an " application supervenes the costs, the costs thereof are dealt " with by the judge on the hearing thereof. That did not arise " in this case.

" It is noticeable that the solicitors do not seek to include in " their bill as a disbursement the costs of the [building society] " for fees, costs and stamp duty . . . which, if their arguments " on this objection are correct, they would be perfectly entitled

[2] [1896] P. 75, 118.

COPELAND v. HOULTON.

" to and should include in the bill just as much as their own " profit costs.

" I therefore overrule this objection."

The plaintiff appealed.

The summons first came on for hearing on June 21, 1955, and was adjourned to enable the Law Society to instruct counsel if thought fit.

G. C. Raffety for the plaintiff.

A. L. Figgis for the Law Society, argued in support of the appeal.

Case cited in argument but not referred to in the judgment: In re Lavey.[3]

WYNN-PARRY J. This is a summons to review a taxation directed by an order made by Upjohn J. on May 10, 1954. It is a summons which raises a question of some importance.

The action was between the plaintiff, who was the father of the defendant, and the defendant, by which the plaintiff desired primarily to have a certain property conveyed to him by the daughter on the basis that he was the beneficial owner. In the event the matter was compromised at the hearing and a consent order in the Lord Tomlin form was made. That order recited that the plaintiff had been granted certain certificates under the provisions of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, which, of course, were necessary to lead up to the particular form of order for taxation. It recited an admission by the defendant daughter that she held the property in question on trust for the plaintiff, and then followed the usual recital: " And the plaintiff and the " defendant by their counsel stating that they have agreed to " the terms set forth in the schedule hereto and consenting to " this order." Then followed the order for taxation: " This " court doth order that it be referred to the Taxing Master to " tax as between solicitor and client in accordance with the " provisions of the Third Schedule to the Legal Aid and Advice " Act, 1949, the costs to which that Act applies incurred on " behalf of the plaintiff and the defendant respectively." It would be impossible to conceive of an order for taxation under that Act being framed in wider terms. The order then directed in the usual way that all further proceedings should be stayed except for the purpose of giving effect to the agreed terms, and liberty to apply was reserved.

The schedule containing the terms provided that the defendant would convey to the plaintiff the property in question subject to an existing mortgage and, should it be necessary, for an indemnity by the plaintiff to the defendant against future liability under the mortgage. With paragraph 2 I need not concern myself. Paragraph 3 is most important. It reads " The documents necessary

[3] [1920] 3 K.B. 625.

" to carry out the foregoing terms shall be in such form as " counsel for the plaintiff and for the defendant shall agree and " in default of agreement as the judge shall direct."

In due course the matter went to taxation. The solicitors for the plaintiff brought in their bill, and in the second of the two bills under the heading " Part II. Costs of conveyancing work " under the Order " they sought to have allowed a total sum of twelve guineas for the costs incurred in giving effect to paragraph 3 in the schedule to the order, which paragraph I have just read.

The master disallowed the whole of that item, expressing no opinion as regards the question of quantum. He based his refusal on the ground that " costs of conveyancing work as such " are not covered by the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, as at " present operated and the costs under objection are not there- " fore recoverable under such Act unless they come within the " provisions of Schedule 1 of Part I (1) (c) thereof, viz., ' Pro- " ' ceedings in the Supreme Court of Judicature.' " He then went on to say: " It has always been the practice of the Taxing " Office that the costs of working out an order under any basis " of taxation are not allowed unless otherwise so ordered by the " trial judge or unless specifically referred to in and forming part " of the terms of settlement as not being within the terms of the " order." He referred to Lancaster v. Lancaster,[1] to which I shall refer later.

Section 1 of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, provides by subsection (1): " This and the three next following sections " provide for, and (save as hereinafter mentioned) relate only to, " legal aid in connection with proceedings before courts and " tribunals in England and Wales, not being proceedings in " which free legal aid may be given under the enactments " amended by Part II of this Act." Subsection (2) states: " Unless and until regulations otherwise provide, the proceedings " in connection with which legal aid may be given are any pro- " ceedings of a description mentioned in Part I of the First " Schedule to this Act, except proceedings mentioned in Part II " of that Schedule." If the matter simply rested on section 1 (2) and the First Schedule there might be something to be said, apart from a consideration of the authorities to which I shall later refer, for the view taken by the master. But it is essential in considering the scope of taxation under this Act to have regard to the language of subsection (5) of the same section: " Legal aid " shall consist of representation, on the terms provided for by " this Part of this Act, by a solicitor and so far as necessary by " counsel (including all such assistance as is usually given by " solicitor or counsel in the steps preliminary or incidental to any " proceedings or in arriving at or giving effect to a compromise " to avoid or bring to an end any proceedings)." That is clearly

COPELAND v. HOULTON.

Wynn-Parry J.

a definition section, and it states in perfectly clear language the matters in regard to which a legally assisted person is entitled to have representation by a solicitor and, if necessary, counsel.

I must also refer to section 2 (2), which provides: "Where "a person receives legal aid in connection with any proceedings— ". . . (b) his solicitor and counsel shall not take any payment "in respect of the legal aid except such payment as is directed "by this Part of this Act to be made out of the legal aid fund;". It will at once become apparent from a consideration of those words why this is obviously a case of some importance. Subsection (2) of section 1 by reference to the First Schedule indicates the proceedings in connexion with which legal aid may be given, whereas subsection (5) shows the extent or scope of the aid when it is afforded. Upon the language of subsection (5), and without going outside it, it is perfectly clear that a legally aided person is entitled to representation by a solicitor, inter alia, for the purpose of giving effect to a compromise to bring to an end any proceedings. That at once suggests that the intention is that legal aid shall not necessarily end as soon as judgment is given in proceedings. It also clearly suggests that, although a person by his legal aid certificate is given legal aid for the purpose of bringing proceedings for the specified purpose—in this case for the recovery of the property in question—that legal aid must cover representation for the purpose of bringing those proceedings to an end, not only by a judgment after a hostile hearing, but also where the proceedings are brought to an end, doubtless with considerable saving of costs, by a compromise arrived at between the parties which from its very nature, as is the case in practically every Lord Tomlin order, involves a working out of the terms in order to give effect to the agreement. In the present case it was clearly necessary that a certain amount of conveyancing should be done in order to work out the agreement between the parties, which agreement is scheduled to the order. That appears, as I have said, from paragraph 2 of the terms in the schedule.

Looking for the moment no further than the language of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, and the form of the order in this particular case, I should myself have come to the conclusion that the costs of conveyancing work under the order should be allowed in the taxation subject to any question of quantum. But as the taxing master has referred to and relied on Lancaster v. Lancaster,[2] it is, I think, necessary that I should consider one or two of the authorities.

Lancaster v. Lancaster[2] was decided in 1896, that is, some 21 years after Krehl v. Park.[3] In that case, in the Court of Appeal, James L.J. said: "I am of opinion that the counsel for "the respondents, the plaintiffs in the suit, are well founded in "saying that, according to the well-established practice of this "court, the costs of suit when given to a party are not confined " to the costs of suit up to the hearing, but include the costs of " all accounts and inquiries requisite for carrying out the decree: " nor are these latter costs costs for subsequent consideration. " That is the general rule, and it is very important that that " general rule should not be interfered with." The action in that case was an action for specific performance in which type of action it frequently is necessary that accounts and inquiries should be taken and made. I can see no difference in principle between such matters and the costs of a conveyance necessary to carry out the order even though it be a consent order in the Lord Tomlin form. In that same case Mellish L.J. said [4] this in a passage which has been quoted with approval from time to time subsequently: " The rule which appears to be established " is, that where costs of suit are given generally by the decree " at the hearing, the subsequent costs of working out the direc- " tions of the decree will be included."

[3] (1875) 10 Ch.App. 334, 337.

As I read the judgments in Lancaster v. Lancaster,[5] that of the President and those of the Court of Appeal, the matter was decided on the basis that the costs in question could not be regarded as costs properly incurred in working out the order. Upon that basis there can be no conflict between Lancaster v. Lancaster [5] and the earlier case of Krehl v. Park.[6] It is quite impossible to imagine that such learned judges as considered the problem in Lancaster v. Lancaster [5] did not have clearly in their minds the rule as stated by the Court of Appeal in Krehl v. Park.[6] They were dealing with a very narrow and particular problem. All that they did, as I think, was to say that in that case, applying the general rule, the costs could not be allowed because they could not be regarded as costs of suit or costs of working out the order.

I return to the order and repeat what I have already said, that it would be difficult to find an order for taxation under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, in wider terms. I construe this order without limitation as being an order specifically designed to include every item of costs to which the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, could apply, and in view of the fact that paragraph 3 of the schedule directs documents to be prepared for the purpose of carrying out the terms, in my view this case falls fairly and squarely within section 1 (5) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, as being costs necessarily incurred in arriving at a compromise to bring an end to proceedings.

Therefore, on the question of principle I am against the decision of the master. In my view costs proper as regards quantum should be allowed to the plaintiff for the conveyancing Company—Capital—Increase—Invitation to apply for shares—Return of subscribers' money—"Should . . . conditions not be fulfilled . . . "moneys will be refunded and meanwhile . . . retained in a separate "account"—Conditions not fulfilled and scheme abandoned—Money subscribed not part of company's general assets—Subscribers entitled to return of their money—Companies Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 38), s. 51.

The application form sent out by a company when inviting subscriptions for a further issue of capital contained a statement that if certain conditions were not fulfilled "application moneys will be "refunded and meanwhile will be retained in a separate account." A circular letter sent out with the form was to the same effect. The response to the application was inadequate, and shortly after the list was closed a debenture holders' action was started and a receiver appointed. The question to be determined on the summons was whether the money subscribed which was held in a separate account formed part of the general assets of the company, so that the subscribers ranked with the other creditors of the company, or whether it was returnable to the subscribers. It was conceded that the mere fact that money was kept in a separate account did not of itself create a trust:—

Held, that, on a true construction of the application form, and in the circumstances, the moneys were returnable to the subscribers, and did not form part of the general assets of the company.

Moseley v. Cressey's Co. (1865) L.R. 1 Eq. 405 distinguished.

Semble, that having regard to section 51 (3) of the Companies Act, 1948, even if there were no promise to keep the money in a separate account, the subscribers would similarly be entitled to the return of their money.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

This summons was taken out by the plaintiff in a debenture holders' action to enable the master to certify, in answer to the inquiry under an order of December 8, 1953, of what the property comprised in and charged by the debentures in question consisted and in whom the same was vested. The subject-matter of the present application was a sum of £3,472 18s. now standing to the credit of a joint account with Barclays Bank Ld. in the joint names of the company, Nanwa Gold Mines Ld., and Messrs. Buckley Hall Devin & Co., their registrars. The question was whether this money ought to be treated as part of the general assets of the company, and could be validly claimed by the debenture holders' receiver, or whether it was the property of those who paid it to the company and ought to be repaid to them.

Nanwa Gold Mines Ld. was an old-established company, which by 1953 had come to the end of its resources, and had, for the time being, abandoned its workings. It still had, however, considerable concessions on the Gold Coast which appeared to promise a return, and the company's directors wished to make a last effort to turn those assets to profitable account. During June or July, 1953, the directors realized that the greater part of the company's capital had been lost, and proposed therefore to write it down drastically; but they also concluded that they would need some fresh money to be able to embark again on the operation of extracting gold. Consequently, on July 28, 1953, three documents were sent out to the shareholders, one a notice for a reduction of capital, combined with the usual increase to follow immediately upon it, the second a circular letter containing the views of the board, and the third a form of application for new shares. The circular letter signed by the chairman explained to the shareholders that the company proposed to resume operation and must have money for that purpose, and went on: "We have therefore "decided to resume surface mining as soon as possible and pro- "pose to raise the £50,000 needed by issuing 1,000,000 shares of "1s. each at par. I and my co-directors feel that we would not be "justified in proceeding with our proposals unless we have that "sum behind us and everything depends upon our being able to "raise it at once. We must warn you therefore that unless this "issue is fully supported we shall be unable to prevent the return "of the mine to the jungle. A form of application for shares is "enclosed. You will note that your application is conditional "upon the passing of the resolutions at the extraordinary general "meeting and the sanction of the court to the scheme because "such resolutions do not take effect legally until approved by "the court. . . . We have been advised that the likelihood "of the court's refusing to sanction the reduction . . . is very "slight. . . . Should the above conditions not be satisfied your "money will, of course, be refunded."

The form of application which shareholders were urged to fill up accompanied this letter. On the front of the form were these words: "The accompanying circular letter of the chairman should "be read in conjunction with this application form. It will be "noted that this issue is conditional on the passing of the resolu- "tions at the extraordinary general meeting of the company to be "held on August 20, 1953, and the subsequent sanction of the "court to the reduction of the company's capital. Should either "of these conditions not be fulfilled, application moneys will be " refunded and meanwhile will be retained in a separate account. " As soon as the above conditions are satisfied, the shares now " offered will be allotted and issued and will then be converted " into stock . . . and will rank pari passu in all respects with the " stock now issued of the company. . . . Application will be made " to the council of the Stock Exchange, London, for permission " to deal in and for quotation for the stock, into which the shares " now being offered will be converted." On the back was a form of application to be filled in by a shareholder, who had to send with it payment in full for the shares which he desired to obtain.

There was a poor answer to that proposal, and nothing approaching a million shares were applied for, although the lists were held open until September 21, 1953, a month longer than had been originally advertised. Some 91 persons did apply, however, and the money which they sent with their application forms was the subject-matter of the present dispute.

Before they sent out their circular and form of application the board took the precaution of consulting the council of the Stock Exchange about the issue, and were advised by that body that the money sent with the forms of application should be put into an account in two names: i.e., that not only should it be put into " a separate account," but that the separate account should have a name attached to it other than that of the company.

The writ in the debenture holders' action was issued on September 17, 1953, and the receiver was appointed on September 23, 1953. The scheme was formally abandoned by resolution of the board of January 7, 1954, because it was clear that nothing in the nature of £50,000 had been forthcoming, and having regard to the appointment of the receiver the scheme could not be carried out. Permission to deal was never obtained from the Stock Exchange, and the conditions of the offer were not fulfilled and, in accordance with the express terms of the application, the moneys were refundable. There was no doubt that the subscribers were entitled to a refund if they could obtain one, and the only question was whether those persons were entitled to a refund out of this separate fund, or whether they were mere creditors of the company. Every person who sent money to the company on this offer received a document in this form: " We have received with " thanks your cheque for the sum of £——, together with the " terms of the form of application and the circular to members " and note holders dated July 28, 1952." (For " 1952 " one should read " 1953 " in this print.)

HARMAN J., having stated the facts: The point is a short one. Is the relationship of the subscribers to the company that of creditor and debtor, or had they a lien on this fund or an equity against it so as to be able to attach it for the payment of their debt without allowing other creditors of the company to share with them? That depends on whether the relationship be that of debtor and creditor or of bailor and bailee; and the question turns, in effect, on the words in the form of application, "and meanwhile "will be retained in a separate account."

It was argued for the debenture holders that there was not enough here to create a bailment and no earmark on this account. If that be so, the application form is a very deceptive document; and it occurred to me in the course of the argument that if the persons who sent their money on the faith of this document had no lien on the separate account there was something very wrong with the law on this subject. Mr. Bagnall, for the debenture holders, contended with force that there was no lien, and that, however startling it might be, there was nothing to put these particular creditors ahead of any other creditors of the company: they were all people who had trusted the company and given them credit, and they must all share alike. He relied for that proposition first on Moseley v. Cressey's Co.[1] In that case the promoters of a company invited applications for shares by means of a prospectus which stated that deposits would be returned if no allotment of shares was made. Those words appear in the present case: "Should either of these conditions not be fulfilled, application "moneys will be refunded." It was held by Sir William Page Wood that such a ". . . statement did not bind moneys, consisting "mainly of these deposits, standing in a bank to the credit of the "company, with a trust or lien in favour of the depositors, as "against creditors of the company. . . ." He said[2]: "The plaintiffs say not only that these promoters are liable as for money "had and received, but that they have no authority to deal with it "otherwise than upon the trust by which it was to be returned "to the depositors. But if the object had been to create a lien "of this kind, the obvious way of doing so would have been to "have said in the prospectus that there would be a lien on the "deposits until the company was established, or that it was to "be set apart as a trust fund in the names of trustees, to be "returned in the event of the company not being established. "Nothing of that kind was done; nor was that the contract. The "contract was—'You are to pay so much per share when you "'apply for shares, and your deposits will be returned if no allot-"'ment is made'—not that the actual thing so deposited was to "be paid back; for payment to the company's bankers to the "account of the company made the moneys ipso facto part of "the company's assets." Mr. Bagnall said that this was a payment to the company, and it was a simple payment to them and to no one else, and that made it part of the company's assets ipso facto.

A little later the Vice-Chancellor said[2]: "But, says Mr. "Karslake"—he was the counsel arguing—"these moneys were "not the moneys of the company until the plaintiffs got their "shares. But that is not so; they were not retained by the "promoters, they were paid in to the credit of the company at "their bankers. What was intended to have been done seems to "have been done; and there was no trust created, it was merely "a debt."

If, therefore, the words had been merely a promise to refund, that case would (supposing it to be right) have been an authority that no lien is created by such a transaction. But here I have not only those words, but the promise to retain the money "in a separate acount." What is the point of making such a promise? It seems to me quite clearly to be a representation that the money will be set apart; not in the company's ordinary coffers, but in a separate account. It is not a promise, of course, to put it into joint names, although that in fact was done. There is no evidence that any of the subscribers knew that there was any arrangement to put it into joint names, all they knew was that there was a promise to pay it into a separate account; and I cannot but think that the whole object of making such a promise was to indicate that it would be kept apart and separate, not mixed with the company's moneys, until the board saw whether the conditions were fulfilled. It seems to me that the promise to keep the money "in a separate account" distinguishes the present from Moseley's case.[3]

It is conceded that the mere fact that the money was placed in a separate account, so that one could point to it and say: "There "it is," would not of itself ex post facto create a trust. That appears from Lister & Co. v. Stubbs,[4] which shows that because A can point to some money in the hands of B and say: "That "is where my money went to," it does not follow that the position between them is other than that of debtor and creditor. The proceedings there were by way of a motion for interim relief in order to get an injunction to protect the investments in question pending the trial of the action, and that could only be done if the plaintiffs (as the court said) had an equity and were not merely creditors. It was held that they were merely creditors. But here it is not the fact of the money being in the joint account which is relied on, but the promise made in the document on the faith of which the application was made.

There appears to have been one case, Mears v. Western Canada Pulp and Paper Co. Ld.,[5] in which it was assumed that money paid on a void allotment was impressed with a trust, and could be the subject-matter of an interim injunction. That case does not help me because the point was obviously not argued, and nobody seems to have troubled about it one way or the other. I do not think that it is an authority for the proposition which Mr. Monroe was at pains to establish because nobody argued it.

There are some strangely conflicting observations on this subject in the books. Stiebel (3rd ed., p. 166) refers to it, and the author makes some rather ex cathedra observations, which he supports by Stewart v. Austin [6] which, with every respect to that most learned and painstaking author, does not really support his proposition. Palmer's Company Precedents (16th ed., Part I, pp. 11 and 144) mentions the matter, but a cursory reading of those passages makes them appear to have been the work of two separate authors who held diametrically opposite views on the question. I leave it there, it does not help, because one cancels the other out.

It is not, in my judgment, anything more than a question of construing the application form. But I ought not to leave the matter without mentioning the statutory provision which covers this kind of ground. Section 51 of the Companies Act, 1948, is (according to the side-note to the section of the statute) concerned with "Allotment of shares and debentures to be dealt in on stock "exchange"; and it refers to statements in prospectuses about applications for leave to deal with shares proposed to be allotted, and provides that the company shall repay the money where permission is refused. Subsection (3) provides that where money is sent in on a provisional application: "All money received as "aforesaid shall be kept in a separate bank account so long "as the company may become liable to repay it under the last "foregoing subsection; and, if default is made in complying with "this subsection, the company and every officer of the company "who is in default shall be liable to a fine not exceeding five "hundred pounds." That appears to be an attempt to erect, so to speak, by statute a kind of trust for applicants in a case of this sort. It is irrelevant here, because in this case the directors promised to do this very thing. No doubt that was only a compliance with the statute; but they did promise to do so, and I think that their promise is of contractual effect, so I need not consider whether, if there was no promise but only the statutory obligation, the position would be the same. I incline to think it would be so, and that the object of section 51 (3) was to provide protection for persons who pay money on the faith of promises of this kind.

I need not consider further section 47 of the Companies Act, 1948, which is the old minimum subscription section, that merely provides for repayment if the minimum subscription is not reached. It was in connexion with the predecessor of that section that Mear's case [7] was decided; but about that I need say no more.

I am accordingly of opinion that the moneys in question are repayable to the persons who subscribed in answer to the circular dated July 28, 1953, and do not form part of the general assets of the company.

Declaration accordingly.

Contempt of Court—Committal order—Infant—Breach of undertaking to return child to jurisdiction—Party out of jurisdiction—Summons not served—Committal order made.
Infant—Custody.

A committal order may be made against a party who is in contempt of court although he is out of the jurisdiction and he has not been served with notice.

EX PARTE APPLICATION for an order for committal.

On March 12, 1953, the mother obtained a decree nisi dissolving her marriage to the father which decree was subsequently made absolute. By an order of December 7, 1953, the custody of the two younger children of the marriage was granted to the mother and that of the eldest child M., a boy, to the father. The father undertook to send the boy to a suitable boarding school and to allow the mother reasonable access to him during the school holidays.

On medical advice the sending of M. to a boarding school was deferred and in June, 1954, the father obtained an order of the court permitting him to take the child on a three-months' visit to the United States of America, on his (the father's) undertaking to return him to school in England in the autumn. He failed to return the child.

The mother applied to the court for an order that the father should be committed to prison for contempt of court. His whereabouts were not known and it was not therefore possible to serve him with notice of the proceedings.

The father did not appear and was not represented.

O'DONOVAN v. O'DONOVAN.

[WALLINGTON J. Have I any power to make a committal order against a man who is apparently outside the jurisdiction and who has not been served with notice of the application? What authority is there on the matter?]

K. Bruce Campbell. In Favard v. Favard [1] it was held that an order for a writ of attachment might be made ex parte. In that case the father, who had not been given the custody of the child, removed him to Scotland contrary to the order of the court. It had not been possible to serve the father in Scotland. The earlier cases of Hyde v. Hyde [2] and In re Evans [3] were referred to and the latter was followed. In re Evans was an administration action in which it was held that the defendant might be attached for disobeying an order of the court although he had not been personally served with the notice of motion for leave to issue the writ, the filing of the notice on the court file being sufficient according to the practice of the Court of Chancery.

Persons breaking undertakings such as that given in the present case frequently remain out of the jurisdiction. If no order for committal may issue, there being no possibility of service out of the jurisdiction, undertakings of this nature are rendered largely nugatory.

WALLINGTON J. Very well. You may have your order.

The respondent was a senior executive officer employed by Southgate Borough Council who looked after some of the council's committees. He had on occasion to work extra hours, involving feeding at a restaurant, in respect of which he received a cash meals allowance of 2s. 6d. for tea or 6s. for dinner. The council did not provide refreshments.

An assessment of £10 7s. to income tax in respect of an allowance for meals was made on the respondent for the year 1952–53, and an assessment of £14 3s. 6d. in respect of such an allowance for the year 1953–54.

The commissioners decided that the allowances were taxable but that, to the extent that the expenditure at a restaurant was greater than the cost which would normally have been incurred by the respondent for the same meals, there should be a deduction under the Income Tax Act, 1952, Sch. 9, r. 7. Accordingly, they reduced the assessments on him in respect of allowances by £5 for the year 1952–53 and by £7 for the year 1953–54. The Crown appealed:—

Held, allowing the appeal:

(1) That the respondent could not be said, when going out during the lunch hour to have lunch, to be engaged in the performance of the duties of his office so that he could claim in respect of the cost to him of any meal which he might eat;

(2) That there was no difference in principle between the nature of the interval for lunch and the nature of that for tea or dinner.

APPEAL against decision of the General Commissioners for the purposes of the Income Tax for the Hundred of Edmonton.

The inspector of taxes appealed against a decision of the commissioners exempting from tax a part of the moneys paid to a local government officer for an evening meal when he worked extra hours. The officer (hereinafter called "the respondent") was employed by Southgate Borough Council (hereinafter called "the council") and his duties included evening attendances at council committee meetings. When he so worked in the evenings he had to buy either tea or dinner at a restaurant. No refreshments were provided by the council. He could claim from the council an allowance at a flat rate of 2s. 6d. for tea or 6s. for dinner, but not both; and he could claim the allowance for dinner only when he worked after 8.30 at night, and had actually to spend money before the allowance would be made, the council requiring a certificate of expenditure.

In the assessment to income tax made on the respondent under the Income Tax Act, 1952, for the year 1952–53 there was included an allowance for meals of £10 7s. and in that for the year 1953–54 one of £14 3s. 6d.

At a meeting of the commissioners held on July 28, 1954, the respondent appealed against both assessments. He contended that the allowances were not taxable or, alternatively, that, if they were, the actual expenditure on meals should be treated as a proper deduction under the Income Tax Act, 1952, Sch. 9, r. 7. The inspector of taxes contended that the allowances were taxable as they were a perquisite or profit of the respondent's office or employment within the meaning of Schedule 9, r. 1, and taxable under Schedule E of the Act accordingly; and that the payment for meals could not be regarded as a proper deduction as it was not an expense incurred "wholly, exclusively and necessarily" in the performance of the respondent's duties within the meaning of rule 7.

It was agreed that the office or employment held by the respondent fell within rule 5 of the rules applicable to Schedule E as set out in Schedule 9.[1]

The commissioners found that the allowances made to the respondent were taxable but that, to the extent that the expenditure at a restaurant was greater than the cost which would normally be incurred by the respondent for the same meals, there should be a deduction in accordance with Schedule 9, r. 7. Accordingly, they reduced the assessments in respect of the allowances by £5 for the first year and £7 for the second.

The Crown appealed.

F. N. Bucher Q.C. and Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.
Maurice Lyell Q.C. and H. H. Monroe for the respondent.

Cases cited in argument but not referred to in the judgment: Cook v. Knott[2]; Machon v. McLoughlin[3]; Bentleys, Stokes and Lowless v. Beeson[4]; Great Western Railway Co. v. Bater.[5]

WYNN-PARRY J. This is an appeal from the General Commissioners for the Hundred of Edmonton who found in the first place that the allowances made to the respondent, as referred to in the case stated, were taxable, with which conclusion the respondent does not quarrel. The commissioners went on, however, to say that to the extent that the expenditure at a restaurant was greater than the cost which would normally be incurred by the respondent for the same meals—those are, tea and dinner—there should be a deduction under the Income Tax Act, 1952, Sch. 9, r. 7; and they did in fact reduce the assessments. It is with that finding that the Revenue quarrel.

(j) offices or employments of "profit under any public corporation "or local authority. . . ."

R. 7: "If the holder of an office or "employment of profit is necessarily "obliged to incur and defray out of "the emoluments thereof the expenses "of travelling in the performance of "the duties of the office or employ- "ment, or of keeping and maintaining "a horse to enable him to perform the "same, or otherwise to expend money "wholly, exclusively and necessarily "in the performance of the said duties, "there may be deducted from the "emoluments to be assessed the ex- "penses so necessarily incurred and "defrayed."

SANDERSON v. DURBIDGE.

Wynn-Parry J

It is agreed that the office or employment held by the respondent falls within rule 5 of the rules applicable to Schedule E as set out in Schedule 9 to the Income Tax Act, 1952, sub-paragraph (j) of which reads: "Offices or employments of profit under any "public corporation or local authority." It is clear that the respondent is employed by a local authority.

The relevant rule is in these terms: [His Lordship read rule 7 and continued:] The courts from time to time have commented on the strictness and the limited nature of that rule in the various forms in which it has appeared in various taxing Acts for over a century. I do not think that I can do better with regard to this than quote the observations of Vaisey J. in the recent case of Lomax v. Newton.[1] At the opening of his judgment he says: "The respondent to this appeal on the part of the Crown is a "Major Newton, who was a Territorial officer, second-in-command "of the Territorial battalion of the York and Lancashire Regiment "stationed at Sheffield. He was represented at a hearing before "the General Commissioners for Income Tax by his Commanding "Officer, a Lieutenant-Colonel Webster. The claim of the respon-"dents was that certain items of expenditure had been incurred "by him, in the words of the statute 'wholly, exclusively, and "'necessarily in the performance of' his duties as an officer of "the said battalion, so as to bring him in regard to that expen-"diture within the provisions of rule 9 of Schedule E of the "Income Tax Act, 1918." Rule 9 was the rule then in force corresponding to rule 7 of the Act of 1952 which I have already read. "Before coming to the particular items, I would observe "that the provisions of that Rule are notoriously rigid, narrow "and restricted in their operation. In order to satisfy the terms "of the Rule it must be shown that the expenditure incurred was "not only necessarily but wholly and exclusively incurred in the "performance of the relevant official duties. And it is certainly "not enough merely to assert that a particular payment satisfies "the requirements of the Rule, without specifying the detailed "facts upon which the finding is based. An expenditure may be "'necessary' for the holder of an office without being necessary "to him in the performance of the duties of that office; it may "be necessary in the performance of those duties without being "exclusively referable to those duties; it may perhaps be both "necessarily and exclusively, but still not wholly so referable. "The words are indeed stringent and exacting; compliance with "each and every one of them is obligatory if the benefit of the "rule is to be claimed successfully. They are, to my mind, "deceptive words in the sense that when examined they are "found to come to nearly nothing at all." With the whole of that paragraph, and particularly the last sentence, I find myself in respectful agreement.

A number of authorities were referred to, not all of which I propose to consider. I think it right, however, to mention that this case on its facts cannot be said to be completely covered by any decided case, though I think, on consideration, that it is in the end clear which line of authority should cover it.

On the one side is the line of cases illustrated perhaps best by Ricketts v. Colquhoun,[2] the well-known case about the Recorder of Portsmouth. I do not propose to refer to the facts therein. The rule then in force, corresponding to rule 7 of Schedule 9 to the Income Tax Act, 1952, fell to be considered. In the course of the passage of the case through the various courts, observations were made by a number of their Lordships who had to consider it, emphasizing in different words, but in words of the same import as Vaisey J. used in Lomax v. Newton,[3] in the passage which I have quoted. For instance, in the course of his judgment in the Court of Appeal Pollock M.R. said[4]: "It is very easy by "a general description of the facts to suppose that a hard case "has arisen, but it is the duty of this court to adhere closely and "accurately to the actual words of rule 9, which are of general "application to all holders of offices which come within its "ambit. At the outset, therefore, you have to find whether "the holder is necessarily obliged to incur and defray expenses "out of his emoluments, and I attach importance to those "words 'necessarily obliged,' because I think they are to "be read as meaning that where an obligation is imposed "upon the holder of the office which ex necessitate of the office "compels him to make outlays it is in those cases, and after "you have fulfilled that condition, that you first begin to consider "what is the possible expenditure which it is possible may be "deducted." In the course of his speech in the House of Lords Lord Blanesburgh, whose speech had been preceded by those of Viscount Cave L.C. and Lord Buckmaster, both of whom animadverted on the strictness of the rule, said[5]: "Undoubtedly its "most striking characteristic is its jealously restricted phraseology, "some of it repeated to heighten its effect. But I am also "struck by this, that, as it seems to me, although undoubtedly "less obtrusively, the language of the rule points to the expenses "with which it is concerned being only those which each and "every occupant of the particular office is necessarily obliged to "incur in the performance of its duties—to expenses imposed "upon each holder ex necessitate of his office, and to such "expenses only. It says: 'If the holder of an office'—the words, "be it observed, are not 'If any holder of an office'—'is obliged "'to incur expenses in the performance of the duties of the "'office'—the duties again are not the duties of his office. "other words, the terms employed are strictly, and, I cannot "doubt, purposely, not personal but objective:". In the result, in that case, the recorder was held not to be entitled for income tax purposes to deduct from the emoluments of his office as recorder the cost of travelling in order to attend his quarter sessions, his hotel expenses or the cost of conveyance from his rooms to the court.

Two cases were particularly relied on for the respondent before the General Commissioners as well as in this court. The first is Nolder v. Walters.[6] The headnote (in Tax Cases) reads as follows: "An aeroplane pilot employed by a limited company "claimed deductions in the assessment of his remuneration to "income tax under Schedule E in respect of various items of "expenditure. Held, that no deduction could be allowed in "respect of (a) the upkeep of a motor-car to convey the pilot "between the aerodrome and his home, or (b) a telephone at "his home; but that a decision of the General Commissioners "allowing a deduction for an excess of actual subsistence expenses "when away from home on duty over subsistence allowance "granted by the company could not be disturbed as being "erroneous in law." The decision was the decision of Rowlatt J., and as always that very learned judge expressed the principle in such clear language that I desire to read a passage from the beginning of his judgment[7]: "It seems to me that, as a matter "of principle the rule to be applied in these cases is clear. What "the statute allows to be deducted are expenses of travelling in "the performance of the duties of the office, or employment, or "money wholly, exclusively, and necessarily expended in the "performance of the duties. As regards the latter branch, it "seems quite clear that what is to be allowed to be deducted are "expenses 'wholly, necessarily', and so on, incurred in doing the "work of the office. 'In the performance of the duties' means "in doing the work of the office, in doing the things which it is "his duty to do while doing the work of the office." Later in his judgment Rowlatt J. came to deal with that part of the case on which in the end he did not disturb the decision of the General Commissioners. He said[8]: "Then I come to the other part of "the case. Some offices and employments do involve the duty "of travelling. It is not a question of getting to the place of "employment, but the employment may be actually to travel, as "in the common case of the commercial traveller, and, as some "people say, in the case of the Member of Parliament. The "duties may actually be to travel, and this gentleman's duty is "to travel; therefore both, I should have thought, under the "general words of the latter part of the section, and, I think, "under the head of travelling expenses, he is allowed the expenses "of so travelling. The Solicitor-General and Mr. Hills very " fairly agree, and I think it always has been agreed, that when " you get a travelling office, so that travelling expenses are " allowed, those travelling expenses do include the extra expense " of living which is put upon a man by having to stay at hotels " and inns, and such places, rather than stay at home. Of course " his board and his lodging in a sense, eating and sleeping, are " the necessities of a human being, whether he has an office, or " whether he has not, and therefore, of course, the cost of his " food and lodging is not wholly and exclusively laid out in the " performance of his duties, but the extra part of it is. The " extra expense of it is, and that is the quite fair way in which " the Revenue look at it." It is against the background of what I have just read that it seems to me the next passage in this judgment has to be regarded. " In this case, therefore, he would " be entitled to charge something for the extra expense which he " is put to by having to go and spend all the day, and often the " night, away from home, because that is part of his duty; and " then it comes to the question really of quantum."

The other case relied on, to which I have already referred, was Lomax v. Newton,[9] because Vaisey J., having decided that the commissioners were wrong with regard to a number of the expenses which they had allowed, then came to the fifth item, which was claimed in the following words: " ' amounts paid for " ' hotel accommodation at conferences and exercises in excess " ' of detention and ration allowances, Harrogate, 4 days, £3; " ' Buxton, 3 days, £3.' " Vaisey J. said: " This is explained " as being the actual cost to the respondent over and above the " ration and detention allowance granted. No doubt his attend- " ance at these conferences and exercises was compulsory, and " he had no choice, I am told, of the hotels at which he had " to put up, and no doubt the supplementing of the prescribed " allowances is a serious burden on a Territorial officer. The case " of Nolder v. Walters,[10] comes rather near to this point." The learned judge then read the headnote, and continued: " My chief " difficulty as regards this item is the paucity of the evidence. " The commissioners have, however, found as a fact that this " was expenditure necessarily, exclusively and wholly incurred " in the performance of the respondent's duties, and I cannot say " that they were wrong in bringing this fifth item within the rule. " Bolam v. Barlow,[11] and Ricketts v. Colquhoun,[12] may be rather " difficult to reconcile with Nolder v. Walters,[13] but I decide this " matter on the ground that I must not disturb a finding of fact " which was a possible finding both as to quantum and otherwise. " I am by no means sure that I should myself have decided this " point as the commissioners did. While I feel bound to regard " this item of £6 as having been admitted on a finding of fact " which I cannot disturb, I venture to recommend that, as a

SANDERSON v. DURBIDGE.

Wynn-Parry J.

" precedent in other cases, it should be applied with very great " caution." I might add that, as appears from the latter part of Rowlatt J.'s judgment, he in the case of Nolder v. Walters [14] had a similar hesitation in coming to the decision which he did.

In the judgment in each of those cases there is clearly a suggestion that judges who are invited to follow these cases should only do so with considerable hesitation. I must say I share that view, particularly after the detailed analysis which Mr. Bucher made of the various judgments and opinions in Ricketts v. Colquhoun.[15]

In the case before me there is a finding in these words: " On " occasions when he "—that is the respondent—" had to work in " the evenings he had to buy either tea or dinner at a restaurant. " No refreshments were provided by the council." Mr. Lyell's proposition, on which he relied, was expressed in these words: " Extra living expenses which the master requires the servant to " incur in the particular place where the duty has to be done are " to be allowed and were allowed in those two cases "—that is Nolder v. Walters [16] and Lomax v. Newton [17]—" as wholly, exclu- " sively and necessarily incurred in the duty of the office." To support that proposition he submitted that the proper construction of the finding which I have just read was that the respondent, in his capacity as servant of the council, was under some compulsion to buy either his tea or his dinner at a restaurant. I do not for myself so read the language employed by the commissioners. I quite agree that the first part of the sentence indicates compulsion as regards occasions when he had to work in the evening; that is, on occasions when, by the terms of his employment, he was properly called on by the council as his employers to work in the evenings. But so far as the second part of the sentence is concerned, " he had to buy either tea or dinner at a restaurant," those words signify no more to my mind than that the commissioners were satisfied that, if he desired to have tea or dinner, he would have to purchase such a meal at a local restaurant, the reason being provided by the next following sentence, namely, because " no refreshments were provided by the council."

It is, I think, instructive, as Mr. Bucher suggested, to consider in this regard the view expressed by Warrington L.J. in his dissenting judgment in Ricketts v. Colquhoun.[18] In the course of his judgment he said: " Now I think, and I understand on this " the Attorney-General agrees, that the words ' necessarily ' and " ' necessary ' in the rule do not mean necessary and necessarily " in the abstract, but they mean necessary in regard to the " circumstances of the individual concerned, the holder of the " office, and in regard to the ordinary usages of mankind at this " time in the history of the world." Later he says: " And, in " the same way, if there are other expenses in this case, such "as the hotel expenses, if they are necessarily, wholly and "exclusively incurred by reason of the fact that without incurring "them he cannot perform his duties, then it seems to me that a "deduction ought to be allowed in respect of them."

That really, to my mind, is what is sought in this case to be said on behalf of the respondent. I do not think that his case can be put any higher than that language with which many people have had great sympathy, but that view, as is clear, did not find favour either with the majority of the Court of Appeal or with any of their Lordships in the House of Lords. I repeat the words of Lord Blanesburgh: "In other words, the terms employed "are strictly, and, I cannot doubt, purposely, not personal but "objective."

Against that background of authority I turn to consider quite shortly what to my mind is the crucial point in this case. The claim does not concern a period before the respondent commences to perform his duties at the beginning of any day. Nor does it concern a period after he has ceased to perform those duties. It concerns a period in the course of that day, and the question is, when being ordered to remain late he takes advantage of the permission, if that is the correct word, or of his right, if it be a right, given to him to go out and have either tea or dinner, is he during that period engaged in the performance of the duties of his office or employment? I put this example during the course of the argument, and I repeat it in my judgment. It is quite clear (and it could not be argued to the contrary) that the respondent could not be said, when he goes out during what may conveniently be described as the lunch hour to have lunch, to be engaged in the performance of the duties of his office so that he could make any claim in respect of the cost to him of any meal which he might eat during that day. In the case of what I might call a normal day he will go home at the end of the normal working hours, and again he cannot make any claim for any meal which he eats when he gets home. In the case of what I may call the exceptional day, when under the terms of his employment he is required to stay late in order to attend committee meetings, he is obviously engaged in the performance of the duties of his office or employment when he is attending on the committee, just as he can be said to have been engaged in the performance of his duties during the period from after he reports in the morning up to the time he goes out to lunch, and during the period after lunch until he either goes home or, on an exceptional evening, goes out to have tea or dinner. But, having regard to the term of his employment that when required he must stay late, I can see no difference for myself in principle between the nature of the interval for lunch and the interval for tea or the interval for dinner. In my judgment this case is to be found on analysis to be completely covered by the ratio decidendi of the majority of the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords in Ricketts v.

Colquhoun,[19] and it is not a case which can be said to come within the judgment of Rowlatt J. in Nolder v. Walters [20] or that of Vaisey J. in Lomax v. Newton.[21] Both those cases, I think, are to be regarded, as the authors of the judgments would each wish them to be regarded, as somewhat in the nature of exceptions.

For these reasons, in my judgment this appeal must succeed.

Will—Construction—"Children"—Whether limited to children in esse—Gift of share of residuary estate to "my grandchildren, the "children of my son E. J. M."—Distribution to be "when the "youngest is 21 years of age."

A testator by his will directed that his residuary estate be divided into four equal parts and gave, inter alia, "one equal part "to my grandchildren (the children of my son E. J. M.) to be "administered towards their maintenance and education until the "youngest is 21 years of age and then distributed equally among "them." E. J. M. had three children, one of them born after the testator's death, all of whom were under 21 at the date of this summons. The summons raised, inter alia, the question whether the one-fourth share was held for the two children born during the testator's lifetime, or for them and such children of E. J. M. as might come into existence before the youngest such child for the time being attained the age of 21 years, or for them and all other children of E. J. M. whenever born:—

Held, (1) that the gift to the grandchildren being immediate and vested, there was a clear rule of construction that the class of grandchildren who took was confined to those in esse at the date of the testator's death—a rule to be departed from only where the testator had clearly indicated a contrary intention;

(2) that the direction to distribute the share when the youngest was 21 years of age, and to apply the income for maintenance in the meantime, was not a sufficient indication that the testator intended a larger class to take;

(3) that, accordingly, the one-fourth share was held in trust for the two children born in the testator's lifetime.

Per curiam: If this construction defeated the testator's intention, that was because he had not used language sufficiently explicit to displace the rule, which, as it was so firmly entrenched, it would be a mistake to try to whittle it away and so make it "incoherent "and capricious in its effect": see per Evershed M.R. in In re Bleckly, decd. [1951] Ch. 740, 751; [1951] 1 T.L.R. 902, 908; [1951] 1 All E.R. 1064, 1070.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By his will, dated July 28, 1944, Henry James Manners (hereinafter called "the testator") gave pecuniary legacies, including £5,000 to buy an annuity, and gave the balance of the £5,000 after purchase of the annuity "to my grandchildren, that "is, the children of my son Eric James Manners." He divided his residuary estate into four equal parts and gave ". . . one "part to my grandchildren (the children of my son Eric James "Manners) to be administered towards their maintenance and "education until the youngest is 21 years of age and then "distributed equally among them." At the date of the will the son had two children. On April 5, 1947, the testator died, both of the son's children being then under 21 years of age. On March 25, 1948, both children still being infants, the Public Trustee, as executor and trustee of the will, took out this summons for the determination of questions of construction arising thereon. In October, 1948, the summons came before the court and, in June, 1949, Wynn-Parry J. made declarations on the first three questions which it raised and which are not material hereto.

Question 4 was, whether the class of children of Eric James Manners to whom the sum of £5,000 or the balance thereof remaining after the purchase of the annuity was given consisted of (a) the two children born in the testator's lifetime, or (b) them and any other other children of Eric James Manners who might be born after the date of the summons. Question 5 was, whether one-fourth of the testator's residuary estate was held in trust for (a) the two children born during the testator's lifetime, or (b) for them and such other children of Eric James Manners as might come into existence before the youngest such child for the time being attained the age of 21 years, or (c) for the two children born in the testator's lifetime and all other children of Eric James Manners whenever born: and, in each alternative, whether the interests of the two born in the testator's lifetime and of any other grandchildren in that one-fourth share were or were not contingent on his, her or their attaining the age of 21 years.

Questions 4 and 5 Wynn-Parry J. directed to stand over as long as the two children born during the testator's lifetime were both alive and under the age of 21 years, and no other grandchild of the testator had been born: and he directed also that all further proceedings be stayed, except as against the two born during the testator's lifetime.

On September 17, 1950, a third child was born to Eric James Manners. On April 5, 1955, this summons, to which the third child was added as a defendant, came before the court for the determination of questions 4 and 5, the two children born in the testator's lifetime being still under 21 years of age.

Cur. adv. vult.

1955. April 6. UPJOHN J. read the following judgment: The testator, Henry James Manners, died on April 5, 1947. His will, dated July 28, 1944, gave rise to a number of questions of construction, and an originating summons was issued in 1948 to determine those questions. The summons was heard in 1949, when it appeared that two of the questions, Nos. 4 and 5, raised what were then future questions, and they were ordered to stand over generally. The other questions were determined, and proceedings against all the defendants except the third and fourth defendants, Delene Cheryl Manners and Roy Axel Manners, have been stayed. The third and fourth defendants are the children of the testator's son, Eric James Manners, and they were both born in the testator's lifetime. Since his death, Eric James Manners has had further issue, namely, a son, Max Manners, who was born on September 17, 1950, and who has been added by amendment as a defendant to the originating summons. His birth makes it necessary now to determine questions 4 and 5. None of the children has attained the age of 21 years.

By his will the testator made a number of pecuniary bequests, among them one in this form: "I give and bequeath "£5,000 to purchase an annuity of £250 per annum less tax for "Amelia Martha Manners; the balance of this £5,000 after the "purchase of this annuity of £250 per annum less tax I give and "bequeath to my grandchildren, that is the children of my son "Eric James Manners."

Question 4 on the summons asks whether the balance of the sum of £5,000, after providing for the annuity, ought to be held for the defendants Roy Axel Manners and Delene Cheryl Manners, or whether the class includes Max and any other after-born children of Eric James Manners.

[1] [1927] 1 Ch. 466. [2] (1807) 14 Ves. 256.

It is conceded that, as the gift of the balance is an immediate gift, the class is closed at the death of the testator, and that Max and any later-born children of Eric James Manners are excluded, and I shall declare accordingly.

The testator divided his residue into four equal parts, and his directions with regard to one part give rise to a question of difficulty. The relevant terms of the will are as follows: " . . . " one part to my grandchildren (the children of my son Eric " James Manners) to be administered towards their maintenance " and education until the youngest is 21 years of age and then " distributed equally among them." Question 5 of the summons suggests that there may be three possible ways of considering this gift. The question is in these terms: " 5. Whether on the " true construction of the will of the testator one-fourth share of " his residuary estate is held upon trust (a) for the defendants " Roy Axel Manners and Delene Cheryl Manners, or (b) for the " said defendants and such other children of the defendant Eric " James Manners as may come into existence before the youngest " such child for the time being living attains the age of 21 years, " or (c) for the said defendants and all other children of the " defendant Eric James Manners whenever born. . . ." No one has been found to support alternative (b), and the whole argument has been directed to alternatives (a) and (c). Mr. Nesbitt, for the two older children, submitted in the first place that the testator had provided his own dictionary, as he had used similar words in the gift of the legacy, and he could not have intended a different class to take a share of the residue.

I feel unable to accept this submission. In the gift of residue the testator has attached certain directions as to maintenance and distribution not attached to the legacy, and I cannot assume he necessarily intended the same class to take.

Secondly, Mr. Nesbitt argued that on the true construction of the will there is a clear immediate absolute gift of corpus which must be construed as a gift then in esse at the testator's death. There is a superadded direction postponing the time of payment, and in accordance with well-settled principles in such a case the court will reject the superadded direction which merely postpones the enjoyment of the gift. See In re Couturier,[1] where the broad principle laid down by Page Wood V.-C. in Gosling v. Gosling [2] is cited with approval.

Mr. Nesbitt relied very strongly on Smith v. Jackson.[3] It was a decision of Sir John Leach V.-C. and, except for the interposition of life interests in residue to the testator's widow and daughter and the survivor, the terms of the relevant codicil were indistinguishable from the present case. Leach said [4]: "Here the time of payment is when the youngest "shall attain the age of 21. The testator must mean the "youngest of the children who are to take; and the real question "is whether the gift is confined to great-grandchildren living at "the death of Mary Jackson, or includes all great-grandchildren "at whatever time born." Later on he said [5]: "No person can "doubt, that if the gift in the codicil had stopped at these words "'in trust for all and every the child and children of my said "'granddaughters,' there would have been a clear vested "interest in the children living at the death of the testator's "widow. The codicil, however, does not stop here; it goes on to "direct payment when the youngest shall attain the age of 21. "But if there be a present interest given in general words, it is "not the less a vested interest because the payment is referred "to a future time. This is the general principle; according to "it, there would be a vested interest in all the great-grand-"children living at the death of Mary Jackson; and this general "principle must prevail unless there be found in the instrument, "that is to receive a construction, something declaring a con-"trary intention." He concluded his judgment in these words [6]: "The principle on which I proceed is—that, unless something is "found to control the general principle of construction, the "direct words of bequest in the codicil give a vested interest to "the great-grandchildren living at the death of the survivor of "the widow, Mary Jackson, and the daughter, Mary Smith; and "that to control this vested interest, a clear expression of particu-"lar intention must be found. In this codicil, however, far from "finding anything in the other clauses to control the general "principle, all the directions are in favour of it. Therefore, the "great-grandchildren living at the death of the survivor of the "widow and daughter must be held to have taken a vested "interest at that time; and, consequently, after-born children "are excluded."

That decision is not mentioned in the latest editions of Theobald or Hawkins on Wills, and is treated as inconsistent with the later authorities in a footnote on p. 1680 of the eighth edition of Jarman on Wills. I must refer to those authorities, in none of which was Smith v. Jackson [7] cited.

The first is Mainwaring v. Beevor.[8] The relevant gift was that as soon as all and every the testator's grandchildren attained 21 the subject-matter of the gift was to be divided among such grandchildren. Later the testator declared that each of his grandchildren on their severally attaining the age of 21 years should take vested interests under the will. That is sufficient to distinguish that case from this, for the gift to grandchildren was not vested at the testator's death. Wigram V.-C. came to the conclusion that as a matter of construction a child born after the death of the testator was included in the class of those who took, and held that there could be no artificial closing of the class when the youngest in esse at any time attained the age of 21 years so as to exclude after-born grandchildren.

The next case is Armitage v. Williams.[9] In that case there was a gift to the children of M. A. Williams and R. Williams (who were brother and sister) on their attaining the age of 21 years. At the date of the death of the testator neither M. A. Williams nor R. Williams was married. Lord Romilly M.R. held that the class must remain open to include all the children of M. A. Williams and R. Williams born at any time, and there could be no artificial closing of the class when the first child attained the age of 21 years. That case is clearly distinguishable, for the decision was in accordance with another well-known rule, namely, that where no one in the class is alive at the death of the testator the class remains open, even where the gift is an immediate vested gift.

The last authority is an Irish case, In re Pilkington.[10] In that case a testator directed that his residue should accumulate until the children of " A " by his wife " B " should arrive at the age of 21 years each, and then the whole of the proceeds to be divided share and share alike between them. There was a gift over if none of the children attained 21. Porter M.R. held that there was a gift to all the children of " A " and " B," whether born in the lifetime of the testator or not. That conclusion was reached (rightly or wrongly) largely because the testator referred to the children of " A " and " B " and did not include the children by another mother. The Master of the Rolls also held that each child's share should be vested on the child attaining 21 years of age.

The real controversy in that case was whether the rule in Andrews v. Partington[11] applied. Having reached the conclusion on the true construction of that will that after-born children took, the Master of the Rolls necessarily came to the conclusion, supported by Mainwaring v. Becvor[12] and Armitage v. Williams,[13] that the class was to remain open until all the children had attained the age of 21 years, and there could be no closing of the class when the oldest attained the age of 21. That case is, therefore, plainly distinguishable from the present case.

Mr. Vick, for the youngest child, relied on the last three cases which I have mentioned in support of his submission that where there is a gift to be distributed when the youngest child attains 21 years of age, it matters not whether the gift is vested or contingent, for the testator is indicating an intention to benefit all the children, whenever born, and that the ordinary rule closing the class at death is displaced. He further submitted that although this was an immediate gift, yet the possession or enjoyment is postponed until the youngest child attains 21 years of age. Therefore, although the share of residue vests in those in esse at the death, the class remains open to let in any after-born children. He referred me to Oppenheim v. Henry.[14] In that case the testator made a gift to his grandchildren to be distributed at the expiration of 20 years from his death. Page Wood V.-C. held that gift vested in those grandchildren living at the death of the testator and those born afterwards but before the period of distribution.

Those cases are not easy to reconcile, but each of them depended essentially upon the true construction of the words used by the testator, and they do not form a sure guide to other cases. The real problem—and I find it a difficult one—is to ascertain the class of grandchildren who take. It is conceded that the gift is immediate and is vested. That, in my judgment, is the cardinal point in this case. In these circumstances, there is a clear rule of construction that the class is confined to those in esse at the date of the death, which is only to be departed from where the testator has clearly indicated a contrary intention. So strong is the rule that it is equally applicable to a gift to "all" the children of "A," although, as has often been pointed out, the apparent intentions of the testator may thereby be defeated. Moreover, although the authorities are conflicting, the better opinion seems to be that in a gift of personalty the rule is equally applicable to a gift to all the children of "A" "begotten and to be begotten." See the authorities discussed in Jarman on Wills, 8th ed., vol. 3, pp. 1690 et seq., and the opinion of Williams J. in his book Williams on Executors and Administrators (1879), 8th ed., p. 1094, quoted with approval in Dias v. De Livera.[15]

That being the general rule, the question is whether the direction to distribute the share when the youngest is 21 years of age, and to apply the income for maintenance in the meantime, is a sufficient indication that the testator intended a larger class to take. I do not think that it is. As Leach V.-C. pointed out, the testator must mean that the gift is distributable when the youngest of the children who are to take attains the age of 21. The direction as to distribution and maintenance throws no light on the question what class is to take and who are to be maintained in the meantime. Distribution takes place when the youngest taker, whoever he may be, attains 21 years of age. It is quite different from a case where a testator directs his estate to be accumulated for a fixed period, as in Oppenheim v. Henry.[16] In my judgment, the children to take must be ascertained in accordance with the rule I have mentioned, for there is insufficient context to displace it. Therefore, the gift vests in the two older children; it will be distributable by the testator's direction when the younger of those attains 21 years of age, and they alone will be maintained thereout in the meantime. However, on the principle stated earlier in this judgment, the elder on attaining 21 years of age can call for his share. That construction may defeat the testator's real intention, but, if it does, that is because, in my judgment, he has failed to use sufficiently explicit language to displace the rule of construction. It is, in my judgment, a mistake to try and whittle away so firmly entrenched a rule and thereby to make it "incoherent and capricious in its effect," to borrow the words of Evershed M.R., when considering the analogous rule in Andrews v. Partington.[17] See In re Bleckly.[18]

Road Traffic—Disqualification—Driving while disqualified—Sentence of imprisonment—Period for which disqualification should be imposed—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 43), s. 7 (4).

Where a court imposes a sentence of imprisonment on an offender for a motoring offence and also disqualifies him from driving, the period of disqualification should exceed that of the imprisonment, because, as disqualification dates from conviction, if the periods are the same, the disqualification will be operative only for the period during which the offender earns remission of his prison sentence.

The appellant pleaded Guilty to three offences of driving while disqualified and was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment and disqualified from driving for 12 months. On appeal against sentence:—

Held, that, in all the circumstances, the disqualification should be increased to a period of three years.

section 7 (4) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. He was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment and was disqualified from driving for 12 months.

He appealed.

The appellant appeared in person.

The Crown was not represented.

LORD GODDARD C.J. Parliament has treated driving when disqualified as a very serious offence. It is one of the offences in the Road Traffic Act, 1930, for which it is prescribed that a sentence of imprisonment shall be passed unless, having regard to the special circumstances of the case, the court comes to the conclusion that a fine will suffice. That cannot be suggested here. If, for example, a sudden emergency arose owing to a man's wife or child being ill and he wanted to drive a car to fetch a doctor, that might be a special circumstance, but in the ordinary case the court is not given a discretion but must impose imprisonment, as was done in the present case.

The reason why the court gave leave to appeal was that quarter sessions not only sentenced the appellant to 12 months' imprisonment, but also disqualified him for 12 months. That has been done more than once and it is time that courts should realize that it is not the least use disqualifying a man merely for the period during which he is going to be in prison. Of course he will not be able to drive in prison, and to sentence a man to 12 months' and to disqualification for 12 months is only disqualifying him for the very short period of his remission. For instance, if he is sentenced to imprisonment for 12 months, he will get a remission of one-third and it means that the disqualification will only be effective for four months. That is not enough for such a serious offence. For that reason the court gave leave to appeal and they want it to be remembered that when courts are disqualifying persons from driving it is useless merely to disqualify for the period for which they are passing the sentence. Unfortunately as the law stands at present, though it may be that the Road Traffic Bill now before Parliament may make an alteration, the disqualification must date from the conviction. Therefore, if a man is convicted and sentenced to 12 months' and disqualified for 12 months the disqualification will be running all the time he is in prison.

The court thinks that this is a very bad case. They do not alter the sentence of imprisonment, but the disqualification will be for three years, to date from conviction.

Sentence varied.

Family Provision — Child — Daughter unmarried — Departure from paternal home to live as wife of married man—Testator under no moral obligation to maintain daughter after departure from home —Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938 (1 & 2 Geo. 6, c. 45), s. 1 (1) (b).

The plaintiff left home in 1911 and went to live as the wife of a man who was then, and who remained, a married man. She had continued to live with him ever since, and had never married; her evidence was that by reason of ill-health she was now unable to work. Her father by his will, made in 1953, made no provision for her. She asked that an order under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, as amended by the Intestates' Estates Act, 1952, should be made for her out of the net estate of the testator; she claimed to be entitled as an unmarried daughter and as a dependant incapable of maintaining herself within the meaning of section 1 (1) (b) of the Act of 1938:—

Held, that after the plaintiff left home to set up a permanent relationship with the man, although not legally married to him, the testator ceased to have any moral obligation to maintain her or to make any provision by his will for her maintenance, whether she claimed as an unmarried daughter or as a dependant incapable of maintaining herself, and that her claim therefore failed.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

Edward Andrews, by his will dated July 15, 1953, made no provision for the plaintiff, Alice Harriet Andrews, who was one of his three daughters then living. The testator died on August 24, 1953. The plaintiff took out the present summons under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, as amended by the Intestates' Estates Act, 1952, asking that reasonable provision be made for her maintenance out of the net estate of the testator, on the ground that she was an unmarried daughter of the testator and a dependant incapable of maintaining herself within the meaning of section 1 (1) (b) of the Act of 1938.[1]

The plaintiff was born on August 29, 1886. In 1911 she left the parental home and went to live as the wife of a Mr. Phillips, who was then, and at all material times remained, a married man.

ANDREWS, DECD., In re. ANDREWS v. SMORFITT.

She had never married and had ever since continued to live with Phillips, by whom she had six children. The testator became estranged from the plaintiff when she left home, but subsequently he was reconciled with her. She stayed with him on a number of occasions and at times looked after him. In 1951 she and one of her sons looked after the testator for a time while he was ill. The testator accused them of stealing a number of articles during that visit. The plaintiff and her son strenuously denied the theft, and said the testator had given them the articles. She stated in a letter written on her behalf that she would return the articles if the accusations of theft were withdrawn.

Her evidence was that in 1951, before the quarrel, the testator had shown her a will in which she was included as a beneficiary with her two sisters. She was now in bad health and unable to work, Phillips was also unable to work on account of ill-health, and they were in receipt of national assistance. Her children, by reason of their own difficulties, were unable to assist her financially.

Cases referred to in argument: In re Borthwick [2]; In re Inns [3]; In re Joslin.[4]

WYNN-PARRY J. Before the passing of the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, a testator had under English law an unqualified right to dispose of his property by will, and unless his disposition was so capricious as to lead to the conclusion that he could not be treated as being of sound testamentary capacity, there was no means of qualifying or in any way frustrating the provisions of his will. The Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, as amended by the Intestates' Estates Act, 1952, constitutes an invasion of that unqualified right of disposition and it is, therefore, but natural that in exercising the jurisdiction conferred upon them by these Acts the courts have on numerous occasions been careful to point out that the jurisdiction is one which should be exercised only with great circumspection and only to a limited extent. It is clear, partly from the decided cases and partly from a perusal of section 1 of the Act of 1938, that a most important, if not the most important, consideration which the court should have in mind is the extent to which, if at all, the testator was under a moral obligation to the person claiming relief.

In the present case the plaintiff, who is 69 years of age, is a daughter of the testator. She has not in fact been married and, therefore, on the strict words of section 1 (1) (b) of the Act of 1938, she is a person who is entitled to bring an application such as this. According to the evidence, she is now suffering from physical disability and is incapable of maintaining herself and, therefore, on an equally strict reading of section 1 (1) (b), she is, for that reason also, in a position to invoke the jurisdiction of the court; but she cannot be successful in an application based on either of the two grounds in subparagraph (b) unless it is demonstrated that in all the circumstances the testator was under some moral obligation to her, with the result that by excluding her entirely from his will, as the testator did in this case, he has failed to make reasonable provision for her maintenance.

The relevant facts in this case lie within a narrow compass. The plaintiff left the parental home as long ago as the year 1911; she left in order to set up house with a Mr. Phillips, and but for the circumstance that he was then, and has over the period ever since remained, a married man, she would have married him. She left the parental home quite clearly to set up a permanent home with Mr. Phillips, and no doubt relying on him to provide her with the companionship and the protection, financial and otherwise, which she would have had a right to expect from him if they could have been and had been joined in wedlock. In my view, it necessarily follows that from the time when it could be postulated that she had set up this permanent relationship and home with Mr. Phillips then, notwithstanding that she was not legally married to him, her father ceased to have any moral obligation with regard to her maintenance, and he ceased to have any moral obligation to provide for her by his will. The same reasoning must apply to a consideration of the second part of subparagraph (b) of section 1 (1) of the Act, and I approach a consideration of the events to which I am about to refer on the basis that, as I find, the testator had long ceased to have any moral obligation for either of the reasons mentioned in subparagraph (b) of section 1 (1) to provide for this daughter.

The evidence shows that after some lapse of time a reconciliation was effected between the father and the daughter, and upon a number of occasions she stayed with him and upon a number of occasions looked after him; and it is clear that, at any rate, in the early part of the year 1951, the then intention of the testator was to leave his estate, at any rate so far as the residue was concerned, equally among his three daughters. His position then, so far as this Act was concerned, was, as I find it, one in which he was completely free either to give effect to that intention or to alter it.

In the spring of 1951 very strong differences arose between the testator, on the one hand, and the plaintiff and her son on the other. As a result of a visit which the plaintiff and her son paid to the testator it was said and maintained by the testator for the rest of his life that the plaintiff and her son had removed from his home a number of chattels without his authority or consent and refused to return them, and he made the serious charge against them of having deliberately stolen them. The plaintiff and her son, both of whom have given evidence in this case, strenuously deny that, and say that such items as they admit to removing from the testator's home were given to them by him, and that in effect they would have been willing to return them had he modified his attitude by withdrawing the very serious suggestion that the plaintiff and her son had stolen them. I think that it is only fair to the plaintiff and her son to say that whether or not (on which I make no observation) they were well advised to take up the attitude which they did take, it appears to me that there was a considerable amount of exaggeration on the part of the testator, and I certainly do not believe that the plaintiff and her son, as the testator suggested, deliberately robbed him while he was ill in bed, thinking that he would not recover and that, therefore, they might safely get possession of the chattels before other members of the testator's family. It seems to me, on the view which I have already expressed of the testator's moral obligations towards the plaintiff in 1951, that none of those matters are relevant. If they were at all relevant, they would only serve to show why the testator took the attitude which he did. But, as I have come to the conclusion that at the time he made his will he was in fact under no moral obligation to the plaintiff, he was entitled, however mistaken may have been his belief as to what the plaintiff and her son had done, to order his testamentary disposition exactly as he pleased.

ANDREWS, DECD., In re. ANDREWS v. SMORFITT.

Wynn-Parry J.

It amounts, therefore, to this, that in my opinion I have no right in this case to interfere with the testator's will and to re-make that will, as I should have to do if I interfered, by including something in the nature of a legacy for the plaintiff.

For those short reasons this summons fails and must be dismissed.

Summons dismissed.

Practice—Pleadings—Striking out.

In the first action the plaintiffs, a reporter and news editor respectively on the staff of the "Sunday Chronicle," claimed damages for libel in an article appearing in the "World's Press News and "Advertiser's Review," a weekly journal which had a large circulation in journalistic circles, and pleaded that the words complained of meant and were understood to mean "that each of the plaintiffs "was an incompetent journalist and/or . . . instrumental in causing "the editor of the 'Sunday Chronicle' to pay a wildly extravagant "price for the publication rights of a series of newspaper articles ". . . and/or one whose efforts in collecting material for publica-"tion in the 'Sunday Chronicle' merited ironic and derisory "comments in journalistic circles." The defendants requested and received from the plaintiffs particulars pursuant to R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 6 (2), of the facts and matters on which they relied in support of the meanings alleged in the innuendo.

Five weeks after the first article there appeared in the issue of the same journal a headline which read "Webb tells court he "arranged for Comer to write for the 'S. Chronicle.'" In the second action the plaintiffs pleaded the same innuendo as in the first action and, in giving particulars under R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 6 (2), referred to the article which was the subject of that action, stated that they would rely on the facts given as particulars in the first action, and alleged that the headline in the subsequent issue of the periodical was intended to refer readers back to the earlier article and to assure them that the words therein used, with the meanings ascribed to them in the innuendo, were true and justifiable.

The defendants applied in both actions to strike out all the words of the innuendoes after "incompetent journalist" under R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 27, and R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4:—

Held, (1) that the first action was not so plain and obvious a case that recourse should be had under the rules for striking out the pleading.

(2) That the headline which appeared five weeks after the first article could not reasonably be calculated to refer readers back to the first article and to confirm the words therein contained and that the innuendo should therefore be struck out.

" immediate consequence of the scoop he obtained by persuading " Billy Hill to confess that he is the King of the Underworld, he " has been inundated with offers of their life-stories from other " self-styled underworld kings. All, of course, want money. The " trouble is that Webb has, for professional reasons, made friends " of these people for years. Failure to please them involves the " risk of losing invaluable contacts and sources of information." Then there was a heading, " Too many Crime Scoops," and the article continued: " A few weeks ago the leader of the gang " which planned to rob London Airport of £1,000,000 worth of " gold bullion came out of Dartmoor after serving six of his nine- " years' sentence. ' I would like to help you,' said Webb, ' but " ' what can I do? How can I run your yarn while we are " ' publishing Billy Hill's, the greatest of all crime stories?' " Then another old-timer, Jack Spot, a lieutenant of Billy Hill, " reminded Webb that he had promised him his story some years " ago. ' If it's time for Billy to tell his,' he said, ' it's past time " ' for me to cash in, and get out, while the going is good.' " Other offers have pestered Webb so much that he has been " obliged to introduce his underworld acquaintances to other " newspapermen. ' If I don't do something for them,' he told " me, ' they'll probably sell their loyalty elsewhere. And after " ' I've shown them how to treat newspapermen to their own best " ' advantage!' " There was then the heading, " Had to Help " a Rival," and the article continued: " So Webb has now intro- " duced Jack Spot to an old friend, Jack Greenslade of the " ' Sunday Chronicle,' and, so pleased is Greenslade's editor to " get the life story of anyone in the underworld known to Webb " that he has offered Spot the record sum of more than £4,000 for " it. The irony of this situation is that Spot had told Webb, " ' Sure, I can't help accepting that offer. But I'm not going to " ' let you down. I'll have to save enough for you for later on, " ' when you want another underworld story.' Yes, Webb is now " so overwhelmed with the life stories of ex-criminals that he has " been forced to farm them out to opposition papers in order to " hold on to his contacts and the chance of further scoops, he " hopes, in the years to come."

The plaintiffs in the first action, Greenslade and Mellor, were respectively a crime reporter and news editor on the staff of the " Sunday Chronicle," and the defendants, Hannen Swaffer, Beverley's Ld., World's Press News Publishing Co. Ld., and Weal, were the author of the article, and the printers, publishers and editor of the " World's Press News and Advertiser's Review." The plaintiffs pleaded that " The said words meant and were " understood to mean that each of the plaintiffs was an incom- " petent journalist and/or one who was instrumental in causing " the editor of the ' Sunday Chronicle ' to pay a wildly extrava- " gant price for the publication rights of a series of newspaper " articles and/or one who had taken steps to induce the editor to " feature a series of articles which would not contain all the " information which it would purport to contain and/or one whose " efforts in collecting material for publication in the ' Sunday " ' Chronicle ' merited ironic and derisory comments in journalistic " circles."

The plaintiffs, at the defendants' request, having provided particulars under R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 6 (2), the defendants issued a summons to strike out all the words complained of after " incompetent journalist " under R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 27, and Ord. 25, r. 4. On April 6, 1955, Master Diamond dismissed the application, and on April 28, 1955, Havers J. allowed the defendants' appeal from the master's order. The plaintiffs now appealed.

In the issue of the " World's Press News and Advertiser's Review " dated November 26, 1954, there appeared a report of proceedings in a magistrate's court beneath the headline: " Webb " tells court he arranged for Comer to write for ' S. Chronicle.' "

The plaintiffs in the second action were the same as in the first action, and the defendants were the publishers and editor of the review. The plaintiffs pleaded an innuendo in the same terms as in the first action, and added that " Comer " and " Webb " referred to in the headline in the second issue were respectively the " Jack Spot " and the " Duncan Webb " referred to in the first article. It was alleged in the pleadings that the headline in the second issue was intended to refer readers back to the earlier article and was a further assurance to such readers that the words used therein, together with the meaning ascribed to them by the plaintiffs in the innuendoes, were true and justifiable.

On March 28, 1955, Master Diamond ordered, upon a summons by the defendants, that the words in the innuendo after " incompetent journalist " should be struck out, and on appeal to Havers J. it was ordered that the whole of the innuendo should be struck out. The plaintiffs now appealed.

MORRIS L.J. These are two appeals which we have heard together from orders made by Havers J. in two libel actions. The questions which were in issue were whether certain words in the statements of claim should be struck out. There was a publication on October 22, 1954, of an article in a journal called " The " World's Press News."

[His Lordship here read the article complained of, and continued:] On October 22, 1954, a writ was issued by Greenslade and

Mellor, both journalists, the first plaintiff being a crime reporter on the "Sunday Chronicle" and the second the news editor of that newspaper. The action was brought against the writer of the article, the printers, the publishers and the editor of the journal. In the statement of claim, which is dated November 19, 1954, the words complained of are set out and an innuendo is pleaded in this way: "The said words meant and were understood to "mean that each of the plaintiffs was an incompetent journalist "and/or one who was instrumental in causing the editor of the "said 'Sunday Chronicle' to pay a wildly extravagant price for "the publication rights of a series of newspaper articles and/or "one who had taken steps to induce the said editor to feature a "series of articles which would not contain all the information "which it would purport to contain and/or one whose efforts in "collecting material for publication in the 'Sunday Chronicle' "merited ironic and derisory comments in journalistic circles."

Shortly after that date there was published in the same journal, in the issue of November 26, 1954, an account of certain proceedings which had taken place in a magistrate's court under the heading "Webb tells court he arranged for Comer to write for "'S. Chronicle.'"

The statement of claim in the first action, the only action to which I have so far referred, having been delivered, application was made for particulars. Before 1949 it was not the practice to order particulars of the facts and matters relied on to support a plea that words complained of were used in a sense other than their ordinary meaning; but it is now provided by R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 6 (2), as follows: "In an action for libel or slander "if the plaintiff alleges that the words or matter complained of "were used in a defamatory sense other than their ordinary "meaning, he shall give particulars of the facts and matters on "which he relies in support of such sense." The defendants in the first action asked for certain particulars including particulars of the facts and matters relied on in support of the allegation that the words complained of were used in a defamatory sense other than their ordinary meaning, specifying the same. Full particulars were delivered in the early part of December, 1954.

In December, 1954, a second action was brought by the same two plaintiffs against the publishers and the editor of the "World's Press News." In that action the words which were complained of were merely the words of the heading above referred to, i.e., "Webb tells court he arranged for Comer to "write for 'Sunday Chronicle.'" The innuendo pleaded was exactly the same as the innuendo pleaded in the first action. Particulars were delivered in the statement of claim on the facts relied on to support the innuendo, and those particulars incorporated the particulars given under the statement of claim in the previous action. Subparagraph (5) of the particulars was expressed as follows: "The plaintiffs contend that such headline "is intended to refer readers back to the earlier article and is a " further assurance to such readers that the words used therein " together with the meanings ascribed to them by these plaintiffs " are true and justifiable." The statement of claim in the second action was delivered on February 12, 1955. An application was made thereafter in this action in the following terms: " An " application on the part of the defendants in the said action for " the striking out from the plaintiffs' statement of claim all the " words in paragraph 5 thereof "—that is, the paragraph pleading the innuendo—" after the words ' incompetent journalist ' under " Ord. 19, r. 27, and Ord. 25, r. 4, of the Rules of the Supreme " Court." That application was heard by Master Diamond on March 28, 1955, and the application succeeded. On April 1, 1955, a similar application was made to the master in the first action, and again it was an application for the striking out from paragraph 5 of the statement of claim in that action of all the words after the words " incompetent journalist." On April 6 that application failed. The defendants then gave notice of appeal against the refusal of the master of their application in the first action; and the plaintiffs gave notice of appeal in regard to the master's order in the second action. The plaintiffs were then out of time, but they asked for an extension of time. Both those appeals came before Havers J. on April 28. As to the first action the judge allowed the appeal. As to the second action Havers J. gave leave to treat the summons in that action as amended as if the application had been to strike out the whole of paragraph 5, and ordered that the whole of paragraph 5 be struck out. Though the more extended view of the matter that commended itself to the learned judge was formed by him without the prompting of a submission from Mr. Faulks, whose contention had been in support of the limited objective, Mr. Faulks does agree that if his contentions were correct they logically did result in going the whole distance and not only the partial distance set out in the application which was made. If any further submissions were available to Mr. Baillieu directed to the question whether the judge should make an order going beyond what had originally been asked for, then I think there was opportunity to put them; but I think the position really was that all the submissions had been fully put to the learned judge, and it became a question for him as to what conclusions he formed as a result of them. Because of his conclusions, the amendment to which I have referred was made.

The two applications were made both under Ord. 19, r. 27, and under Ord. 25, r. 4. It is, I think, well established (as is set out in the Annual Practice (1955 ed.) at p. 366 in the notes to Ord. 19, r. 27) that " the court is not to dictate to parties how " they should frame their case. . . . But that rule is, of course, " subject to this modification and limitation, that the parties must " not offend against the rules of pleading which have been laid " down by the law; and if a party introduces a pleading which " is unnecessary, and it tends to prejudice, embarrass, and delay

C. A.

Morris L.J.

" the trial of the action, it then becomes a pleading which is " beyond his right." Ord. 25, r. 4, provides: " The court or a " judge may order any pleading to be struck out, on the ground " that it discloses no reasonable cause of action or answer, and " in any such case or in case of the action or defence being shown " by the pleadings to be frivolous or vexatious, the court or a " judge may order the action to be stayed or dismissed, or judg- " ment to be entered accordingly, as may be just." In the notes to that rule in the Annual Practice, at p. 421, there is a reference to the well-established principle that " It is only in plain and " obvious cases that recourse should be had to the summary " process under this rule."

In regard to the first action, I have formed the view that the decision of the master was correct and that no part of paragraph 5 of the statement of claim should have been struck out. Having arrived at this view, I think it is undesirable that I should say anything beyond what is essential. No defence has yet been filed. We do not know and we are not concerned in any way with the nature or the merits of the issues which may be raised. The particulars under paragraph 5 in the first action alleged that certain facts were generally known to the readers of the " World's " Press News ": for example, in paragraph 4, " That it was the " duty of the first-named plaintiff under the direction of the " second-named plaintiff to collect such material," that is, material for publication of the kind referred to in paragraph 3. In paragraph 7, " That the best news editors and reporters are " those who can collect the best material on the best terms "; paragraph 9, " That both the plaintiffs had been actively engaged " in the search for material for this series of articles for approxi- " mately two years before the publication of the article com- " plained of." If all, or indeed, some of the facts alleged, are proved, I feel unable to say that it would not be open to a judge or jury to say that the words complained of are defamatory of the plaintiffs because they bear the meanings alleged in paragraph 5 of the statement of claim. All that it is necessary to say is that there is no case for striking out. I may add that even as matters at present stand it would be open to a judge or jury to hold that the words complained of bear the meaning that the plaintiffs are incompetent journalists, and it might be said that the words at present struck out merely denote the type of incompetence said to have been meant. But it is not necessary further to consider the question as to how matters would stand if the words struck out remained excluded. In my judgment, they should not be excluded, and, as to the first action, I would allow the appeal.

In regard to the second action, to test the matters raised, I think it is useful to consider what would happen if there were a trial with a jury. If words in their natural and ordinary sense are innocent or meaningless, then a judge must leave it to a jury to say whether they constitute a libel on a plaintiff if there is evidence of facts which would reasonably induce the persons to whom the words were published to understand them in a secondary and defamatory sense. We are not concerned in these proceedings with any question as to whether the words in their natural and ordinary sense are capable of a meaning defamatory of the plaintiffs. It may be common ground that they are not. The issue here really is whether, assuming complete proof of all the facts relied on, it can reasonably be said that any case is or could be set up. The words of the alleged libel are those which I have read, "Webb tells court he arranged for Comer to write "for 'S. Chronicle,'" that is to say, the "Sunday Chronicle." It certainly seems at first blush a startling suggestion that those words referred to and defamed Greenslade and Mellor. Then, in paragraph 5, it is said that the words bear the meanings alleged, and particulars are given which incorporate the particulars in the first action. In particular, I think it is necessary to have in mind subparagraph (5): "The plaintiffs contend that "such headline is intended to refer readers back to the earlier "article and is a further assurance to such readers that the words "used therein, together with the meanings ascribed to them by "these plaintiffs, are true and justifiable."

I think it is common ground that the word "intended" in that passage should be read in the sense of "calculated." It is therefore said that this headline is calculated to refer readers back to the earlier article. There is no reference to the earlier article, so clearly a reader of the words of the headline who had not read the earlier article would not be referred back. But even if an assiduous reader by a reading of the headline of November 26 had his memory stirred in regard to the first article (which, incidentally, had appeared some five weeks earlier), I do not think there is anything in the second words, the words of the headline, calculated to assure him of the truth of the earlier words with their innuendoes. I cannot accept the view that the words of the headline constitute a confirmation of the earlier published words with their alleged meaning that the plaintiffs were incompetent journalists who had caused their editor to pay an extravagant price for deficient and inadequate material. The words of the headline do not seem even remotely to suggest this. The theory is that there is some sort of relation back and that these words of the headline constitute a kind of repetition or reaffirmation of the first words with their innuendoes. Though I greatly admire the acumen and ingenuity which have inspired that suggestion, I say with the utmost respect that it seems to me to be altogether too far-fetched. I do not think that it is sufficiently acceptable to raise a reasonable case, and I consider therefore that Havers J. was correct in ordering that paragraph 5 of the statement of claim be struck out. I would, therefore, as to the second action, dismiss the appeal.

JENKINS L.J. I agree, and I have only to add as regards the second action a word about the course taken by the judge in suggesting that the reference in paragraph 5 to the incompetence of the plaintiffs as journalists should be struck out, although the summons had not asked that those words should be struck out and they had not been struck out before the learned master. In my view, that departure from strict procedure should not be allowed to affect the result in this case. The judge was, I think, right in the view which he took that the whole of the innuendo alleged in paragraph 5 must stand or fall together, that is to say if the remainder of the paragraph could not be supported the reference to the incompetence of the plaintiffs as journalists could not be supported either. That being so, I think the course he took, which was taken in the presence of both counsel, was properly taken, with a view to saving costs, for it followed from the learned judge's decision (which in my view was right) that if a fresh summons had been taken out to strike out the opening part of paragraph 5 it would have been a foregone conclusion that the order would have been made. I have nothing to add apart from that on either case. For the reasons my brother has given, I think that the first appeal should be allowed and the second appeal dismissed.

* ADAMS v. WAR OFFICE.

Crown Proceedings—Liability of Crown in tort—Pension—Death of soldier on duty—Certificate by Minister of Pensions that death attributable to service—Refusal by Minister to award pension to parents of soldier—Action in tort by parent on behalf of estate—Liability of War Office—Crown Proceedings Act, 1947 (10 & 11 Geo. 6, c. 44), s. 10—Royal Warrant of May 24, 1949 (Cmd. 7699), arts. 37, 65.

The Minister of Pensions issued a certificate to the effect that insofar as the death of a soldier who was killed while on duty by a shell which burst amongst troops taking part in an exercise was due to anything suffered by him as a result of the accident, "his "suffering that thing has been or will be treated as attributable to "service for the purposes of entitlement to an award under the "Royal Warrant relating to the disablement or death of members "of the force of which he was a member." An application for a pension by the parents of the soldier under the Royal Warrant was refused by the Minister. In an action by the soldier's father, as administrator of his son's estate, against the War Office, alleging negligence and claiming damages on behalf of the estate, himself and his wife, under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and the Crown

Proceedings Act, 1947, in which the War Office relied on section 10 [1] of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, as a bar to the claim, and the father contended that his claim could not be defeated by the issue of a certificate by the Minister of Pensions which was followed by a refusal to grant any compensation or award:—

Held, that the issue by the Minister of Pensions of a certificate that the death of the soldier was attributable to service had the effect of entitling his parents to claim under the Royal Warrant, and entitling them, provided that the conditions of the warrant were satisfied, to a pension, and, therefore, the certificate was a certificate of "entitlement" within the meaning of section 10 (1) (b) of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, although the Minister had decided that the parents did not satisfy the conditions of the Warrant. Accordingly, the War Office were entitled to rely on section 10, and the father's claim at common law was barred.

PRELIMINARY POINT OF LAW.

On August 7, 1952, the plaintiff's son, Albert George Adams, deceased, a class "Z" reservist in the armed forces of the Crown, was killed by the bursting of a live artillery shell fired from a gun by a member or members of the armed forces of the Crown, while he was on duty and engaged in an exercise at West Down Ranges, Bulford.

On July 29, 1953, the plaintiff, as administrator of his son's estate, and suing on behalf of his wife, himself and the estate of the deceased, issued a writ against the War Office, claiming, under

[1] Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, s. 10: "(1) Nothing done or omitted "to be done by a member of the "armed forces of the Crown while on "duty as such shall subject either him "or the Crown to liability in tort for "causing the death of another per- "son, or for causing personal injury "to another person, in so far as the "death or personal injury is due to any- "thing suffered by that other person "while he is a member of the armed "forces of the Crown if—(a) at the "time when that thing is suffered by "that other person, he is . . . on "duty as a member of the armed "forces of the Crown . . . and (b) the "Minister of Pensions certifies that "his suffering that thing has been or "will be treated as attributable to "service for the purposes of entitle- "ment to an award under the Royal "Warrant . . . relating to the dis- "ablement or death of members of "the force of which he is a member. "(2) No proceedings in tort shall lie "against the Crown for death or "personal injury due to anything "suffered by a member of the armed "forces of the Crown if . . . (b) the "Minister of Pensions certifies as "mentioned in the preceding sub- "section; . . . (3) . . . a Secretary "of State, if satisfied that it is the "fact:—(a) that a person was or was "not on any particular occasion on "duty as a member of the armed "forces of the Crown . . . may issue "a certificate certifying that to be "the fact; and any such certificate "shall, for the purposes of this sec- "tion, be conclusive as to the fact "which it certifies."

Royal Warrant dated May 24, 1949 (Cmd. 7699), art. 37: "Pensions to "Parents. (1) Subject to the follow- "ing provisions of this article, the "parent of a member of the military "forces may be awarded a pension if "he is in pecuniary need by reason "of old age, or infirmity, or other "adverse condition which is not of "a temporary character . . . (2) In "determining whether and to what "extent a parent is in pecuniary "need, the Minister [of Pensions] "shall take into account the extent "to which the member . . . sup- "ported the parent, and the extent "to which the member, if he had not "died, would have been likely, in the "opinion of the Minister, to support "the parent . . ."

ADAMS v. WAR OFFICE.

the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Proceedings) Act, 1934, and the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, on behalf of his wife, himself and his son's estate, damages in respect of the injuries to, and the death of, his son which he alleged were caused by the negligence of the War Office, their servants or agents, and various particulars of the alleged negligence were set out in the statement of claim.

On August 25, 1953, after the issue of the writ but before delivery of the statement of claim, the Ministry of Pensions issued a certificate, dated August 25, 1953, headed "Crown "Proceedings Act, 1947, s. 10," [1] as follows: "In so far as the "death of Private Albert George Adams, No. 14429365, Royal "Berkshire Regiment (T.A.) is due to anything suffered by him "as a result of the accident on the 7th day of August, 1952, I "hereby certify . . . that his suffering that thing has been or "will be treated as attributable to service for the purposes of "entitlement to an award under the Royal Warrant relating to "the disablement or death of members of the force of which he "was a member."

The plaintiff and his wife applied for a parent's pension under the Royal Warrant of 1949, but in February, 1954, the Minister of Pensions notified them that in the circumstances the conditions for an award were not fulfilled.

On April 12, 1955, the Secretary of State for War certified under section 10 (3) of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, that all persons responsible or taking part in the exercise on August 7, 1952, in the course of which the plaintiff's son was killed by a shell, were on duty as members of the armed forces of the Crown, and that at the time that the plaintiff's son met his death he was on duty as a member of the armed forces of the Crown.

By their defence, the War Office, relying on the provisions of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, contended that they were not liable in law for any of the matters complained of in the statement of claim.

The plaintiff, in reply, contended that the refusal of the Minister to grant an award or make any compensation to him both before and after the issue of the certificate of August 25, 1953, nullified and rendered void the certificate, and that, in the circumstances, the War Office were liable in law for the matters complained of, and that his claim could not be defeated by the issue of a certificate by the Minister of Pensions which was followed by a refusal to grant any compensation or award.

By consent of the parties the issue of law raised by the defence whether the plaintiff's claim at common law was not barred by the certificate of August 25, 1953, and section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, was set down under R.S.C., Ord. 27, r. 2, for hearing as a preliminary point of law.

GLYN-JONES J. The plaintiff, William Henry Adams, sues the War Office in his capacity as the administrator of the estate of his deceased son, Albert George Adams. He claims damages for the benefit of the estate and for himself and his wife by way of compensation to them for the financial loss they have suffered by the death of their son, who was killed when he was serving as a class "Z" reservist in a territorial battalion which was engaged in an exercise on the ranges at Bulford. A shell burst among troops taking part in that exercise and the plaintiff's son was killed. The plaintiff claims that his son's death was caused by the negligence of somebody who allowed that shell to be fired among troops taking part in the exercise.

The War Office rely in their defence on the provisions of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, as excusing them from liability to pay damages in an action such as this, and the question of law raised by that plea has been properly set down for hearing as a preliminary point because if I decide the point in favour of the War Office it obviously brings this action to an end.

[His Lordship read section 10 (1) of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, and continued:] By subsection (3) the Secretary of State may certify that "a person was or was not on any par-"ticular occasion on duty as a member of the armed forces of the "Crown." In this case, the Secretary of State for War has certified that all persons taking part in the exercise in which the plaintiff's son was killed "were on duty as members of the armed "forces of the Crown"; and that certificate is not challenged in any way. Nor can it be challenged, for by subsection (3) the certificate is "conclusive as to the fact which it certifies."

The Minister of Pensions issued a certificate dated August 25, 1953, that is, shortly after the issue of the writ in this action, in the following terms: "In so far as the death of Private Albert "George Adams . . . is due to anything suffered by him as a "result of the accident on the 7th day of August, 1952, I hereby "certify, on behalf of the Minister of Pensions, that his suffering "that thing has been or will be treated as attributable to service "for the purposes of entitlement to an award under the Royal "Warrant relating to the disablement or death of members of "the force of which he was a member." That certificate is signed by an officer authorized by the Minister of Pensions. No point is taken, nor, as I understand it, could be taken, on the fact that the certificate is signed by an authorized officer rather than by the Minister himself.

The War Office say that the provisions of section 10 are satisfied and that, therefore, the negligent act, if any, which caused the death of the plaintiff's son does not subject either the negligent soldier or soldiers, or the War Office or the Crown, as the superiors of those soldiers, to liability in tort for causing the death of the plaintiff's son. Mr. Levy says that that is not so, because, notwithstanding the certificate, the Minister of Pensions has in fact refused to award any pension to the mother or father of the soldier, and he says that the only certificate which would satisfy the meaning of section 10 (1) (b) of the Act is a certificate which binds the Minister to decide that the parents should be paid some pension, however small. He says, therefore, that since the certificate which was issued is not a certificate which binds the Minister to pay a pension, it is not a certificate that declares that the parents or one or other of them are or is entitled to be paid something by way of pension, and it is not a valid certificate under subparagraph (b). Notwithstanding Mr. Levy's very careful and clear argument, I have come to the conclusion that my judgment on this point of law must be in favour of the War Office. The issue by the Minister of Pensions of a certificate the effect of which is that the death of the son of the plaintiff is attributable to service has, in my opinion, the effect of entitling the plaintiff or his wife to make their claim under the Royal Warrant and entitling them, if upon that claim they or either of them satisfy the conditions of the warrant, to be paid a pension.

Under article 65 of the Royal Warrant the Minister of Pensions is the sole judge as to whether or not the plaintiff or his wife satisfies or satisfy the conditions of the warrant, and he has decided apparently that neither of them does. I do not think that that means that the certificate which was issued by the Minister was not a certificate within the meaning of subparagraph (b), for, once the Minister certifies, as he has done, that for the purpose of entitlement to an award under the Royal Warrant the death of the plaintiff's son would be treated as attributable to service, it follows, in my opinion, that one or other or both of the parents become or will become entitled to a pension if the conditions of article 37 of the warrant be satisfied.

That disposes of this point of law, and I do not think that I should serve a useful purpose if I continue to discuss the arguments that have been addressed to me. It seems to me that the language of these subsections is quite clear, and I have said what I think they mean.

*MILLER'S CASH STORES LD. v. WEST HAM CORPORATION.

Oct. 13.

Lord Goddard C.J., Ormerod and Glyn-Jones JJ.

Shop — Early closing — Registered shop — Local order providing for Thursday closing—No provision for registered shops—Application of order to registered shops—Shops Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 28), ss. 1, 53 (1) (13), 76 (2).

By an order made by a local authority under the Shops Act, 1912, it was provided that all grocers' shops in the borough should be closed for the weekly half-holiday at 1 p.m. on Thursday, provided that any shopkeeper might substitute Saturdays for Thursdays on affixing a notice to that effect in his shop. The appellants, who carried on the business of grocers in the borough and were registered under section 7 of the Shops (Sunday Trading Restriction) Act, 1936, and subsequently under section 53 of the Shops Act, 1950, as being the occupier of a shop who was a person of the Jewish religion, closed the shop on Wednesdays at 1 p.m., affixing notices to that effect in the shop. On an information charging the appellants with a breach of the order made by the local authority, the appellants contended that, since the order did not contain a proviso that registered shopkeepers might substitute Fridays for Thursdays the order did not apply to the shop:—

Held, that the order depended for its validity on the Act and since the Act provided, in the case of registered shops, for the substitution of Friday for Saturday it followed that the order should also be so read; accordingly, the order applied to the appellants' shop and they were guilty of an offence.

CASE STATED by West Ham justices.

On November 19, 1954, an information was preferred on behalf of the town clerk of West Ham Corporation against the appellants, Miller's Cash Stores Ld., that they did unlawfully, being the occupiers of a grocer's shop at Romford Road, Forest Gate, E. 7, fail to close the shop on September 23, 1954, being a Thursday, contrary to the West Ham Grocers', General Shopkeepers' and Provision Dealers' Half-holiday Order, 1912.

On February 3, 1955, at the hearing of the information, the justices found the following facts:—

(a) That in pursuance of the powers conferred on the council by the Shops Act, 1912, the order provided that all shops in the borough of West Ham in which the retail trade or business of a grocer, general shopkeeper or provision dealer was carried on, and to which the order applied, should be closed for the weekly half-holiday at 1 p.m. on Thursday throughout the year, provided that any shopkeeper might substitute Saturdays for Thursdays on affixing a notice to that effect in his shop. (b) That the appellants carried on the retail trade or business of a grocer at their address. (c) That at all material times since the passing of the Shops (Sunday Trading Restriction) Act, 1936, the appellants' shop had been registered in accordance with section 7 of that Act, and since the date of the repeal of that Act, in accordance with the terms of section 53 of the Shops Act, 1950.[1] (d) That at all material times the closing hours of the shop were: Wednesdays, after 1 p.m.; Saturdays, all day; and Sundays, after 1 p.m. (e) That the appellants affixed notices in the shop to the effect that the shop would close after 1 p.m. on Wednesdays and all day on Saturdays. (f) That the shop was open after and had failed to close at 1 p.m. on Thursday, September 23, 1954.

It was contended on behalf of the borough council that by opening the shop on the Thursday the appellants had failed to comply with the order and had thereby contravened the terms of section 1 of the Act of 1950.[1]

It was contended for the appellants that since the order contained no proviso that any shopkeeper whose shop was registered in accordance with the terms of section 53 of the Act of 1950 might substitute Fridays for Thursdays, on affixing a notice to that effect in his shop, the order did not comply with the terms of sections 1 and 53 of the Act, and that the order was, therefore, a nullity as regards, and did not apply in respect of, the shop.

The justices were of opinion (a) that the order was validly made under section 4 (2) of the Shops Act, 1912; (b) that the terms of section 7 (13) of the Act of 1936 amended section 4 (2) of the Act of 1912 with respect to registered shops; (c) that the Act of 1950 repealed both the Acts of 1912 and 1936, but provision for registration was continued by section 53 of the Act and the order continued to be operative by section 76 (2) of the Act; (d) that with regard to shops registered in accordance with section 53, any shopkeeper otherwise subject to the terms of the order might substitute Fridays for Thursdays for the weekly half-holiday, notwithstanding the order, by affixing a notice to that effect in his shop; (e) that non-compliance with the order subject to the proviso created by section 53 was a contravention of section 1 of the Act of 1950; (f) that the terms of the order subject to section 53 applied in respect of the appellants' shop,

[1] Shops Act, 1950, s. 1: "(1) "Every shop shall be closed for the "serving of customers not later than "one o'clock in the afternoon on one "weekday in every week. (2) The "local authority may, by order, fix "the day on which a shop is to be "so closed . . . Provided that—(i) "where the day fixed is a day other "than Saturday, the order shall pro-"vide for enabling Saturday to be "substituted for such other day as "respects any shop in which notice "to that effect is affixed by the "occupier."

S. 53: "(1) Subject to the provi-"sions of this section, the occupier "of any shop who is a person of the "Jewish religion shall be entitled, "upon making to the local authority "an application . . . to have the shop "registered under this section by the "local authority, and so long as the "shop is so registered then—(a) the "shop shall be closed for all purposes "connected with trade or business on "Saturday . . . (13) As respects any "shop which is for the time being "registered under this section, this "Act shall have effect as if—(a) in "section 1 (1) . . . the references "to weekdays were construed as "references to weekdays other than "Saturdays; (b) throughout section "1 (2) 'Friday' were substituted for "'Saturday.'" and as the appellants had failed to affix a notice in their shop to the effect that Fridays would be substituted for Thursdays their failure to close at 1 p.m. on Thursday, September 23, 1954, constituted a contravention of section 1 of the Act of 1950. The appellants were fined 5s., and appealed.

Ronald Bernstein for the appellants.
A. G. F. Rippon for the borough council.

No cases were referred to in argument.

LORD GODDARD C.J. This is a case stated by justices for the Borough of West Ham, before whom the appellants, Miller's Cash Stores Ld., were summoned on an information which charged that they "did unlawfully being the occupier of the "grocer's shop at the said address of the appellants, fail to close "the said shop on September 23, 1954, being a Thursday, con-"trary to the terms of the West Ham Grocers', General Shop-"keepers' and Provision Dealers' Half-day Holiday Order, 1912."

The history of the legislation governing the closing of shops can briefly be stated as follows: A Shops Act was passed in 1912 which provided for local authorities making orders for the compulsory closing of shops one half-day a week. In consequence of that Act, many local authorities, including West Ham, issued orders with regard to closing. The West Ham order, which was made on September 24, 1912, required grocers to close at 1 p.m. on Thursdays, and added, because the Act so provided: "That "any shopkeeper may substitute Saturdays for Thursdays on "affixing a notice to that effect in his shop." That was a privilege given by the Act because it is well known that in many towns the big stores prefer to close on Saturdays rather than on other days in the week.

That remained the law until the year 1936, when the Shops (Sunday Trading Restriction) Act, 1936, was passed in which, among other things, provision was made to meet the case of the occupier of a shop who was a person of the Jewish religion, or, in the case of a shop occupied by a company, where the majority of directors were persons of that religion. That Act provided that such an occupier could have the shop registered by the local authority and so long as it was registered the shop should be closed on Saturdays and could substitute Friday as the closing day, notwithstanding there was another day mentioned in the order. The Act of 1936 was repealed by the Shops Act, 1950, which was a consolidating Act, and it is with that Act that we are now concerned. [His Lordship read section 1 (2) and continued:] Section 53 reproduces the sections of the Act of 1936 with regard to Jewish shopkeepers. Having provided for the registration of the shopkeepers, it provides: "(13) As respects "any shop which is for the time being registered under this

MILLER'S CASH STORES LD. v. WEST HAM CORPORATION.

Lord Goddard C.J.

" section, this Act shall have effect as if . . . (b) throughout " section 1 (2) ' Friday ' were substituted for ' Saturday.' "

Section 76 of the Act of 1950 repealed, among others, the Act of 1912 and the Act of 1936, and all the orders which had been issued up to date were made under the Act of 1912. Section 76 provides: " (2) Nothing in this repeal shall affect any instru- " ment made or other thing whatsoever done under any enactment " repealed by this Act or under any enactment repealed by the " Shops Act, 1912, and every such instrument or other thing " shall continue in force and, so far as it could have been made " or done under this Act, shall have effect as if made or done " under the corresponding provision of this Act." One of the provisions it could have made and which, therefore, must be deemed to have been made is that, in respect of a registered shop, " Friday " should be substituted for " Saturday."

Mr. Bernstein's main point is that he says that the order is invalid because it does not contain a provision that, in respect of registered shops, Friday should be read instead of Saturday, but I think when one has taken all these sections together and especially in view of the words of section 76 (2), it is clear that what Parliament means is that wherever a Jewish shop has been registered as such " Friday " must always be read instead of " Saturday." There is no difficulty about it then because the order means: " Provided that any registered shopkeeper may " substitute Friday for Thursday on affixing a notice to that effect " in his shop." I dare say if the local authority had occasion to make fresh orders they would see fit to put it in, but it has to be remembered that the orders in these cases always depend upon the Act, and if in regard to registered shops " Friday " must be substituted for " Saturday " where it appears in section 1 (2), it follows that an order made under section 1 (2) must be so read. One must remember that the information is one for breach of the Act because the order is made under the Act and the penalties are imposed by the Act. One can quite see the point made by Mr. Bernstein, but in my opinion it is not a sound point. For these reasons—it was not an easy case for the justices —I think that the justices came to a right decision in law, and this appeal fails.

ORMEROD J. I agree and have nothing to add.

Criminal Law — Fraud — Obtaining credit by fraud — Sale of motor-cycle before hire-purchase payments completed — Further hire-purchase transaction — Value of stolen motor-cycle "credited" against purchase of another—No debt created—Corrective training—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 13 (1).

Criminal Law—Sentence—Corrective training—Maximum sentence for offence one year—Inapplicability of corrective training.

A young man who was buying a motor-cycle on hire-purchase, before completing the payments due, sold it, representing to the buyers that it was his own property and inducing them to let him have another motor-cycle on hire-purchase and to credit him with the sum of £65, the secondhand value of the first motor-cycle. He pleaded "Guilty" at quarter sessions to both counts of an indictment charging him (1) with larceny of the first motor-cycle, and (2) obtaining credit by fraud contrary to section 13 (1) of the Debtors Act, 1869:—

Held, that the plea of "Guilty" to the charge under section 13 (1) of the Debtors Act should not have been accepted since the offence of obtaining credit by fraud could not be committed unless a debt was created. As no debt had been created in the transaction into which the applicant had entered with the buyers of the stolen motor-cycle he had not committed the offence charged and, therefore, the conviction on the second count should be quashed.

APPLICATION for leave to appeal against sentence.

The applicant, James Gordon Keith Mitchell, was charged upon indictment at Dudley Quarter Sessions on December 9, 1954, with (1) larceny of a motor-cycle, and (2) obtaining £65 by means of fraud other than false pretences, contrary to section 13 (1) of the Debtors Act, 1869.[1] The nature of the offences is set out in the judgment. The recorder accepted a plea of "Guilty" on each count and imposed sentences of three years' corrective training for each offence, the sentences to run concurrently.

An application for leave to appeal against sentence was treated as an appeal.

The applicant was not represented.

LORD GODDARD C.J. There are certain unusual points in this case with which the court thinks it ought to deal. [His Lordship referred to the charges set out above and continued:] The applicant was represented by counsel, and pleaded Guilty to both charges, and the recorder sentenced him to three years' corrective training on both counts, to run concurrently. So far as the second count is concerned, the recorder should not have passed that sentence because under section 13 (1) of the Debtors Act, 1869, the maximum sentence permissible is only one year's imprisonment and under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, a person may only be sent to corrective training on conviction for an offence which carries a sentence of two years' imprisonment or more. However, the present case was a bad one and we shall not interfere with the conviction, nor shall we alter the sentence on the first count, so the sentence of three years' corrective training will stand.

But we desire to say that in our opinion counsel should not have advised his client to plead Guilty to the second count, nor should the recorder have agreed to accept the plea. The matter was mentioned to him and he said that he thought it was a proper course. The circumstances were these: the first count charged was the old story of a man obtaining a motor-vehicle, namely, a motor-cycle, on hire-purchase and selling it while it was still on hire-purchase. That is stealing, because it was not his property to sell, the property remaining in the person from whom he hired it until he completed the hire-purchase payments. He took the motor-cycle to a firm, represented that it was his own, and induced the firm to let him have another motor-cycle on hire-purchase and credit him with £65, the secondhand value of the motor-cycle he was turning in. He was charged with obtaining credit by fraud. But he did not; to obtain credit by fraud there must be a debt. He did not obtain credit for any sum. He entered into a hire-purchase agreement and the firm accepted a motor-cycle believing it to be his, but which turned out not to be his. It is unnecessary to speculate as to what offence that amounted to, but it was certainly not obtaining credit by fraud or under false pretences. No doubt the expression that is used in such cases is that a man is "credited" with a sum and that is taken as if he had paid; but to obtain credit under the Debtors Act there must be the creation of a debt, and there was no creation of a debt here. Therefore, the conviction on the second count will be quashed.

Appeal allowed in part.

Landlord and Tenant—Act of 1954—Business premises—Application for new tenancy—Landlord requiring possession for reconstruction —Reconstruction not primary purpose—"Substantial part" of premises a question of fact—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954 (2 & 3 Eliz. 2, c. 56), s. 30 (1) (f), (g), (2).
Fact or Law. "Substantial."

The tenant of a provision shop applied to the landlord, a jeweller, for a new lease; the landlord refused, as he wished to open a jeweller's shop on the premises, which consisted of a shop on the ground floor and two storeys above used for storage.

On an application by the tenant to the county court for an order under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954,[1] directing the grant of a new lease, the landlord, who could not oppose the application on the ground that he required possession for himself, as he had only recently acquired the premises, opposed on the ground that he required possession in order to reconstruct a substantial part of the premises to make them suitable for a jeweller's shop. The proposed work was the provision of a new shop-front of a different type, the demolition of a wall at the back of the shop, so as to throw the whole ground floor into the shop, a complete re-laying of the floor in a different material, and the provision of extensive new shop fittings. No work was to be done on the upper floors.

The county court judge found that the real purpose of the landlord was to get possession so as to carry on a business of his own, and that the proposed reconstruction was merely ancillary to that purpose. He also found that the part of the premises affected was not a "substantial part," and directed the grant of a new lease. On an appeal by the landlord:—

v.
BETTISON.

(2) That the question whether the part of the premises affected was "substantial" was one of degree and therefore of fact; and, as there was evidence on which the judge could properly find that the part affected was not "substantial," the court could not disturb his finding.

APPEAL from the late Judge Backhouse, sitting at Mansfield County Court.

The tenant, a provision dealer who occupied a shop in Westgate, Mansfield, applied under the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, to his landlord for the grant of a new tenancy. The landlord, who was tenant of a jeweller's shop in the town, refused this request as he was anticipating that his lease would not be renewed, and wished to transfer his business to the premises in Westgate. On an application by the tenant to the county court for an order granting a new lease, the landlord lodged an objection pursuant to section 30 (1) (f) of the Act, stating that he required possession in order to reconstruct a substantial part of the premises in order to make them suitable for occupation as a jeweller's shop.

The shop in question had a plain flat shop-front; at the back of the front part of the shop to which the public had access was a wall, behind which were two rooms; there were two floors above, which were used merely for storage purposes. The work which the landlord proposed to carry out was to remove the existing shop-front and substitute an "arcade" type entrance with the door set back from the street and with windows for display on either side of the corridor so formed; to take down the wall at the back, so as to throw the two back rooms into the main shop; to re-lay the whole of the flooring, and to instal a considerable quantity of shop fittings. No work was to be done on the upper floors. The cost of the shop fitting work (no estimate for the builder's work had been obtained) was estimated at about £3,500. The value of the premises was estimated at £8,000 to £9.000.

At the hearing in the county court the landlord admitted that he could not claim possession for his own occupation, as he had acquired the freehold reversion only in 1953, and was accordingly debarred by section 30 (2) from claiming possession under section 30 (1) (g). He further admitted that if the lease were renewed he would not carry out any of the proposed work.

The judge found that the landlord's real intention was to obtain possession, and that the intention to reconstruct was merely ancillary. He also found that the proposed work did not constitute the reconstruction of a substantial part of the premises or a substantial work of construction, and made an order for the grant of a new tenancy. The landlord appealed.

Case cited in argument not referred to in the judgments: Agar v. Nokes.[2]

ATKINSON v. BETTISON.

DENNING L.J. Mr. Atkinson is the tenant of a grocer's shop in Mansfield. Two years ago the lease of his shop was bought over his head by Mr. Bettison. Mr. Atkinson's lease has now come to an end, and under the new Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, he is entitled to an automatic extension of that lease unless the landlord can bring himself within one of the grounds specified in the Act. The ground with which we are here concerned is the ground that he intends to reconstruct a substantial part of the premises. That is section 30 (1) (f) of the Act.

But before dealing with that subsection I may say that the following subsection (subsection (1) (g)) is important. That provides that the landlord can also resist a new lease if he intends to occupy the premises himself for the purpose of a business to be carried on by him. But in order to bring himself within that subsection he has to own the premises for the last five years. The Act does not allow an owner to buy a house just when the lease is coming to an end, and then get possession on the ground that he requires it for his own purposes; he has to be the owner for five years in order to come within that subsection. Now the landlord in this case, Mr. Bettison, is a jeweller, and he wants to get occupation of these premises so as to occupy them himself for his own business. But he cannot rely on subsection (1) (g) because he has not been the owner for five years. He can only rely on subsection (1) (f), which provides: "that on the termination of the current tenancy the "landlord intends to demolish or reconstruct the premises "comprised in the holding or a substantial part of those premises "or to carry out substantial work of construction on the holding "or part thereof and that he could not reasonably do so without "obtaining possession of the holding."

The landlord says that he wants to do the following work: He wants to take out the existing shop-front and to put in a new shop-front with a kind of arcade entrance which is suitable for a jeweller's shop, a long entrance flanked with windows where the public can walk in for some 15 feet before they come to the actual shop door. In addition, he proposes to take down a wall at the back. By this work the landlord says that he intends to reconstruct a substantial part of the premises. He says that the ground floor is a substantial part of the premises and that the work proposed is a reconstruction of the ground floor.

There is no doubt, however, on the evidence, and on the findings of the county court judge, that the real purpose of the landlord is to get possession in order to carry on a business of his own. The proposed work is a secondary or ancillary matter. By the decision of this court in J. W. Smart (Modern Shoe

1955
ATKINSON v. BETTISON.
Denning L.J.

Repairs) Ld. v. Hinckley and Leicestershire Building Society [1]—a decision, it is true, on the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, but nevertheless on very similar provisions—it was held that in order to come within a similar subsection the landlord's primary purpose must be to reconstruct the premises or a substantial part thereof. In the present case that is not his primary purpose. His primary purpose is to get possession for his own business. He cannot get the premises on that ground because he has not owned the premises for five years. He should not be allowed to circumvent that provision by putting forward a secondary purpose as though it were the main purpose.

Assuming that the landlord was able to overcome that difficulty, the next question is whether the proposed work is the reconstruction of a substantial part of the premises. The question what is "substantial" is one of degree, and therefore of fact. If a judge went wrong in that he came to a conclusion which was clearly wrong or to which no reasonable man could come, then this court would interfere. But when it is a matter on which two minds can quite reasonably come to differing conclusions, then it is essentially a question for the county court judge. This seems to me to be such a case. It is a building on three floors. Nothing is proposed to be done with the first and second floors. All that is intended is the fitting of a new shop-front, and a new floor. The judge said that if Mr. Sime's construction of the Act was right, any landlord could buy premises, and by means of merely altering the shop-front get the tenant out and go in himself. That shows what the judge felt about the case. He thought that this was not the reconstruction of a "substantial part" of the premises. I think that that was a decision to which he could properly come, and that this court cannot and should not interfere with his view on the matter. The appeal must be dismissed.

HODSON L.J. I agree. I think that this case is governed in principle by the decision in J. W. Smart (Modern Shoe Repairs) Ld. v. Hinckley and Leicestershire Building Society.[2] The section under consideration in that case was section 12 (3) (c) of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, that section providing: "The court shall not order the grant of "a new tenancy if it is satisfied—. . . (c) that the landlord "reasonably requires possession in order that the premises the "subject of the expiring tenancy, or a substantial part of those "premises, may be demolished or reconstructed," whereas in this case by section 30 (1) the grounds on which a landlord may oppose an application under subsection (1) of section 24 of this Act are "such of the following grounds"; then follows (amongst others) subsection (f): "that on the termination of the current

" tenancy the landlord intends to demolish or reconstruct the " premises comprised in the holding or a substantial part of those " premises or to carry out substantial work of construction on " the holding or part thereof and that he could not reasonably " do so without obtaining possession of the holding."

What was said in the earlier case—which I think applies in principle to this case—was concisely put by my Lord [3]: " In " order that the landlord should bring himself within para- " graph (c), demolition or reconstruction must be the immediate " and primary purpose. That is not so here." Those words apply to this case on the admitted facts. There is no question of any sharp practice on the part of the landlord. He has been perfectly frank, but he has said that he wants occupation of these premises for his own purposes. He is unable to avail himself of the provision contained in sub-paragraph (g) enabling him to obtain possession if he intends to occupy for the purposes of his own business because of the short length of time since he purchased the property. As Evershed M.R. pointed out in Smart's case,[4] the emphasis under the subsection we are now considering has to be put on the premises themselves rather than the occupation or use to which they are going to be put. Further, he said, repeating what the county court judge had said in that case [5]: " this work of adaptation, with its structural com- " ponents is, after all, but ancillary to the desire of the landlords " themselves to occupy the shop and to make that occupation " more commodious." The Master of the Rolls then repeated a large part of the judgment of the county court judge with approval, that judgment being to the same effect.

So far as the second point is concerned I think that the respondents in this appeal are right on that also, because this appeal raises the question on which the county court judge did, I think, hope to get some guidance as to how the word " substantial " was to be approached. But I am afraid that nothing more can be said by this court than was said by the House of Lords in Palser v. Grinling [6] in connexion with a rent case, the question there being whether the substantial portion of the rent was attributable to furniture. In that class of case, as in this class of case, the onus is on the landlord, and Lord Simon's words are applicable. He said [7]: " One of the primary " meanings of the word is equivalent to considerable, solid, or " big. It is in this sense that we speak of a substantial fortune, " a substantial meal, a substantial man, a substantial argument " or ground of defence. Applying the word in this sense, it must " be left to the discretion of the judge of fact to decide as best " he can according to the circumstances in each case, the onus " being on the landlord."

ATKINSON v. BETTISON.
Hodson L.J.

I think that the county court judge here arrived at a conclusion on the evidence at which he was entitled to arrive; that this was not a reconstruction of the premises comprised in the building or a substantial part of those premises, nor was it the carrying out of a substantial work of construction. It is not one of those cases where this court can say that there is no evidence upon which he could have arrived at such a conclusion. For these reasons, therefore, as well as those which my Lord has expressed, I think that this appeal fails.

MORRIS L.J. I also agree, and only add a word or two because of the importance of the matter.

The judge in his judgment commended the frankness of the landlord, who made it quite clear what his real purpose and intention was. The county court judge summarized the matter in these words: "He is perfectly frank about it. He says: 'I "'carry on business as a jeweller, my lease is up in just over a "'year's time, and I may have to come out. Even if I stop "'I would like the premises to carry on business there as well. "'I bought the premises in March, 1953, and I cannot apply "'for possession for my own occupation because I have not been "'owner for five years, and I would not want to do the proposed "'reconstruction for Mr. Atkinson.'"

Those facts admit of no doubt. The landlord wants these premises for himself to carry on his own business, and no reconstruction is in contemplation if there is a continuation by Mr. Atkinson of his occupation. It seems to me that the reasoning in the case to which reference has been made of J. W. Smart (Modern Shoe Repairs) Ld. v. Hinckley and Leicestershire Building Society[8] is of application to the case which we are now considering. Evershed M.R., in his judgment, expressly affirmed and adopted the wording in that case of the county court judge who had said this[9]: "'I think that in the present case the "'primary and real object for which the respondents require "'possession of these premises is for occupation by Cockshaw "'(the agent), and that the reconstruction contemplated by "'them is only ancillary to that occupation, and is therefore not "'the real reason for requiring possession.'"

In the present case, I find it abundantly clear that the real reason for wanting possession, and the real intention and the real purpose of the landlord. is that which would bring him within section 30 (1) (g) were it possible for him to avail himself of that section: his real intention and real purpose is to occupy the building for the purposes of a business to be carried on by him therein, and the reconstruction contemplated is only ancillary to that desired occupation.

On the other points which have been taken by the respondent I am also in agreement with the judgments which have been

I can see nothing in the judgment now under review which shows any wrong approach or wrong appreciation of the evidence or assessment of it, or any omission to consider any evidence. I see no reason for disturbing the conclusion reached by the judge.

Licensing — Friends entertained by licensee — Supply by licensee of drink to staff after closing time — Staff employed by brewery company—Drinks debited to company—Whether staff "private" "friends" of licensee "entertained at his own expense"—Licensing Act, 1953 (1 & 2 Eliz. 2, c. 46), s. 100 (1) (a), (2) (c).

The licensee of an inn owned by a brewery company supplied members of the staff, who were employed by the company, with a drink after the inn had closed and they had tidied up the premises. In each case the drink was debited to the company. The supply of the drinks followed a general practice and was expected by the staff as an additional reward for their services. On a charge against the licensee of supplying intoxicating liquor after permitted hours, contrary to section 100 (1) (a) of the Licensing Act, 1953, the licensee was convicted. On appeal:—

Held, that, on the facts, the licensee was not supplying the drink to his "private friends" within section 100 (2) (c) of the Act of 1953, nor, since the drink was debited to the company, was the staff "entertained by him at his own expense," and, therefore, the licensee was rightly convicted.

Dictum of Humphreys J. in Jones v. Cockroft [1945] 2 All E.R. 333, 335 disapproved.

CASE STATED by a stipendiary magistrate for the City of Manchester.

On February 9, 1955, an information was preferred by the respondent Alan Jones, against the appellant, Harold Shaw Schofield, that he on January 9, 1955, except during permitted hours did supply to Harriett Rogers, in licensed premises known as Yew Tree Inn, Wythenshawe, intoxicating liquor to be consumed on the premises contrary to section 100 (1) (a)[1] of the [1] Licensing Act, 1953, s. 100: "(1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, no person shall, except during the permitted hours—(a) himself, or by his servant or agent, sell or supply to any person in any licensed premises . . . any intoxicating liquor to be consumed either on or off the premises . . . . (2) Nothing in the preceding subsec-

SCHOFIELD v. JONES.

Licensing Act, 1953, and on February 9, 1955, fourteen further informations were preferred against the appellant in like terms in respect of the alleged supply to 14 different persons.

The following facts were found by the magistrate: The appellant was the licensee and manager of the inn, which was owned by a brewery company. The 15 persons named in the informations as being supplied with intoxicating liquor were all members of the staff of the inn and were all employed and paid by the company, though the appellant engaged the staff. Shortly before midnight on January 8, 1955, two groups of police officers took observations on the inn and at 12.10 a.m. on January 9 were admitted by the appellant. They went straight to the "Refreshment Room" where 15 members of the staff were seated around two tables, each having in front of him or her a partly consumed glass of intoxicating liquor. It was admitted that the staff had been supplied and had partly consumed the liquor during non-permitted hours and during non-working hours. No intoxicating liquor had been sold to the staff during non-permitted hours. On Saturday, January 8, 1955, some 1,200 customers were served in the inn and by the time all glasses had been washed and put away and the premises generally made tidy the time would be at least 11.30 p.m. or even later. Each night of the week, when the premises had been tidied up, each member of the staff was provided with one drink, which was debited to the brewery company, and on Saturday nights the appellant's wife provided the staff with pies and the appellant provided them with a second drink at his own expense. The appellant did not allow the staff to drink or smoke while on duty, and this period included the time taken in washing and tidying up after closing time. Each member of the staff was given the one drink (or two drinks on Saturday night) if desired, irrespective of the capacity in which he or she was employed by the company. The only qualification required to receive the drink was to have been a member of the staff on the particular night. The first drink was supplied by the appellant following a general practice and because he felt that it would be difficult to get staff if he did not do so. The staff expected it as an additional reward for their services and because of the nature of their employment. The second drink was supplied by the appellant because on Saturday the staff worked very hard and were a long time without food and drink. There was no evidence of any private friendship in the ordinary sense existing between the appellant and any of the 15 members of the staff.

It was contended by the appellant that the supply of intoxicating liquor in the circumstances was permitted by section 100 (2) (c) of the Act of 1953,[1] and that the subsection aimed at [1] "tion shall prohibit or restrict— . . .

"(c) the supply of intoxicating liquor
"for consumption on licensed pre"mises to any friends of the holder
"of the licence bona fide entertained
"by him at his own expense, or the customers and strangers. The appellant contended that the staff were his private friends within the meaning of the subsection.

It was contended by the respondent that the staff were not the private friends of the appellant, and that section 100 (2) (c) was not available to him.

The magistrate was of the opinion that (1) the 15 members of the staff were not within the meaning of section 100 (2) (c) the private friends of the appellant, who was the holder of the licence; (2) the drinks given to the staff were entirely a business transaction as one of the methods by which the licensee ran his house; (3) that the appellant remained in his capacity as licensee and the staff remained on the premises as staff and received their drinks as staff; (4) that consideration of private friendship did not enter into the transaction at all, and the staff received their drinks because of the work they had done and because the nature of their employment debarred them from drinking while on duty; (5) that the fact that drinks were debited to the brewery company did not prevent them being supplied at the expense of the appellant. The magistrate convicted the appellant on each of the 15 informations and fined him £9.

Percy Lamb Q.C. and R. H. Mais for the appellant.
W. G. Morris for the respondent.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment of Lord Goddard C.J.

LORD GODDARD C.J. stated the facts and continued: The magistrate's opinion was that: "The drinks given to the staff "were entirely a business transaction as one of the methods by "which the licensee ran his house." I entirely agree with him. The appellant was not entertaining the staff as private friends; he was giving them a drink as servants because if he did not he would not be able to get the staff, and they expected it as part of their remuneration. Therefore, as it seems to me, it cannot come within section 100 (2) (c) of the Licensing Act, 1953, which enables a licensee to supply intoxicating liquor to "any private "friends of the holder of the licence bona fide entertained by "him at his own expense." As I said in the course of the argument, if he was giving a Christmas party to his staff, that might be a different matter. There he would be giving entertainment, but one cannot say that this is an entertainment of private friends. It is giving the staff something which they expect, and without which he would not be able to get the staff. That does not seem to be entertainment of private friends. There is no evidence that they were friends, it is simply staff, though I do not think one would be too acute to find the degree of friendship or acquaintanceship between the parties in any case in which a licensee is giving a little entertainment to somebody. For instance, he might find somebody who had been in the Army with him and he had not seen for years, and he could easily say: "Come into my room and I will give you a drink." That would be the entertainment of a private friend, if the licensee paid for it.

SCHOFIELD v. JONES.

Lord Goddard C.J.

It seems to me that the magistrate was quite right in finding that this was not the entertainment of private friends; but the magistrate does say: "The fact that drinks were debited to the "brewery company did not prevent them being supplied at the "expense of the appellant." I cannot agree with that. It may be that he founded himself on Jones v. Cockroft,[1] where Humphreys J. said[2]: "I do not think the fact that the land-"lord said here: 'As a matter of fact, I shall put down those "'drinks to the owners of the house afterwards,' means that it "was not at his own expense. The words in the section 'at his "'own expense' are probably merely to emphasise that he must "be the person who pays, not the people who get the drink." With all respect to Humphreys J., for whose opinion on a matter of this sort I have the greatest regard, section 100 (2) (c) provides that private friends must be entertained at the licensee's own expense. If the expense is falling on somebody else, it seems to me that it clearly does not fall on the licensee, and so it is not at the licensee's expense. The passage I have read from the judgment of Humphreys J. is only a dictum, and I cannot agree with it, and although I did not expressly dissent from it in Parkinson v. Barnes,[3] to which Mr. Lamb called our attention, I do not think that it can be said that I approved it. I quoted it and pointed out that it did not arise in the particular case. It does arise in the present case, and I say quite frankly I do not agree with the dictum. If the expense fell on the owners, it does not seem to me that the case is within paragraph (c). I mention that because there were in this case two drinks one of which was at the expense of the licensee, but he cannot bring that within paragraph (c) because that was not the entertainment of private friends; it was given as part of the remuneration of these people. For these reasons, I think the magistrate came to a right decision, though on one point I differ from him, and the appeal fails.

ORMEROD J. I agree, and for the same reasons. The magistrate found "There was no evidence of any private friendship in "the ordinary sense existing between the appellant and any of "the 15 members of the staff." Mr. Lamb submitted that the magistrate was in error in that he did not define or attempt to define what was meant by "private friendship" in section 100 (2) (c) of the Licensing Act, 1953. It is not for this court on this occasion to attempt to define what is meant by "private "friendship," and certainly I would not attempt to do so. But the magistrate has found that each of the staff was given a drink on this night irrespective of the capacity in which he or she was employed by the brewery company. It is also found that the only qualification required to receive the drink was to have been a member of the staff on the particular night. That, in addition to the other findings that the whole object of this entertainment or hospitality was to enable him to keep his staff, I think makes it quite clear that whatever should be the definition of "private "friendship" the facts of this case do not bring these particular defendants within it. I agree that this appeal fails.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL OF MALTA.

Malta—Pre-emption—Immovable property—Judicial sale by auction—"Absent persons"—Conditions limiting right of pre-emption—Publication of notice of sale at least one month before the day fixed for the sale—"Day fixed for sale" in the notice—Code of Organization and Civil Procedure (c. 15), ss. 314, 356—Civil Code (c. 23), s. 1520 (1) (2).

In subsection (2) of section 1520 of the Civil Code of Malta, which provides that publication in the Government Gazette of the advertisement of a sale of immovable property by judicial auction "at least one month before the day fixed for the sale" will deprive "absent persons" of their rights of pre-emption, the words "the day fixed for the sale" mean the day fixed in the advertisement and not the day on which the sale is actually held.

Where, therefore, the interval of time between the date of publication of the advertisement in the Gazette of the judicial sale by auction of immovable property, of which the respondent, on behalf of persons who were at all times material to the advertisement and sale absent from Malta, claimed a right of pre-emption, and the day fixed therein for the sale was less than one month, the respondent was not deprived of the right of pre-emption although the sale actually took place more than a month from the date of the notice.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal of Malta affirmed.

APPEAL (No. 44 of 1954) from a judgment of the Court of Appeal of Malta (Camilleri P., Gauci and Harding JJ.) (June 15, 1953) which affirmed a judgment of the Civil Court of Malta (May 28, 1951), granting to the respondent a declaration that he had on September 3, 1948, validly exercised a right of pre-emption in respect of certain immovable property situated in Malta. The appellant contended on a number of grounds that the respondent was not entitled to exercise the said right, but of these only one was urged on this appeal, namely, that subsection (2) of section 1520 of the Civil Code of Malta barred the respondent from exercising the right.

The relevant facts, shortly stated, were as follows: On July 24, 1946, the Civil Court made an order that the property which was the subject-matter of this case be sold by auction. On June 20, 1947, a sale notice appeared in the Government Gazette that an auction would take place on July 18, 1947. On July 17 the sale was adjourned. On December 30, 1947, a second sale notice appeared in the Government Gazette announcing that the sale would take place on January 22, 1948. On that date and also on January 29, 1948, and February 19 and 26, 1948, the sale was further adjourned. Finally on February 28, 1948, as the result of an auction held on that date the property was "adjudicated" under the relevant sections of the Code of Organization and Civil Procedure of Malta to one Theuma for £21,300.

It was permissible under the law of Malta for higher bids to be made after the auction. Such bids were made, and the property was finally adjudicated to the appellant on April 1, 1948, for the price of £32,200.

The respondent, on September 3, 1948, acting as attorney for and on behalf of two nieces, exercised a right of pre-emption, and it was the validity of the exercise of that right that was challenged. The advertisements of the two sales, though published in the Government Gazette, were not served (as was permissible under certain provisions of law which appear later) on the respondent or on the parties on whose behalf he acted. The latter were at all times material to the advertisements and the sale absent from Malta.

The relevant law of Malta relating to sales by auction was to be found in the Code of Organization and Civil Procedure.

Section 313 provided that after the lapse of a stated period "the Court shall, upon the demand of the creditor or of the debtor "to be made by an application, appoint one or more days for the "sale by auction, and order the issue of advertisements."

Section 314 (1) provided: "The advertisement shall be signed "by the registrar and shall state the date of the judgment or "decree ordering the sale by auction, the nature of the thing to " be sold, the place of the sale and the day and hour in which the " auction is to begin and to end."

Section 315 (1) required the advertisement to be served on certain persons and to be posted up at certain places. Section 315 (2) provided: " It shall be lawful for the Court to order " such advertisement to be published in one or more periodical " newspapers." Section 315 (3) provided that with regard to immovable property: " the posting up and publication of the " advertisement shall, unless the Court otherwise directs, take " place, . . . at least fifteen days before the day appointed for " the sale by auction . . ."

Section 356 provided: " The right of pre-emption or re-pur- " chase in respect of immovable property sold by auction, " whether in favour of the debtor or of any other person, ceases " after four months from the date of the registration of the act " of adjudication in the Public Registry:

" Provided that such right shall not be exercisable by any " person, except the debtor, on whom, upon the demand, even " verbal, of the debtor or of the execution creditor, the advertise- " ment of the auction shall have been served."

A later enactment, the Civil Code, in dealing with rights of pre-emption, provided by section 1520 in respect of sales by judicial auction that: " 1520.—(1) Where the sale was made by " judicial auction, the right of pre-emption shall not be competent " to the persons to whom notice of the proposed sale was " given by service of a copy of the advertisement mentioned in " section 314 of the Code of Organization and Civil Procedure " (Chapter 15).

" (2) The provisions of this section shall also apply to absent " persons if the said advertisement shall have been published in " the Government Gazette at least one month before the day " fixed for the sale."

Walsh v. Secretary of State for India [1] was referred to for the proposition that where a provision of law involves a forfeiture of rights the law must be strictly interpreted.

October 17. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Mr. L. M. D. DE SILVA, who stated the facts and statutory provisions set out above and continued: It will be seen that under section 356 of the Code of Organization and Civil Procedure the only limitations upon the exercise of a right of pre-emption in respect of immovable property sold by auction under an order of court were that: (i) no person other than the debtor could [1] (1863) 10 H.L.Cas. 367, 386.

1955
BORG.

exercise a right of pre-emption if the advertisement of the auction had been served on him as prescribed by the section; (ii) the right to exercise it by persons entitled to do so ceased after four months from the date of the registration of the act of adjudication in the Public Registry. It will also be seen that the limitations on rights of pre-emption imposed by section 356 of the Code of Organization and Civil Procedure were extended by section 1520 of the Civil Code.

The only point argued on this appeal was that the provision in subsection (2) of section 1520 barred the respondent from exercising a right of pre-emption.

The appellant contends that the publication of the advertisement in the Gazette of December 30, 1947, complied with the terms of section 1520 (2) and therefore that it is not competent for the respondent, who was an "absent person," to exercise a right of pre-emption. The respondent denies that the terms of section 1520 (2) have been satisfied.

Reference has already been made to two sale notices in the Government Gazette. A sale notice appeared in the Gazette of June 20, 1947, to the effect that a sale would take place on July 18, 1947. Another sale notice appeared in the Gazette of December 30, 1947, that a sale would take place on January 22, 1948. It will be seen that in each of these notices the interval of time between the date of publication and the date fixed for the sale in the notice was less than a month. Under subsection (2) of section 1520 in order to preclude "absent persons" from exercising their right of pre-emption there must be an interval of "at least one month" between the date of publication and "the day fixed for the sale." If the words "the day fixed for "the sale" mean the day fixed in the notice for the sale it is clear that neither notice satisfied the requirements of the subsection. The appellant contends that the words "day fixed for "the sale" in the subsection do not mean the day fixed in the notice but the day on which the sale was actually held, namely, February 28, 1948. If that interpretation were correct more than a month would have elapsed between the date of publication of each of the notices and the "day fixed for the sale" and the terms of the subsection would have been complied with.

The interpretation sought to be put upon the words "day "fixed for the sale" by the appellant is contrary to the natural meaning of the words in the context in which they appear, namely, the day fixed in the notice for the sale, and if a departure from that meaning is permissible, it would be for some strong reason.

It was argued for the appellant that the "day fixed for the "sale" in subsection (2) of section 1520 should not be confused with the day "appointed" for the sale in subsection (1) of section 313. The words used in the two subsections are no doubt different, but their Lordships do not think any significance should be attached to the difference. They are appropriate in the context of each subsection to indicate the day on which the sale is to be held.

Reliance was placed upon sections 1396 and 1397 of the Civil Code, which are: "1396. A sale is a contract whereby one of the "contracting parties binds himself to transfer to the other a thing "for a price which the latter binds himself to pay to the former.

"1397. A sale is complete between the parties, and, as regards "the seller, the property of the thing is transferred to the buyer, "as soon as the thing and the price have been agreed upon, "although the thing has not yet been delivered nor the price "paid; and from that moment the thing itself remains at the risk "and for the benefit of the buyer."

It was said that a sale did not take place until there had been a concluded contract and that the "day fixed for the sale" could not be ascertained until there had been a concluded contract. The words "day fixed for the sale," on the meaning of the word "sale" contended for by the appellant, would mean the day fixed for the conclusion of the contract and could be determined whether or not a contract is concluded on that day. What the appellant is striving to contend is that "the day fixed for the "sale" means "the day of the sale," ignoring the words "fixed for."

It was argued for the appellant that the legislature has enacted section 1520 (2) for the protection of a purchaser, and that no interpretation of it should be adopted which would make it possible by fixing the date of sale at less than one month from the date of publication of the advertisement in the Government Gazette to take away the protection afforded. Their Lordships are unable to accept this contention. The right of pre-emption is recognized and preserved in the statute law of Malta. In order to mitigate the uncertainty consequent on a possible exercise of rights of pre-emption after a judicial auction, the legislature in the case of immovable property by section 356 of the Code of Organization and Civil Procedure placed a time limit for the exercise of those rights and took away altogether the rights from persons other than the debtor upon whom the advertisement of the auction had been served. By section 1520 (2) of the Civil Code an alternative to service of the advertisement was provided for the special case of "absent persons." It was provided that publication of the advertisement in "the Government Gazette at "least one month before the day fixed for the sale" would deprive "absent persons" of their rights of pre-emption. Under section 315 an interval of only 15 days was necessary between the publication of the advertisement and the day appointed for the sale, and an advertisement in the Gazette was not compulsory. The necessity for publication in the Gazette, and the necessity for that publication to be at least one month before the sale, appear to have been imposed by the legislature for the benefit and protection of persons who were entitled to rights of pre-emption.

J. C.

VINCENTI v. BORG.

But even if it were otherwise, the consequence suggested by the appellant, referred to earlier, does not justify a departure from the natural meaning of the words "fixed for the sale."

For these reasons their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal be dismissed. The appellant will pay the respondent the costs of this appeal.

APPEAL from an order of the stipendiary magistrate for the Petty Sessional Division of Swansea, made on the ground of desertion.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of Collingwood J. The parties were married on July 31, 1954, and the last six months or so of their life together was spent in rooms in St. Thomas, Swansea. The wife said, in her evidence before the stipendiary magistrate, that she was not happy in her surroundings there, but there was so far no real trouble between them, although she had found from a very early stage that the husband was not truthful over money matters. They had been buying the furniture for their home on hire-purchase. The wife was in work. She earned some £4 10s. 0d. a week, and out of this each week she gave her husband £3 towards the instalments of the hire-purchase of this furniture. At the time of the parting these payments made by the wife to the husband for that purpose aggregated £64. Matters came to a head on February 1, 1955, which was a Tuesday. On that evening the husband was on night work, and, as was the custom when he was so engaged, the wife had gone to her parents. He came into her parents' home for his tea and supper, as he always did on these occasions, and then, after the evening meal, as he was leaving the house, he told his wife that he was leaving her, that his clothes were packed, and that the furniture was going back. In fact, he had spent the whole of the £64, which his wife had provided, upon his own pleasures, but the wife was not told that at the time; she discovered it later, after an interview between her husband and her father. The wife, in her evidence, said that she had tried to induce the husband to come back as he left the house, but he did not, and later that evening her father went to his place of work and had an interview with him to find out from him what it was all about, and it was on her father's return to her that she learned from him what it was all about, namely, that the furniture was being taken back owing to what the husband had done with the money. On the next day she went to their rooms in Sebastopol Street, St. Thomas, Swansea, with her father and her cousin, and there they met the husband. There was a scene between the father and the husband, the father demanding to know what he had done with this money and suggesting that he was keeping another woman. It led to blows, and they had to be separated, and the wife told the husband to go, because, she said, she wanted to bring the troubles to an end. On the Thursday the parties again met, this time at his mother's. The husband still refused to give his wife any information as to what he had done with this money; his whole attitude was one of complete indifference; he just sat there eating his dinner as if nothing had happened at all.

On February 3, 1955, a solicitor's letter was written to the husband on behalf of the wife, which read as follows: "Dear Sir, We have been consulted by your wife, Mrs. Glenys "Bevan, now of 46 Eiddwen Road, Fforestfach, Swansea, in "reference to certain matrimonial disputes existing between you. BEVAN v. BEVAN.

"the 7th instant, with a view to discussing these matters, all "that can be done is to let Mr. Jenkins take the furniture back, "as is his undoubted right. We shall be glad to hear from you "or your solicitors."

On the following Friday, February 4, 1955, the husband went to the wife's parents' house, taking the solicitor's letter with him. Again, as the wife said in evidence, he showed no concern for her at all, his only concern being with regard to the furniture. All he did was to ask her if she was prepared to pay for it all over again, the alternative to which was to send the furniture back. She was distressed and angry, and told him that she did not want to see him again, and said, in fact, that she wanted a divorce, and she added to that by making to hit him with a milk bottle, but was restrained from so doing.

Some time later, on a date which was not clear, the husband wrote a letter to his wife, which had since been destroyed. The evidence of the wife with regard to the contents of that letter was this: "It did ask me to come back in a way. It started "'Dear Glenys.' He said 'If you don't answer this letter I "'shan't bother with you again.' In a way it asked me to make "things up. I didn't answer the letter or do anything. I took "out a summons." This she did on April 16, 1955, alleging desertion by the husband on February 4, 1955, and also wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her.

The matter came before the stipendiary magistrate on April 26, 1955, and, after the wife had given her evidence and had been cross-examined, the case was adjourned for a month, in order that the parties might have the advantage of the services of the probation officer.

It came again before the stipendiary magistrate on May 24, 1955. The offices of the probation officer had not been effective. The wife was recalled by the court, and said that she had been to see the probation officer, and added, "I have no desire now "to return to my husband, even if the court is satisfied he "genuinely wants me. He has done nothing to try and make "it up to me—either over the money or the home."

On May 13, 1955, between the two hearings, the husband wrote a second letter to the wife, in the following terms: "I am "writing to you once more to ask you for your forgiveness for "what I did to you. I know it was a verey bad thing to do but "if you would only give me a chance to make it up to you I "honestly and truley would. You see Glen I still love you and "allways will and I want you back with me. I dont want you "to come back to nothing if you would only give me a littel time "I will soon get back to where we left off with nealy every thing "payed for. I admit I have done a verey bad thing by you Glen "but give me a chance to repair things once agian. I have been "seen with women which is not true and I was told you were "see with a chap but I dont beleive that all I want is you back "with me. If you give me a few moths to get a place and fix " things up. You said you did not love me any more if that is " true I dont know, but nothing can stop me loveing you. Well " Glen I got no more to say but all I have said on this letter I " mean and it is all true every word of it. I honesty and truely " love you Glenys and I want you back with me. Ill make you " a husband you will be proud of if you will give me another " chance. all my love Desmond. P.S. Please answer this letter " so I will know what to do." The wife did not reply to that letter or to the letter written before the first hearing.

At the conclusion of the hearing on May 24, 1955, the stipendiary magistrate found the husband guilty of desertion and made a nominal order for maintenance in favour of the wife.

From that order the husband appealed.

D. Rankin for the husband appellant.

The wife did not appear and was not represented.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

COLLINGWOOD J. referred to the facts, remarking, as to the interview of February 4, 1955, that there was clearly no explanation by the husband on that occasion of his conduct nor any effort to make things up, and continued: The stipendiary magistrate, upon the evidence, decided that the husband had been guilty of desertion, and in the course of the reasons, which have been provided, he said: " The day that they parted he said he " was leaving her and packed his belongings. The complainant " was distressed and sent her father to the respondent's works to " find out the reasons "—and he adds " and try and effect a " reconciliation," but that does not appear from the note of the evidence. The reasons go on: " During the period of the adjourn- " ment the respondent has written one letter to his wife, that on " May 13, in which he asked for forgiveness and time to get " other accommodation—otherwise he has made no attempt to " see his wife. He has, in fact, made no sort of endeavour to " seek any accommodation, saying it would be of no use as his " wife didn't want him. He has saved no money, in the mean- " time, although his wages were the same. If the respondent was " genuine in his desire to resume living with his wife, he would " have done everything in his power to win back his wife's " affection. He has done nothing, and I have come to the " conclusion he doesn't want his wife back and also that at the " time of leaving her he intended to break up the marriage " permanently, and I am satisfied that his offer in his letter of " May 13 was not a genuine offer, and therefore the case has " been made out by the wife for desertion. In regard to neglect, " the wife has been able to maintain herself and that summons " is dismissed."

That decision is attacked upon this ground. It is said that it runs counter to a passage in the speech of Lord Macmillan, delivered in Pratt v. Pratt.[1] The passage reads as follows[2]: "In fulfilling its duty of determining whether on the evidence a "case of desertion without cause has been proved the court ought "not, in my opinion, to leave out of account the attitude of mind "of the petitioner. If on the facts it appears that a petitioning "husband has made it plain to his deserting wife that he will not "receive her back, or if he has repelled all the advances which "she may have made towards a resumption of married life, he "cannot complain that she has persisted without cause in her "desertion." As was pointed out by Willmer J. in Church v. Church,[3] that passage in the speech of Lord Macmillan is obiter dictum, and is, in fact, in conflict with authorities in this country. Willmer J. says in his judgment[4]: "To my mind the point under "discussion is concluded so far as I am concerned by the decision "of this court in Sifton v. Sifton.[5] That case seems to me to "be authority for the proposition that once desertion has been "started by the fault of the deserting spouse it is no longer "necessary for the deserted spouse to show that during the three "years preceding the petition he actually wanted the other "spouse to come back. It will, I think, be helpful if I read "part of the headnote, which seems to me admirably to sum "up what was the effect of Henn Collins J.'s decision. It reads "as follows: '. . . When a spouse is deserted, he or she is in "'the position that the presumption is in his or her favour and "'against the deserting spouse. It is not until some offer to "'return is made by the deserting spouse that the question "'arises whether it is an offer which ought, in all the circum-"'stances, to be accepted. Notwithstanding that the husband "'did not expect or really want his wife to come back, it was "'not incumbent on him to show that he was at all times during "'the three years next preceding the petition ready and willing "'to receive her.'"

BEVAN v. BEVAN.

Collingwood J.

That being the position, the question arises in the present case: What has the appellant done to terminate the state of desertion which he brought about on February 1, 1955? He attempted in his evidence to show that since February 1, 1955, when he left the house, there had been on his part a supervening animus revertendi, coupled with a bona fide approach to his wife with a view to resuming cohabitation with her. That clearly is what he was setting out to do. The stipendiary magistrate has found that such efforts as he did make were not bona fide. It is true, and it is perhaps unfortunate, that in his statement of reasons the stipendiary magistrate confines himself to the consideration of the final letter written by the husband on May 13, 1955. With respect to him, I should have thought that attention could more properly have been directed, with regard to the matter of the husband's bona fide efforts to return to his wife, to (1) the interviews which took place between them, and (2) the first letter which he wrote to his wife, these being matters which took place before the issue of the summons on April 16, 1955. However, the only matter to which he refers is the letter written in the period of the adjournment between the two hearings, an adjournment, as I have said, granted with a view to the possibility of the parties becoming reconciled.

In my opinion it is impossible, on the evidence before the stipendiary magistrate, to say that it was not open to him to find that there was desertion originally by the appellant on February 1, 1955, and that such efforts as were made by him were not genuine efforts to get back to his wife. It is said "Well, is he not exonerated from making further efforts?" He himself says "I "did not go on making further efforts because she did not want "me back," and it is suggested that this case is really in the same class as Barnett v. Barnett,[6] which is a decision of Sachs J., and the similar case of Fishburn v. Fishburn.[7] But in my opinion those cases are in quite a different category from the present. They were not cases merely of words indicating that the wife had no desire to see her husband again. In both those cases the deserted spouse effectively prevented the other spouse from approaching her by bolting the door against any advances towards reconciliation, not merely metaphorically, but actually and physically, and I think that those cases go a long way further than anything that can be found in the evidence in the present case, which really amounts to this, that this wife, suffering, and not unjustly, from a deep sense of grievance, says to a husband who apparently is showing no contrition for, and almost no recognition of what he has done, "I do not want to see you any "more." In my opinion that cannot exonerate him from the necessity of doing something to bring an end to the state of desertion which he started. It requires something far more than that to relieve him of the necessity of doing something to bring the state of desertion to an end.

Having said that, I feel that I ought to add this: That does not mean that for all time, and in all circumstances, the wife is entitled to take up a non possumus attitude towards the husband. If and when he makes further efforts at reconciliation it will be for those efforts, against the background in which they are made, to be tested as to whether they amount to genuine efforts for reconciliation. I do not think I need say any more with regard to that aspect of the matter.

In my opinion this appeal fails.

LORD MERRIMAN P. I agree with the reasons which my brother has given for dismissing this appeal, and in particular I wish to add my concurrence with his concluding observations. Although as things stand the wife is entitled to succeed on the ground of desertion, it is not, in my opinion, a case in which she is entitled to take up an obdurate attitude and say that it has been decided that in no circumstances whatever is she obliged to resume cohabitation.

* BROPHY v. J. C. BRADFIELD & CO. LD.

Factory — Ventilation or fumes — Boiler room — Workman killed by injurious fumes—Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), ss. 4 (1), 47 (1).

The plaintiff's husband, who was employed as a motor-lorry driver by the defendants, was found dead in the boiler room of the defendants' factory and the plaintiff claimed damages alleging, inter alia, that the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty under sections 4 (1) and 47 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, to provide adequate ventilation and to take proper measures for the removal of injurious fumes:—

Held, that on the facts the defendants were not liable.

Per curiam, on the facts, sections 4 and 47 did not apply to the boiler room, for it was not a workroom of the factory and the fumes were not "generated in the course of any process or work carried "on in the factory."

Judgment of Glyn-Jones J. affirmed.

APPEAL from Glyn-Jones J., sitting at Liverpool Assizes.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Hilda Brophy, sued the defendants, J. C. Bradfield & Co. Ld., for damages in respect of the death of her husband, Patrick Brophy, who was employed by the defendants as the driver of a motor lorry. The defendants, manufacturers of tents and canvas goods, carried on business in a warehouse in Great Howard St., Liverpool. Those premises had an entrance from the main road. Inside there was a lobby, with steps down to the basement, where there was a boiler room divided into two parts, one of which contained the boiler, the other being used for the stowage of coke to be used in the boiler. On Sunday morning, January 20, 1952, Brophy was found dead on the floor of the boiler room, and it was admitted by the defence that he had died as the result of inhaling carbon monoxide fumes from the boiler.

The evidence showed that he had returned with his lorry to the warehouse late on the Saturday night. Evidence was given for the defendants that on the Saturday afternoon, when work ceased in the factory, Robertson, the employee who had charge of the boiler, had stoked it up, closed the furnace door, pushed the damper in and according to practice had left the boiler room door open. When Brophy was found the furnace door was open and the boiler room door partly closed. On this evidence Glyn-Jones J. drew the inference that Brophy had gone into the boiler room with the idea of having a sleep, had opened the furnace door, and had been overcome by the fumes. He rejected the contention that the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty under sections 4 (1) and 47 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937,[1] and gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

Edward Wooll Q.C. and E. E. Youds for the plaintiff.
D. J. Brabin Q.C. and R. S. Nicklin for the defendants.

Mist v. Toleman & Sons[2]; Gibby v. East Grinstead Gas and Water Co.[3]; and Ebbs v. James Whitson & Co. Ld.[4] were referred to in argument.

SINGLETON L.J. This appeal shows some of the difficulties which may confront a judge of first instance who has to decide a claim under Lord Campbell's Act. The man Brophy died when he was alone in the defendants' warehouse, and it is difficult to form a true conclusion as to how quickly his death occurred.

On Sunday morning, January 20, 1952, Brophy was found dead on the floor of the boiler room. It is admitted in the defence that he died in the boiler-house from carbon monoxide fumes which he inhaled, and it is not disputed that the fumes which brought about his death were fumes from the boiler in the basement of the defendants' premises. The furnace was stoked with coke and the boiler provided hot water for the pipes throughout the factory in order to keep the temperature of the place suitable for the workpeople.

(1) Effective and suitable provision shall be made for securing and maintaining by the circulation of fresh air in each workroom the adequate ventilation of the room, and for rendering harmless, so far as practicable, all fumes, dust and other impurities that may be injurious to health generated in the course of any process or work carried on in the factory."

S. 47: "Removal of Dust or Fumes. (1) In every factory in which, in connection with any process carried on, there is given off any dust or fume or other impurity of such a character and to such extent as to be likely to be injurious or offensive to the persons employed, or any substantial quantity of dust of any kind, all practicable measures shall be taken to protect the persons employed against inhalation of the dust or fume or other impurity and to prevent its accumulating in any workroom, and in particular, where the nature of the process makes it practicable, exhaust appliances shall be provided and maintained."

BROPHY v. J. C. BRADFIELD & Co. LD.
Singleton L.J.

The case was not left in a very satisfactory position. In the course of his judgment Glyn-Jones J. referred to the fact that there had been an expert witness sitting in front of the plaintiff's advisers who was not called as a witness. The plaintiff had legal aid and there would have been no difficulty in her advisers obtaining the help they desired in order to present the case. There was no expert witness called before the judge to describe the boiler and to say what, if any, further steps should have been taken in the boiler room and in the basement. We were told this morning that at the time of the trial the boiler had been dismantled. I asked Mr. Brabin when the boiler was removed, and he could not say. I should like to have had a little further information with regard to the boiler and what should be done in regard to ventilation if such a boiler is installed in a basement; but there was nothing of that kind before the court. Furthermore, I do not know how soon a man may be stricken down by fumes that come from a boiler of that kind. I do not know whether it happens quite quickly or whether it takes some time. There was no evidence about that before the trial judge—and I think that there might have been. I wondered at one time whether it would be better for this court to order a re-hearing of the case so that some of these matters might be cleared up, but I do not think that that would be right in the circumstances, for the plaintiff had legal aid and there was plenty of time before the action came on for trial and there was nothing to prevent the plaintiff securing evidence, if such evidence was available and of help to her.

Glyn-Jones J. came to the conclusion that the plaintiff had not proved a case against the defendants and gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appeals to this court and Mr. Wooll on her behalf has put forward submissions which merit close consideration. His case on the appeal can really be stated in two sentences which he used at the beginning of his argument. He said: "There are two factors to be borne in "mind. (1) The first is that early one Sunday morning Brophy "was found dead from carbon monoxide fumes from a boiler "in the defendants' factory basement and (2) there is absolutely "no ventilation in the boiler-house." Put in that short way the plaintiff's case appears to have considerable force behind it, but I am not sure the second heading or factor used by Mr. Wooll is not stated too widely. There is no real dispute between the witnesses. Many admissions were made and the evidence given was quite short.

Brophy was a motor driver and he and two other men named Fairclough and Gorst had to make a journey on Saturday, January 19, 1952, from Liverpool to Abergele with a load of goods manufactured by the defendants. They did not get back from Abergele until fairly late; when they got to the defendants' premises they were closed and in darkness. Brophy had a key and he opened the door. The practice had been that when the premises were closed for the day all electricity within the building was cut off by the main switch which is in the basement, not very far from the boiler room. Somewhere in the basement there were the bicycles of Fairclough and Gorst which had been left there and it had been arranged that Brophy should drive those two men and their bicycles to their homes that night and then return to the defendants' premises, put the motor van away and lock up the premises. There is a garage on the premises which has a sort of shutter door which can only be raised when the electric power is on.

When they got to the defendants' premises Fairclough went downstairs to the basement and switched on the electric switches so far as was necessary to give them the light they wanted. The bicycles of the two men were obtained and two of the men, Brophy and Gorst, clocked off, and the clock records the time of their clocking off as 28 minutes past 9 o'clock. Fairclough switched off the electricity and went upstairs to join them. Thereafter Brophy drove Fairclough and Gorst to their homes, left them and their bicycles and went to his own home with the motor van.

According to the evidence of the plaintiff, Brophy arrived at his house about 11.30 p.m. Mrs. Brophy had kept his dinner waiting for him, but he said he did not want it and was going to take the van back to the company's premises and he left to do that. It is clear that he took the van back, for it was found in the garage the next day after his body had been found. When he arrived back at the premises he would have to unlock the door and go down to the basement to switch on such lights as he required; thereafter he would have to go up, open the door of the garage and put the van in, and when he had done that I suppose in the ordinary course he would go down and switch off the lights which he had switched on, go upstairs, close the door, and then go home. We know that he did not go home, for round about 8 o'clock on the Sunday morning he was found dead on the floor of the boiler room. Work had ceased in the factory at 4 o'clock on the Saturday afternoon. Robertson, who had charge of the boiler, had stoked it up about 3.30 p.m. and, after he had stoked it up—that is to say, after he had put on sufficient fuel as he thought was necessary—he closed the furnace door according to the usual practice and put the damper in. Again according to the ordinary practice he left the boiler room door open.

It is here that I indicate my doubt about whether Mr. Wooll's second proposition is not too wide. In the ordinary way there was a draught coming down the steps from upstairs to the basement, and it is said there was a flue or chimney to the boiler to take away the fumes or smoke. Therefore, it is not quite correct to say that there was absolutely no ventilation in the boiler-house. [His Lordship referred to the evidence and continued:]

v.
J. C. BRADFIELD & Co. LD.
Singleton L.J.

This further fact emerges from the evidence. Brophy had no duty in the boiler-house; he was a motor driver. How he came to be in the boiler-house or how long he had been in there before he died no one will ever know. When Brophy was found on the floor on the Sunday morning, the door of the furnace was open and, according to the evidence of Robertson, the shovel was not in the place in which he had left it the afternoon before—from which it appears clearly that after the stoking up by Robertson someone had opened the door of the furnace and someone had moved the shovel. It may be that someone had put some more fuel on the fire. Questions were asked whether the state of the fuel inside the furnace was such as one would have expected it to be in the early morning if anything more had been put on, and the answers of Crossley, the defendants' foreman, and Robertson do not agree altogether as to that. Glyn-Jones J. drew an inference that Brophy, having switched the lights out, had gone into the boiler-house to rest for a while or to sleep. Mr. Wooll, on behalf of Mrs. Brophy, submitted that that inference was wrong and that the judge ought not to have inferred that Brophy must have opened the furnace door. It appears to me that that was an inference which the judge was entitled to draw. He was faced with considerable difficulties in regard to the lack of evidence. So far as the evidence shows, work had ceased at the factory on the Saturday afternoon at 4 o'clock, soon after the furnace had been stoked and the furnace door had been closed. When Brophy's body was found the furnace door was open. Moreover, the door of the boiler-house was partly closed; it was not fully open as it had been left the afternoon before. It may be that Brophy had gone into the boiler-house to get warm after his long day, he may have switched off the lights and gone into the boiler-house with the idea of warming himself in front of the furnace: he may have opened the door—and he may have put some more fuel into the furnace. I cannot say that the judge was wrong in drawing the inference which he did.

I should have thought that if Brophy had been going in there with the intention of having a sleep he would not have switched all the lights off and I cannot understand why he should have done. On the other hand, if he switched off the lights and was on his way to the steps in the dark and took the wrong turning and so got into the boiler room, I wonder who opened the door of the furnace. So far as we know, there were no other workmen about, although again the evidence as to who had the right to be there is lacking. The judge formed the view that Brophy had gone into the boiler room with the idea of having a sleep and that he opened the door of the furnace. Mr. Wooll asked us to reject that finding, and his main argument is that it is not in line with some other evidence and in particular with the evidence of Gorst who said that when he was on the floor above and somewhere above the top of the steps he noticed a strong smell of fumes coming from below. Fairclough, the man who went downstairs at that time, about 9 o'clock in the evening, did not notice anything unusual or any smell; so far as he saw, the place was in the condition in which it would be if it had been properly left. The judge accepted the evidence of Fairclough. I do not think that this court ought to accede to the submission of Mr. Wooll that the judge's inference upon this point was wrong.

Mr. Wooll further submitted that, even if the judge's inference was right, the plaintiff was entitled to succeed in this action on three grounds: first, that there was a breach of duty by the defendants—in other words, that the defendants were negligent at common law and the death of Brophy was caused thereby; secondly, that the plaintiff had a claim under section 4 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, and, thirdly, that she also had alternatively a claim under section 47 (1) of that Act.

I propose to consider those sections first in so far as necessary for the purpose of this case. [His Lordship read section 4 (1) and continued:] I propose to say nothing on the point raised by Mr. Brabin as to whether that section gives a right of action in the circumstances such as those in this case. But upon the facts it does not appear to me that the boiler room was a workroom within the meaning of section 4 (1) of the Act or that the fumes were "generated in the course of any process or work "carried on in the factory." This was a boiler used for heating the factory and I do not think that that section applies to the facts of the present case.

Over and above that it appears to me that in the absence of any evidence it cannot be said that effective and suitable provision had not been made having regard to the fact that the boiler had existed for some 25 years in the same place with such ventilation as there was from above and through the flue without anybody ever having noticed anything wrong so far as the evidence shows. As I have said, I should have liked some evidence as to what the boiler was like and I think that the defendants might have given the judge some information upon this—evidence either from the makers or from the people who installed it or from the people who took it down. I do not think that section 4 (1) of the Act applies to this case.

Section 47 (1), which concerns the removal of dust and fumes provides: [His Lordship read section 47 (1) and continued:] That section again deals with workrooms and with processes carried on in a factory. For the reason I have given with regard to section 4 (1), I do not think that section 47 (1) applies to the facts of the present case.

It appears to me that the case for the plaintiff can best be put on the allegation that there was a breach by the defendants of the duty which they owed to Brophy under the common law.

v.
J. C. BRADFIELD & CO. LD.
Singleton L.J.

An employer owes to his workmen the duty of taking all reasonable precautions to prevent their having to undergo unnecessary risk.

Mr. Wooll submitted that the undoubted fact that Mr. Brophy was found dead in the defendants' boiler room from carbon monoxide poisoning shifted to the defendants the onus of showing that they had taken reasonable precautions. Again I am not sure that that is the true position, and for this reason: Brophy was found in a place to which his work did not take him. There was no reason why he should have gone into the boiler room so far as his duties with the defendants went. If a man goes to some part of a factory where he has no duty and if he, in that part of the factory, interferes with a boiler (as the judge found that Brophy did) I am not sure that it can be said that there is an onus upon the defendants to explain the accident. If the onus is shifted from the plaintiff to the defendants, it appears to me that the defendants do put forward an answer when they say that this furnace and boiler had worked without accident for 25 years and, but for the interference of someone (in this case they say the interference of Brophy) they would have continued to work safely. The accident was caused, they say, by Brophy interfering with the furnace—a thing which he had no right to do—and upon that they submit that there is no liability upon them. That was the view of Glyn-Jones J. I agree with him that this was a most unfortunate accident. If the plaintiff had been able to show by the evidence of some expert witness that it was not proper or not good practice to have a furnace of this kind in a basement without some ventilation other than that which I have mentioned, it may be that the plaintiff could have established a case, but with the case left in the position in which it was, I am of opinion that the judgment of Glyn-Jones J. was right, although I confess I should have been happier if there had been more evidence put before the court. This appeal must be dismissed.

JENKINS L.J. I agree.

PARKER L.J. I also agree.

Master and Servant—Employment of servant of another—Employment pro hac vice—Full-time hiring of lorry and driver over prolonged period—Methods of loading and unloading under supervision and control of hirer—Unsafe system of unloading—Relationship of parties.

The plaintiff was a lorry driver employed by British Road Services, who paid him his wages and had the sole right of dismissing him. Over a long period of years he had been engaged in carrying loads under the control of the defendants between their various depots. The loading and unloading of his lorry was done under the supervision of the defendants, who supplied the necessary equipment, but the plaintiff had control of the actual stowing of the load upon his lorry. The plaintiff's lorry was marked with the defendants' initials, and there was no indication of its true ownership. On January 1, 1953, while unloading his lorry at one of the defendants' depots, the plaintiff was injured through the unsafe system of work of the defendants. In an action by the plaintiff for damages for negligence he alleged that there existed between himself and the defendants a relationship of employer and employee pro hac vice:—

Held, that the onus of proving a relationship of employer and employee pro hac vice between himself and the defendants was on the plaintiff; that he had failed to discharge that burden and, accordingly, his claim failed.

APPEAL of defendants from Oliver J., sitting at Manchester Assizes.[1]

The plaintiff was a lorry driver employed by British Road Services at their depot at Kearsley. At this depot British Road Services had continued a practice originated by their predecessors which had been carried on for 12 or 14 years. A certain number of the lorries at Kearsley, including the plaintiff's, were occupied whole-time upon transport for the defendants, Imperial Chemical Industries Ld. The name upon these particular lorries was "I.C.I." and there was no reference upon them to their ownership by British Road Services. Nevertheless the drivers were in fact the servants of British Road Services. For a considerable time the plaintiff had been employed upon this work. Each morning on the defendants' instructions he drove his lorry from Kearsley to one of their depots where he picked up a load. The stowing of the load upon the lorry was left to the driver's discretion. He then carried the load to another depot of the defendants where he unloaded it. The nature of the load and the methods of loading and unloading were under the supervision and direction of the persons in charge at the defendants' depots.

On January 1, 1953, the plaintiff took a load of 23 drums of a chemical called terylene, manufactured by the defendants, from one of their depots to their terylene plant at Thornton-le-Fylde. Each drum weighed 300 lb. and measured approximately 3 ft. long by 2 ft. wide. There were no handles or lugs by which to hold the drums. The drums were stowed on the plaintiff's lorry in three tiers, those in the bottom tier standing upright. For 10 years or more it had been the defendants' practice to have such drums delivered at the unloading bay of the Thornton-le-Fylde depot, where there were proper facilities for unloading, but which was nearly a quarter of a mile from the terylene plant, but later the defendants decided to have the drums delivered by British Road Services direct to the plant. On January 1, 1953, the defendants had provided unloading equipment which was rolled up to the tail of the lorry and which consisted of a mechanical platform supported upon a column. The platform could be moved up or down the column to accord with the height of the article to be moved but its maximum height was 5 ft. 2 in. above the ground. This was only a few inches above the deck of the plaintiff's lorry. Since the platform could not be raised higher, the plaintiff had to stand on it to lower drums from the two top tiers down on to himself until they reached the platform. The platform itself was 5 ft. long by 3 ft. wide so that there was insufficient room for another person to stand upon it to assist the plaintiff at this stage of the unloading. The plaintiff had manoeuvred one drum from the top tier on to the platform and was engaged in getting down a drum from the second tier, trying to hold it by the edges and to slide it down upon himself, when it "kicked" as it came down; the plaintiff fell on to the floor and the drum fell on his back and severely injured him. He claimed damages against the defendants for personal injuries arising out of their negligent method of unloading the drums.

Oliver J. held that the method of unloading the drums was dangerous; that in the circumstances the plaintiff was not merely an invitee, but was entitled to the same standard of care as if he had been the defendants' employee; and that, accordingly, the defendants were liable in negligence. He distinguished the decision of the House of Lords in London Graving Dock Co. Ld. v. Horton.[2]

The defendants appealed.

R. H. Forrest Q.C. and Gordon Clover for defendants.
H. I. Nelson Q.C. and C. M. W. Elliott for plaintiff.

Holt v. Rhodes (W. H.) & Son[3]; Lomas v. Jones (M.) & Son[4]; and Garrard v. Southey (A. E.) & Co.[5] were cited in addition to cases referred to in the judgments.

Singleton L.J. I will ask Parker L.J. to give the first judgment.

Parker L.J., having stated the facts, said he entirely agreed with the finding of Oliver J. that the method of unloading adopted by the defendants was unsafe, and continued: The real question, however, is: What, if any, duty was owed by the defendants to the plaintiff? Thus, if he was merely an invitee his claim would be bound to fail, since on the evidence, he was well aware of the danger; on the other hand, if he had become a servant of the defendants then it is clear, in my view, that they had failed in their duty of care towards him and, as the judge found, there is no evidence of contributory negligence on his part. It is necessary in considering this question of duty to go a little more into the circumstances. It appears that for a number of years the defendants had an arrangement—the exact terms of the arrangement were not in evidence—whereby British Road Services set aside, as it were, certain of their lorries for use almost exclusively on the defendants' business; not only lorries, but drivers, and these lorries and these drivers were employed almost exclusively in carrying goods from one depot of the defendants to another depot, or from a depot to a plant, or for delivering to customers; in fact, the lorries were painted in a special colour and carried the name of I.C.I. and their trade mark.

The plaintiff had been one of those drivers for a number of years. He carried no gear or equipment for the purposes of loading or unloading his lorry; but the defendants, to put it quite generally, would assist in both operations. So far as the carriage of these drums of terylene was concerned, at first they were delivered to the main stores at Thornton-le-Fylde, where there was a proper unloading bay and there was then no trouble in unloading drums stacked in this way. Later, when the experimental plant started—and that was situated some 400 yards away—it was clearly more convenient to deliver the drums to the plant. At this plant there was no unloading bay and the evidence, which the judge accepted, was that the defendants would then supply the driver in question with sacks, straw, and old motor tyres upon which the drums could be dropped off the lorry; and later still, and I think for some matter of a year before the accident in question (no doubt in order to avoid any danger of the drums being damaged in dropping off the lorry), they had at the plant one of these tiering trucks.

O'REILLY v. IMPERIAL CHEMICAL INDUSTRIES LD.
Parker L.J.

It is, I think, clear that the judge accepted the evidence called by the plaintiff in preference to that called by the defendants. There was an issue, for instance, whether the defendants had supplied sacks and straw and motor tyres, and had given instructions in regard to the unloading. He accepted the evidence of the plaintiff and his witnesses, and his findings, having dealt with the evidence, were as follows: "Having reached the "appropriate depot of the I.C.I. the plaintiff (I am taking it "merely as an example; there were many other men doing the "same thing) would load his lorry under the supervision and "direction of whoever was in charge of the I.C.I. depot. They "would decide what load was to be taken. The driver, of course, "would decide how that load was to be stowed, and I suppose if "he thought the load was so big as to be dangerous he could "have refused to load. The same could be said of his ordinary "employers; if they told him to do a thing that he thought was "dangerous he could refuse to do it, but subject to that he was "entirely under the direction of whoever was in charge of the "I.C.I. depot."

Later he said: "Each of those methods"—those methods I have already referred to, unloading at the bay, unloading on to the sacks of straw and unloading on to the tiering truck—"Each "of those methods, as Mr. Nelson pointed out, was inaugurated "by the I.C.I. It was their method. Just as they were in "control of the loading, so they were in control of the "unloading to that extent, always bearing in mind that "this plaintiff could have said: 'I am not going to use that "'machine; I am going to take my load back home to Kearsley,' "which was about 50 miles away, and waste the day, and "probably get the sack when he got there for not doing what the "I.C.I. told him."

Finally he said: "With considerable hesitation I have come "to the conclusion that the plaintiff is right and that in this case, "by reason of all the circumstances, the defendants owed him "the same duty as regards appliances and system of work as if "he had in fact been their own employee. They were his "employers in every respect except that they did not pay him "and could not dismiss him." In other words, as it seems to me, the judge is there finding that, although undoubtedly the plaintiff always remained in the general employment of British Road Services, yet on the facts of this case at the moment of unloading he became the servant of the defendants. That such a position can occur, though perhaps rather rarely, is shown by a series of cases of which the most recent authority, that in the House of Lords, is to be found in Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Coggins & Griffiths (Liverpool) Ld.[1]

It is unnecessary to consider the actual facts of that case. The importance of it is that their Lordships there lay down the test which has to be applied in considering the question whether at any moment a workman, though in the general employment of A, yet for certain purposes comes into the special employment of B. Lord Simon emphasized the difficulty of proof. He said [2]: "It is not disputed that the burden of proof rests on the "general or permanent employer—in this case the appellant "board—to shift the prima facie responsibility for the negli- "gence of servants engaged and paid by such employer so that "this burden in a particular case may come to rest on the "hirer who for the time being has the advantage of the service "rendered. And, in my opinion, this burden is a heavy one and "can only be discharged in quite exceptional circumstances."

It is perfectly true that that was a case in which both the general employers and what I may call the temporary employers were both sued, and the burden there referred to is the burden on the general employers; but equally, as it seems to me, if a workman, as in this case, chooses to sue not his general employers but the persons whom he says temporarily owed him the duty of master to servant, there is a considerable burden on him to show that those temporary employers have become under that duty. Without going through the speeches in detail, it is sufficient to refer to two passages, one in the speech of Lord Porter and one in the speech of Lord Simonds.

Lord Porter said [3]: "Many factors have a bearing on the "result. Who is paymaster, who can dismiss, how long the "alternative service lasts, what machinery is employed, have all "to be kept in mind. The expressions used in any individual "case must always be considered in regard to the subject matter "under discussion but amongst the many tests suggested I think "that the most satisfactory, by which to ascertain who is the "employer at any particular time, is to ask who is entitled to "tell the employee the way in which he is to do the work "upon which he is engaged. If someone other than his general "employer is authorized to do this he will, as a rule, be the "person liable for the employee's negligence. But it is not "enough that the task to be performed should be under his "control, he must also control the method of performing it. It "is true that in most cases no orders as to how a job should be "done are given or required: the man is left to do his own work "in his own way. But the ultimate question is not what specific "orders, or whether any specific orders, were given but who is "entitled to give the orders as to how the work should be done." Then he goes on: "Where a man driving a mechanical device, "such as a crane, is sent to perform a task, it is easier to infer "that the general employer continues to control the method of "performance since it is his crane and the driver remains "responsible to him for its safe keeping. In the present case, "if the appellants' contention were to prevail, the crane driver "would change his employer each time he embarked on the "discharge of a fresh ship."

Lord Simonds is reported as saying [4]: "In the cited case"—that is Donovan v. Laing, Wharton and Down Construction Syndicate [5]—"the court held upon the facts that the burden of "proof had been discharged and I do not question the decision. "But it appears to me that the test can only be satisfied if the "temporary employer (if to use the word 'employer' is not to "beg the question) can direct not only what the workman is to "do but also how he is to do it."

It is clear that the judge accepted the evidence of the plaintiff and his witnesses in preference to that of the defendants, and in considering whether his findings, to which I have referred, are justified by the evidence it is proper, I think, to refer only to the evidence of the plaintiff and his witnesses. The plaintiff was asked by Mr. Nelson: "Having put the thing there"—that was the tiering truck at the back of the lorry—"was anything "said about what you were to do? (A.) Just to put the drums "on the platform of the tiering truck. (Q.) Who told you that? "(A.) The person in charge of the tiering truck."

He described the methods which had been employed, to which I have already referred, and he was asked in cross-examination specifically with regard to this point. The first question was: "(Q.) Mr. O'Reilly, you were employed by "British Road Services? That is right, is it not? (A.) That is "correct. (Q.) And they were the people who could give you "orders? That is right, is it not? (A.) Yes. (Q.) And tell you—"who was it could tell you—where you were to go, for example? "(A.) Yes. (Q.) Who? British Road Services? (A.) British "Road Services in the second place. (Q.) And as regards the "way you were to do your job? They were the people who could "tell you how to do your job, weren't they? (A.) No, Sir. Not "always. (Q.) Let me put it this way. The only people who "could sack you if you did not do your job properly were "British Road Services? That is right, is it not? (A.) That is "correct. (Q.) And you need not take orders from anybody else "at all, need you? (A.) No, not really."

It is true that the question and answer went on in this form: "(Q.) And the method of loading your lorry—loading it—was "entirely under your control? That is right, is it not? (A.) That "is correct. (Q.) And the method of unloading your lorry was "entirely under your control, was it not? (A.) No. (Q.) Don't "you agree with that? (A.) No. (Q.) I will have to follow that "last question up in that case. If a factory to which you went "suggested to you a dangerous way of unloading your lorry, "you could refuse to do it, could you not, that way? (A.) If I "were aware of it being dangerous I could refuse."

I have very grave doubts whether, accepting those answers in that form, it can possibly be said that the rigorous test laid down by the House of Lords in the case to which I have referred is satisfied in the present case. The answers of that witness leave the matter, to say the least, in doubt; and, bearing in mind the heavy burden of proof and the rigorous test to be applied, I do not think it is possible on the facts, accepting, as the judge did, the evidence given for the plaintiff, to say that that test has been satisfied. No doubt the defendants would in a general sense control and assist in the operations of unloading and, indeed, of loading. They might make suggestions, they might make, indeed, requests. When there was no other way they would supply, as they did, some platform upon which they desired the carrier to unload the goods.

But one of the difficulties, as it seems to me, in suggesting that the plaintiff goes into the special employ of the defendants is to be seen at once when one realizes that except for certain periods in the defendants' business it is beyond argument that the plaintiff was acting for British Road Services and for British Road Services only. From the moment he left their depot with their lorry he was clearly acting as their servant; and what is really being suggested here is that, at some undefined moment of arriving at a depot or, as here, at this experimental plant, and presumably at a time when he has dismounted from the driving seat, he becomes the servant temporarily of the defendants; and equally, the moment the unloading has ceased and he rolls up his tarpaulins and gets back into the driving seat it has to be said that he ceases to be in any relationship of master to servant to the defendants, and reverts to the position of being solely the servant of British Road Services. It seems to me on the facts of this case that the test laid down by the House of Lords cannot be said to be satisfied.

I should add this. No doubt British Road Services as general employers give their drivers—including the plaintiff—instructions to do what the defendants, I.C.I., want; but throughout, as it seems to me, British Road Services remained sub-contractors of the defendants using their own lorry and their own driver, and had in no sense delegated to the defendants the right to give orders as to how the work was to be done.

I think it is unfortunate, although I am not blaming anybody, that the judge was not referred specifically to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board case,[6] and to the passages to which I have referred. I said I am not blaming anybody because there is considerable doubt as to exactly how the case was put below, and, indeed, if one looks at the pleadings, it is hardly surprising that the judge himself did not have this case in mind as relevant to the argument, or that Mr. Forrest did not refer the judge specifically to it. I think it may well be that if the judge had

C. A.
1955
O'Reilly v. Imperial Chemical Industries Ltd.
Parker L.J.

been referred to that case he would have come to a different conclusion.

But the matter does not rest there because, as I understand it, Mr. Nelson puts his case in a much broader way. He says in effect: "Even if I cannot satisfy the test laid down in the "Mersey Dock and Harbour Board case [6] yet I am entitled to "succeed," and, as I understand it, he puts forward this proposition, that in the case of a carrier delivering goods to the consignee, if the consignee interferes, a fortiori if he gives instructions to the driver, he becomes under a duty; and having got to that stage, he says that where that interference and instruction assumes the form of control not only is there a duty, but there is a duty akin to or of the same nature as that between master and servant. On that basis, as I understand it, he would say that there may well be two people, the employers, British Road Services in this case, and the defendants, both of whom owe the workman a similar duty, a duty of master to servant. I confess that, doing the best I can to follow that argument, it does seem to me that Mr. Nelson is putting forward a completely new and novel claim, something, as far as I know, unknown to the law.

If a duty of master to servant is to be found in any case it can only be where there is either a true relation of master and servant or a relationship of master and servant of a temporary character as that envisaged in the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board case.[6] Unless one or other of those features is proved I cannot see any possibility of maintaining a claim for a breach of the duty owed by a master to his servant.

I understand that below a reference was made to the principle in Donoghue v. Stevenson.[7] That has not been developed in this court, and it is sufficient for me to say that I see no possibility of presenting the case on those lines. Indeed, a similar argument based on Donoghue v. Stevenson [7] was advanced in the House of Lords in London Graving Dock Co. Ld. v. Horton,[8] and was specifically rejected. Sorry as I am for the plaintiff in this case, I am not satisfied that he has shown the breach of any duty owed to him by these defendants. It may well be—I do not know; it is not for me to say—that he may yet have a perfectly good claim against British Road Services. For these reasons I would allow the appeal.

Jenkins L.J. I agree. It is not in dispute that if the relationship between the plaintiff and the defendants in the present case was merely that of invitee and invitor, the plaintiff's case must fail owing to his knowledge of the danger, as is shown by Horton's case.[8] But it has been argued for the plaintiff that in all the circumstances of this case the defendants were under a duty to him amounting to the duty owed by an employer to an employee; that is to say, the duty on the employer to provide the employee with adequate plant and to devise a safe system of work for the employee, and not to do anything to expose the employee to unnecessary risk. If it had been established that the defendants were under such a duty as that in this case, it is clear from the learned judge's findings and from the evidence that the plaintiff would be entitled to succeed, for the tiering truck was not an adequate apparatus for the purpose of unloading a lorry having upon it three tiers of 300 lb. drums. But the duty owed by an employer to his employee is a contractual duty and prima facie, therefore, it can only exist in a case in which the contractual relationship of employer and employee exists between the parties.

For instance, as was shown by Horton's case,[8] the fact that a person entering the premises of another enters those premises for the purpose of rendering services to that other person, pursuant to a contract between the employer of the person entering and the occupier of the premises, does not give the person entering any higher right than that of an invitee, because there is no contract of service between him and the occupier, and it matters not what arrangement may have been made between his employer and the occupier, that being an arrangement to which he is no party. There is, however a rare exception to that rule which has been sometimes referred to as the case of employment pro hac vice. That is the kind of case in which an employer hires out to some other person the services of his employee, and the transfer of the control and direction of the actions of the employee is so complete, and puts his temporary employer in such close control of the situation that for the purposes of liability either to a third party, or equally, I think, to the employee himself, the temporary employer is to be regarded in law as his master.

As my brother Parker has said, the onus on those who seek to establish a relationship of employer and employee pro hac vice is a heavy one, and, in my view, the range of cases in which that relationship should be held to have been set up ought not to be extended; and notwithstanding the judge's findings in the present case I cannot agree that the facts here suffice to establish the existence of such a relationship. I say that with the greatest respect to the judge, and I note that he arrived at his conclusion with, as he said, "considerable hesitation." When one adds to that hesitation the circumstance that, as my brother Parker has pointed out, the leading case on this subject of Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Coggins & Griffiths (Liverpool) Ld.[9] was not cited to the judge, I think it is easy to understand how he reached the conclusion that he did, and it seems to me that had the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board case[9] been cited to him, and had he applied his mind to the facts in the light of that authority, he might well have come to a different conclusion.

If there is no relationship here of master and servant in the ordinary sense, as I hold there is not—indeed, it was not and could not be contended that there was—and if the facts here do not suffice to discharge the heavy onus lying on those who seek to make out a case of employment pro hac vice—and in my view they do not suffice to discharge that onus—then it seems to me that the plaintiff's case must necessarily fail; for I decline to erect in cases of this kind a new duty which is neither the duty subsisting between invitor and invitee, nor the duty arising from the relationship of employer and employee. I decline to erect in addition to those categories a new duty of care formulated in the very sweeping and general way in which it was put forward by Mr. Nelson in his argument for the plaintiff. For these reasons, and for the reasons given by my brother Parker, I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

Singleton L.J. I am in full agreement with the judgments which have been given, and there is nothing that I wish to add.

Appeal allowed.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, Ronald Perry, an infant, brought an action by his next friend for damages against the first defendants, a firm of contractors, and the Corporation of Ashton-under-Lyne, the second defendants, for injuries which he received on May 18, 1951, as the result of falling into a pit excavated during road repairs carried out by the contractors for the corporation. In the spring of 1951 Trafalgar Street in Ashton-under-Lyne was closed to vehicular traffic by the corporation for road works. The works were extensive and involved the digging of a trench about 22 yards in length at the end of which was a pit some 20 feet deep. One side of the trench was near a kerb and pedestrians on that pavement were completely protected by a solid fence some five to six feet high. Access to the works was provided at the opposite side of the trench which was near the middle of the street. On this side the trench and the pit was outlined by a similar solid structure forming the side of the excavation and projecting above street level to a height ranging irregularly from one to three feet. Outside this low fence on the road side of the excavation was a barrier consisting of drainpipes 2 ft. 6 ins. high with planks across marking the boundary, inside which public access was forbidden.

Children played inside the barrier but were chased away by the watchman, and had never been observed playing there when the watchman was present. On occasions when he was absent they had persisted in playing on the works and had often been driven off by people living in Trafalgar Street opposite the site. The accident happened in broad daylight when the plaintiff, who was then aged eight years, went inside the barrier and fell into the pit. He gave evidence that he knew then that he must not go beyond the barrier.

The plaintiff claimed damages on the grounds that he was a licensee, but that even if he was a trespasser the defendants were negligent in leaving a dangerous allurement upon the site.

The report is confined to the question of the first defendants' liability on the issue of the allurement.

Cur. adv. vult.

PERRY v. THOMAS WRIGLEY LD.

July 25. OLIVER J., after stating the facts and finding that the plaintiff was a trespasser on land occupied by the corporation, said that the duty owed to a trespassing child was not to act with a reckless disregard of his presence (Excelsior Wire Rope Co. Ld. v. Callan [1]) and that an occupier could not escape liability if he acted with a malicious intention towards any trespasser (Lowery v. Walker [2]). He said that neither of these principles was applicable, and that the case against the corporation fell within the decision in Robert Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ld. v. Dumbreck [3]; accordingly he held that the second defendant was not liable.

Turning to the question of the contractors' liability, his Lordship said: Are they in a worse position than the corporation? If there were no authority on the matter I should have felt it difficult to say that contractors, doing for the corporation the very work for which the corporation had been given statutory powers, owed any higher duty to the trespasser than the corporation itself; but if there be a difference, I can only think it must be this: the owner is not liable for accidents contributed to by allurements, but the contractor is, and the case which supports that view—it is not binding on me but I have great respect for the judge who decided it—is Davis v. St. Mary's Demolition and Excavation Co. Ld. [4]

The facts in that case were that the defendants were contractors working for the corporation of the City of London. They were pulling down houses which belonged to the corporation and near the houses there was an open space used by children to play on. Work had reached the stage when children could get upon the premises because certain walls were demolished, and one wall which was standing was in a very rocky state. When the coast was clear some boys got hold of some bits of gas piping, stuffed them into the cracks of this wall and heaved away, and brought the wall down on one of their heads. In those circumstances Ormerod J. said [5]: "If the defendants were the occupiers of the "site and the plaintiff was a trespasser, that clearly would be an "end of the case, following the decision in Robert Addie & Sons "(Collieries) Ld. v. Dumbreck,[6] unless the case could be brought "within the decision in Excelsior Wire Rope Co. v. Callan [7] or "Mourton v. Poulter,[8] in each of which cases the defendants "were found liable despite the fact that the plaintiff was a "trespasser because it was found that there was a reckless dis-"regard of the presence of trespassing children." He proceeded to say that the contractors were not in the same position as the corporation, and by inference that the corporation were not the occupiers of the site; but what he did say was that on the facts of the case the children were clearly trespassers. He said that if the defendants were occupiers, they would have been protected by the decision in Robert Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ld. v. Dumbreck[9]; but they were not occupiers, and he proceeded in effect to say that they owed a duty not to put allurements or lay traps for children. He said[10]: "But the plaintiff here argues that "the defendants not being the occupiers of the site, the duty as "between plaintiff and defendant is different. The plaintiff "bases his argument on the decision of the House of Lords in "Donoghue v. Stevenson."[11]"

Considering the facts of Davis v. St. Mary's Demolition and Excavation Co. Ld., Ormerod J. said[12]: "Under those circum-"stances, it appears to me that the foreman in considering "whether the premises were safe and considering against whom "the premises had to be made safe ought to ask himself the "question—which does not seem to call for any great exercise "of the imagination—Are children likely to come on this site, "and, if they do, are they likely to interfere with the brickwork "and the building generally? That they were likely to come on "the site, I think, could admit of only one answer. The foreman "would be bound to answer that question in the affirmative. He "knew they were in the habit of coming on the site. Whether "they would interfere with the building in such a way as small "boys might interfere, again is a question which, in my view, "would have to be answered in the affirmative. If small boys of "12 years of age go on to a building site where there are loose "stones and bricks and where apparently in the wall in question "there are loose bricks, and if there are about the place pieces "of old gas pipe and other such implements, it seems one of the "most likely things that in the course of an afternoon's play "there will be some interference with some part of a building "such as that in course of demolition which must offer a constant "allurement and temptation to any child who is within sight "of it." It seems to have been the judge's view that the contractors were liable on those facts, because they had put an allurement upon land of which they were not the occupiers, and therefore had not the protection of Robert Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ld. v. Dumbreck.[13]

I have to decide the liability of the contractors in the present case upon the facts. I would not have thought that they had any higher duty on these facts than the corporation, but I am prepared to assume that they had. Now let me consider the question of whether they had put an allurement on this road. What is an allurement? I suppose it is something attractive but dangerous, although not apparently so—something insidious. The capacity of an object to attract will, of course, vary with the age and experience of the person concerned—the turntable in Cooke's case,[14] the colliery wheel in Addie's [15]—but would present neither attraction nor deception to adults, who would probably avoid them as being both dirty and dangerous.

Children, on the other hand, would not mind the dirt and would be ignorant of danger. Can a hole in the ground be an allurement? I think not. There is nothing insidious about a hole in the ground; its danger is not concealed. It was broad daylight and was quite obvious to a child, and the infant plaintiff knew he must not go beyond the barrier. If a hole in a road is an allurement, what about dozens of objects met with in the daily life of children? What about a canal, an unfastened window, a flight of stairs? They are all dangers—especially if one falls down them—but children know it. I cannot see anything alluring about a hole in the ground; and having come to that conclusion, it seems to me that the case even on that footing fails against the contractors as well as against the corporation. There must be judgment, therefore, for both defendants.

* COTTON v. WALLIS.

[Plaint No. L. 148.]

Building—Contract—R.I.B.A. form—House "built down to a price" —Defects in materials and workmanship—Final certificate issued by architect—Liability of architect to building owner. Architect—Negligence.

The defendant entered into a contract with a builder, in the standard form issued by the Royal Institute of British Architects, for the construction of a house at the price of £1,910 (which was admittedly low), the plaintiff being nominated as the architect.

The contract provided, inter alia, (a) that the contractor should complete the works in accordance with the directions and to the reasonable satisfaction of the architect; (b) that defects or faults appearing within the defects liability period should on the architect's instructions be made good by the contractor, and (c) that on the expiration of the defects liability period or on the making good of defects the architect should issue a final certificate. The specification issued under the contract required that the materials and workmanship were to be the best of their respective kinds and to the full satisfaction of the architect, who had liberty to reject. At the end of the defects liability period the plaintiff issued a final certificate.

Some two years after the completion of the house, the plaintiff brought an action claiming a sum of money as balance of fees and expenses owing to him; the defendant counterclaimed for damages, alleging that the plaintiff had not exercised due skill and care in supervising the work and ensuring that the house was constructed with proper materials and good workmanship.

The county court judge dismissed both claim and counterclaim. On the counterclaim he found that, while there were a number of items of workmanship and material were not as good as they might have been, and while another architect might have required a higher standard, the house was being "built down to a price," so that the builder could not be expected to execute the work in a perfect manner; he held that the passing of the defects did not amount to negligence or breach of duty on the part of the plaintiff. On appeal by the defendant:—

Held (by Hodson and Morris L.JJ., Denning L.J. dissenting), that the judge had not erred in principle when, in testing the conduct of the plaintiff as reasonable or otherwise, he took into account the fact that the house was being built at a low price; and that, provided that the plaintiff used his skill and acted reasonably, the adequacy of the work done was a question of degree coming within the province of the judge.

APPEAL from Judge Gordon Clark, sitting at Epsom County Court.

In 1952 the defendant entered into a contract with a builder, in the standard form issued by the Royal Institute of British Architects, for the construction of a house, at a price of £1,910, the plaintiff being nominated as the architect. The contract provided by clause 1: "The contractor shall carry out and com- "plete the works in accordance with this contract in every respect "with the directions and to the reasonable satisfaction of the "architect." By clause 12: "Any defects, shrinkage or other "faults which shall appear within the defects liability period "stated in the appendix to these conditions and shall be due to "materials or workmanship not in accordance with this contract "or to frost occurring before the completion of the works, shall "within a reasonable time after receipt of the architect's written "instructions in that behalf be made good by the contractor and "(unless the architect shall otherwise direct) at his own cost." By clause 24: "Upon expiration of the defects liability period ". . . or upon making good defects under clause 12 of these "conditions, whichever is the later, the architect shall . . . issue "a final certificate of the value of the works executed by the "contractor." The specification under the contract provided that the whole of the materials and workmanship were to be the best of their kind, and to the full satisfaction of the architect.

At the end of the defects liability period (six months) the plaintiff issued a final certificate. Some two years after the completion of the house the plaintiff issued a plaint in the county court in respect of money he claimed was due to him for fees and expenses. The defendant, who had hitherto made no complaint against the conduct of the plaintiff, counterclaimed for damages, alleging that the plaintiff had not exercised due skill and care in supervising the work and in ensuring that the house was constructed with proper materials and with good workmanship. He complained, in particular, that woodworm had been found in the bathroom; that two feet of water piping in the roof had been left unlagged; that the paintwork and plastering were of inferior quality; and that a number of floor tiles in the dining room had paraffin stains. This last defect the plaintiff had required the builder to rectify. The builder took some fresh tiles to the house, but, on finding that they did not match the existing tiles, he did nothing further. The plaintiff issued the final certificate without requiring him to re-lay the floor as a whole.

The county court judge dismissed the plaintiff's claim. On the counterclaim, he found that there was a certain amount of inferior material and scamped workmanship, but, taking into account the fact that the house was being built down to a price, he held that a certain tolerance must be expected, and that the plaintiff had not failed in his duty, although another architect might have required a higher standard; and he gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed.

DENNING L.J. In 1952 Mr. Wallis determined to build a house at No. 93 Gilhams Avenue, Banstead, for which purpose he employed Mr. Hillman as the builder, and he also employed Mr. Cotton, carrying on business in New Malden, to do the architect's work. Mr. Cotton himself is a Fellow of the Auctioneers' Institute, but he has a qualified architect on his staff.

A contract was drawn up in the ordinary R.I.B.A. form whereby the builder agreed to build the house for £1,910, Mr. Cotton being nominated as the architect. There was an oral arrangement between Mr. Wallis, the owner of the house, and the architect, that the architect would charge £90 for the architect's fees.

The house was built, and at the end of 1952 Mr. Wallis went into occupation, the house then being practically complete. But there was a "the defects liability period" of six months allowed in the contract for the making good of defects. During those six months, between January and July, 1953, the architect called the attention of the builder to some things which required attention. In particular there were some stains on the tiles of the floor. The builder's men had been careless and dropped paraffin on the tiles, and they had become stained. The architect, in two letters, drew the attention of the builder to that defect, but the builder did not remedy it. It is fair to say that on one occasion the builder took some new tiles to the house so as to replace the stained ones, but they were not the same colour and did not match, so he did not put them in and he did nothing more about it. Another defect was that the plastering and the paintwork also were not as good as they might have been, or perhaps as they should have been. The architect drew the builder's attention to it, but that defect also was not made good.

The time came when the defects liability period expired. The architect wrote to the owner (Mr. Wallis) that he understood that all these matters had been made good, and requested him to pay the builder the final instalment. Mr. Wallis did not agree that they had been made good, so he did not pay the whole of the bill, but deducted £25 from the builder's account. The architect also put in his own account, and in it he claimed not only the sum of £90 which had been agreed, but also an extra £35. In so doing he was departing from the oral arrangement that had been made. He put in also a claim for £4 17s. for out-of-pocket expenses.

I do not think that anything more would have been heard of all these defects if it had not been for the architect putting in those extra amounts of claim. When Mr. Wallis, the owner, was faced with these additional claims by the architect he then retorted and said: "You have passed a lot of work which is not "up to standard," and he said that the architect had been negligent. That was the contest in the county court, the architect suing for his extra fees, and the owner saying: "You passed a "lot of bad work."

Upon the claim itself the judge has found that the architect was not entitled to the extra £35 which he sought to charge. The judge said that the agreement was for £90, and that the architect must stand by that. He said, however, that the architect was entitled to his out-of-pocket expenses of £4 17s. The owner had paid or tendered the £90 before action, and he admitted the £4 17s. in the defence. Nevertheless, the judge thought that the proper order to make on the claim was no costs on either side. I will come back to the question of costs later.

On the counterclaim the judge thought the work had been "scamped," to use his own word. He held that the architect had applied a lower standard than another architect might have done. He said in respect of a number of items, for instance, that they were not as good as they might have been or should have been. "Nevertheless," he said, "one has to remember "that the builder was building down to a price, and that a "certain tolerance must be expected." He said that on that account, because the price for the house was a low price, the builder could not be expected to do the work in a perfect manner, or as well as might otherwise be expected. He held, therefore, that the passing of these defects did not amount to any negligence or breach of duty on the part of the architect.

Upon this aspect of the case I would draw attention to three clauses in the R.I.B.A. form of contract. The first is: "The "contractor shall carry out and complete the works in accordance "with this contract in every respect in accordance with the "directions and to the reasonable satisfaction of the architect." I observe on that clause that the directions of the architect were not observed, as, for instance, in regard to the tiles. Clause 12 provides: "Any defects, shrinkage or other faults which shall "appear within the defects liability period stated in the appendix "to these conditions and shall be due to materials or workman-"ship not in accordance with this contract or to frost occurring "before completion of the works, shall within a reasonable time "after receipt of the architect's written instructions in that "behalf be made good by the contractor and (unless the architect "shall otherwise direct) at his own cost."

Clause 24 provides that: "Upon expiration of the defects "liability period . . . or upon completion of making good defects "under clause 12 of these conditions, whichever is the later, the "architect shall . . . issue a final certificate of the value of the "works executed by the contractor."

In my opinion the duty which the architect owes to the building owner is to see that the builder does his work, and does it properly. The specification required that the whole of the materials and workmanship were to be the best of their respective kind, and to the full satisfaction of the architect. The architect is employed by the building owner and paid by him to see that the builder does his work properly. If the architect allows shoddy work to pass or work that is scamped, he does not do his duty to the owner. The contract provides that if there are defects which appear, it is the duty of the architect to call upon the builder to make them good. The architect has no dispensing power. He must hold up the final certificate until the defects are made good. That was not done in this case. The architect called the attention of the builder to these defects, but did not insist on them being put right, but nevertheless called upon the owner to pay the full amount.

It does not matter that the price is a low one. He must see that the contract is properly carried out.

I think that the judge misdirected himself in giving a dispensing power to the architect. I would have thought that the decision on the counterclaim was wrong and that the matter should be remitted to the judge to find the quantum of damages. But as I believe my brethren are of a different opinion, their view will, of course, prevail.

HODSON L.J. The appellant is the defendant who was the owner of a house, and the plaintiff was the man who acted as architect for that house, and he claimed in the action for his fee.

The defendant was found to be right in substance upon the claim, and the only appeal in connexion with the claim is in relation to the costs, with which we will deal hereafter.

Having been sued by the plaintiff for his fees as an architect, the defendant counterclaimed against the plaintiff that he had not exercised the skill, care and knowledge in the performance of his duty as an architect in supervising in a skilful manner the erection of the house and garage and ensuring that it was constructed with proper material and good workmanship in accordance with the plans and specification. On that matter the judge found in favour of the plaintiff.

Mr. Hallis, for the defendant, recognizes that he must accept the findings of fact of the judge, and has said that on the facts as found the defendant was entitled to judgment on the counterclaim, because the judge had found that there was some evidence of scamped workmanship, and that the decoration, painting and plastering, and so on, was not as good as it should have been. Mr. Hallis accordingly submits that there was a misdirection on the part of the judge in this sense: that he had treated the architect as entitled to disregard the specification as to how the work was to be done, and what was to be done, and had really given the architect a dispensing power to pass bad work, whereas good work (and good work only) was necessary for the performance of the contract by the builder; it being the duty of the architect, as the watch-dog on behalf of the owner, to see that the work was carried out properly.

For my part I have read and re-read the judgment, and I am of opinion that that criticism is not well founded. I do not think that the judge misdirected himself, nor did he regard the architect as having a dispensing power to cut down the standard which was required of the builder. It is perfectly true that he used expressions which show that the work of the builder might have been better. But when one reads the note prepared on behalf of the plaintiff—which was accepted by the judge as being an accurate representation of what he said—I am bound to say that I do not find anything there which justifies the main criticism which Mr. Hallis has put forward. I shall refer to that judgment in a little further detail.

Mr. Hallis's main complaints were as follows: he said that the architect had been treated as entitled at the owner's expense to a measure of neglect; that the judge had wrongly thought that substantial performance of major matters relieved the architect of his duty as to minor matters; that the fact that the remedy is a troublesome and expensive one does not mean that one can let the builder off repairs, and that the architect had no business in the matter of the tiles (with which I shall deal in a little more detail later) to excuse the builder from putting right what was wrong; finally, that the judge wrongly considered that as the defendant had got good value, he was not entitled to complain of breaches by the builder, and that accordingly the architect could disregard the breaches.

Hodson L.J.

With regard to the observations of the judge about the good value which the building owner obtained, as I read those observations, I think they were merely inserted in his judgment not as ground for his decision, but in the hope perhaps of consoling the building owner for losing his claim against the architect in respect of these, as the building owner no doubt thought, pieces of defective work which had been performed by the builder. One really comes back to the question: What was it that was complained of, and what were the judge's findings on those matters? They come mainly, I think, under four heads: Tiles, pipes, woodworm and paint. The complaint about the pipes sounds a small one, but it might well have been a serious matter if it had been established. It was this, that before the owner went into the house the pipes were not lagged in accordance with the contract; the reason for that was that he wished to get in promptly. However, the lagging was done afterwards, and the builder gave evidence which, so far as one can see, was accepted by the judge, that he had done the whole of the lagging of the pipes himself. That was in 1952 or 1953. In 1954 there was trouble owing to a freeze-up; a tank buckled and the Water Board had access to the pipes. In 1955 the premises were inspected by an expert witness for the purposes of this case, and two feet of pipe were found to be exposed, not lagged, and the defendant—who works in a printer's warehouse—obtained some printing felt and lagged the pipes himself.

In that state of the evidence the judge found the facts in favour of the plaintiff, and against the defendant. In his judgment he refers to the evidence to which I have called attention and ends by saying: "At a very much later date after all sorts "of other events"—that statement including the visit by the Water Board in January, 1954—"it was found that two feet "had not been lagged. I cannot say that it has been satisfac- "torily proved to my satisfaction that this shows any lack of "supervision." It is quite true that the judge says that it was found that two feet of pipe had not been lagged. Perhaps, in order to express what I have stated, he should have said: "It was found that two feet were not lagged." I cannot see how the evidence given in this case could lead to any other conclusion but that two feet were unlagged in 1955, which throws no light on whether Mr. Hillman was right or wrong in saying that he did the work years earlier over the whole system of pipes without leaving any out. So much for the pipes.

In regard to the woodworm, Mr. Hallis very fairly conceded that he could not make much of that because the judge found that the attention of the architect was not drawn to this by the building owner, and it was not a matter which was so obvious as to be seen. The worm apparently worked its way eventually through the paint, but the judge could not possibly hold against the architect that he was negligent for not observing this if his attention was not drawn to it.

The third major matter was the paintwork and the plastering. That requires consideration. The judge undoubtedly took the view—having seen the house and having taken into account the fact that the paint had been on for two years, and that there were only two coats of paint—that the standard of paintwork was moderate. Here perhaps I should use the language that the judge used which covered this matter: "There are certain com- "plaints that are made which complaints really amount to this, "that the architect did not supervise properly and allowed the "builder to get away with a certain amount of shoddy work. "I think that there is no complaint that does not come under "that head in one way or another—at any rate the painting, "plastering and exterior is not admittedly as good as it could "be "—I drew attention to that phrase "as good as it could "be." "I am not at all sure one might not say 'not as good "'as it should be.' One must remember that, as Mr. Cotton "very properly put it to me, they were building down to a price. "That must mean that a certain tolerance must be expected. "I think that this accounts for a very great deal of the com- "plaints, if not indeed for all of them."

Later the judge deals with other matters and says: "Very "much the same story extends all the way through—the leaded "lights, and so on. There are imperfections in the house, as "I think there are in practically every house, but in very few "matters does it seem to me that there is anything like the point "where I can say: 'Their architect failed here—he ought to "'have noticed this—or he ought to have ordered the builder "'to put this right.'" I notice particularly the expression: "In very few matters does it seem to me that there is anything "like the point where I can say: 'The architect failed here.'"

Taking a broad view on what I have been discussing—the paintwork and other matters—I think that the judge has not come to the conclusion that the architect failed, but that he had not (except in a few cases) even approached failure. Of course, the question still remains, what is the standard which had to be applied. Here, I think, is the crux of the case, because Mr. Hallis eventually conceded that, when one considered this matter, one could not leave out of account altogether the price at which the work was to be done. The house was not a very expensive house. Even taking into account and giving proper weight to the language of the specification: "The whole of the "materials and workmanship is to be the best of their respective "kinds and to the full satisfaction of the surveyor who shall be at "liberty to reject any materials," and so on, "and any work "he may consider done in an unsatisfactory manner to be "carried out to his full satisfaction"—bearing in mind the terms of the contract for the building of this house and in particular what I have said about the paintwork—that there were to be only two coats—and not leaving out of account the price, I cannot see that the judge was wrong in taking the view that there must be some tolerance (to use his word) in building down to a price. The question of the adequacy of the work, provided that the architect used his skill and acted reasonably, was a matter for the county court judge coming within the limits of questions of degree which were in his province.

COTTON v. WALLIS.
Hodson L.J.

I have in mind in particular the contract between the building owner and the builder—a standard R.I.B.A. contract—with the standard conditions attached thereto, the first condition of which is as follows: "The contractor shall carry out and complete the "works in accordance with this contract in every respect in "accordance with the directions and to the reasonable satis-"faction of the architect." The judge's finding, I think, is to the effect that the work was carried out in accordance with the reasonable satisfaction of the architect in so far as the matters with which I have so far dealt are concerned. He undoubtedly came to the conclusion that this architect was not as hard on the builder as he might have been, or as another architect might have been. But he was quite clear in his opinion that no case of professional negligence had been made out against the plaintiff. He concluded his judgment by saying: "They"—that is the plaintiff, including no doubt in the word "they" not only the plaintiff, who was not a professional architect, but his servant who was—"applied perhaps a lower standard than another "architect might have done under different circumstances, but "they never passed anything 'rank bad,' and I cannot find "them guilty of professional negligence."

I have left till last the case of the tiles, which I think does stand on a different footing. The architect in this case was obviously not simply backing up the builder at every stage and doing nothing for his client, because the correspondence shows that he was drawing the attention of the builder to the work which needed doing to put things right. He drew the attention of the builder to these stained tiles. They were "Marley" tiles which were stained, no doubt, by paraffin dropped by the builder's men when working in the house. These stains were not very bad, but they were noticeable, and the sort of thing which a housewife would naturally object to. When the attention of the architect was called to this defect, he drew the attention of the builder to it with a view to having the matter put right. There were a number of stained tiles, there is no specific evidence as to the number of tiles, but the judge did see the stains, and there was evidence to the effect that the largest of them was the size of about half-a-crown or the size of a tennis ball.

The question arose then as to what was to be done to put the matter right. Apparently these tiles mark very easily, and even if a rug is put on them, if the rug is taken up after an interval there is left the mark where the rug has been. When the question of dealing with these tiles arose the builder came round with some other tiles with a view to replacing the marked ones, and according to the evidence of the builder (which, I think, is the only evidence upon this point) the tiles that he brought round did not match, and it was inferred from that that they did not match to the satisfaction of the building owner or his wife. So they were taken away and nothing more was done. The architect did—I again infer from the correspondence—issue his final certificate on the basis that the tile work was to be charged for; and, accordingly, Mr. Hallis says: " In regard to this the position " is clear, because my client was entitled to have the whole floor " taken up and put down again. It is no good to say that the " remedy is so out of proportion. If the builder was wrong he " has to put the matter right, and the architect has to see to " that."

I think that this matter did come within the province of the architect. He did say that the tiles which were marked should be replaced, and when they could not be replaced by matching tiles it appears that nothing further was done, and the architect passed the matter through. Again, in this respect, although I agree that the situation is rather different from the matters which I have found perfectly clear up to date, he was, in my view, not going outside the scope of clause 1 of the conditions attached to the agreement providing for the architect being reasonably satisfied with what had been done by the builder in accordance with his directions, although all that had been done by the builder was to do the best he could to match the tiles which had previously been laid. As my Lord pointed out, it seems a little odd that there were no tiles left over, or that it was not possible to match tiles of a well-known make, like " Marley " tiles, without difficulty. But again, this I think was a matter which was passed to the reasonable satisfaction of the architect, and therefore, that nothing can be made of this point—which was really, I think, the only point left in the case at the end—to enable the defendant to succeed on the counterclaim.

For these reasons, therefore, I think the appeal fails on the main matter which has been argued here, and there remains only the question of costs.

MORRIS L.J. I have found myself in this matter in agreement with the judgment of the county court judge, and I share the conclusions reached by Hodson L.J.

I have read and re-read the notes that have been provided for us of the judgment delivered by the learned judge, and when those notes are read as a whole I do not think that he erred in any way in principle. Nothing that I propose to say I hope will give any countenance to the view that a sort of general dispensing power was given to the architect. He entered into a contract with the man who employed him. The terms of that contract are known, and he must carry out that contract. We have also before us the terms of the contract made between the building owner and the builder, and attention has already been directed to clause 1 of the conditions of that contract, the first sentence of which reads: "The contractor shall carry out and complete the "works in accordance with this contract in every respect in "accordance with the directions and to the reasonable satisfaction "of the architect."

As I read the judgment of the judge, he takes the view that it is reasonable to have in mind that the price of the house that was being built was a price of £1,910. The evidence satisfied the judge that that was a low price, and I think he did not err in taking the view that, when measuring the finish of the work, it was proper to have in mind the kind of house that was being built, and the price of that house. It seems to me only natural that where there is a house that is being built at a very great expense, and another house that is being built at a very moderate price, one would expect different quality in the work. Of course, everything must depend upon the exact contract that is made. If someone contracts to give the very best possible workmanship for the lowest possible price, then, of course, the contract must be carried out. But I do not find that the judge here erred in principle in any way when he said that there was in this case the fact that the price was a low one, and when he tested the conduct of the architect by considering whether the architect acted reasonably, and whether he performed his contract with the building owner in what he did. Did he wrongly let the builder off, or did he apply his mind to deciding whether the builder had in his judgment done what under the contract the builder had contracted to do? It seems to me that the judge said: "Each "architect might have a different perception. Each architect "might come to a slightly different conclusion on the one set of "facts." But the judge thought that this architect had not failed to do what he had contracted to do.

Hodson L.J. has referred to certain passages in the judgment which I have had in mind, and I think that they show the way in which the judge's mind was working, and I do not see any error in principle at all. He said: "One must remember that, "as Mr. Cotton very properly put it to me, they were building "down to a price." Mr. Cotton had said in his evidence: "Building down to a price and not up to a standard." The judge went on: "That must mean that a certain tolerance must "be expected. I think that this accounts for a very great deal "of the complaints, if not, indeed, for all of them." Then at the end of his judgment the judge said: "Mr. Cotton and his "assistant, Mr. Lofthouse, might well have been rather more "hard on Mr. Hillman than they were, but they knew that this "was being done as a cheap job and could not afford any very "expensive work. They applied perhaps a lower standard than "another architect might have done under different circum-"stances, but they never passed anything 'rank bad,' and I "cannot find them guilty of professional negligence."

Mr. Hallis not unnaturally referred to certain phrases in the judgment, and, of course, one or two of the phrases can perhaps be looked at in a very critical way, and some argument then based upon that critical examination. But I think that this judgment must be read as a whole, and I see no fault in it. The judge tried this case for three days and spent over two hours in examining the house.

[His Lordship then referred to the fact that the defendant had made no complaint until the plaintiff claimed further remuneration, and continued:] But the judge, though recognizing that fact, nevertheless proceeded very carefully to deal with the counterclaim on its merits. That there is a bad reason for putting forward a claim does not necessarily invalidate the claim, if it can be shown to be a good one.

I would add only a word or two about this item of the tiles. It is true that the contract provides by clause 12 as follows: [His Lordship read the clause, and continued:] What happened in regard to the tiles has already been described. It was not that the tiles were bad tiles, or that they were badly put in. Apparently everything was done perfectly correctly. But after it had all been done, by some mischance paraffin was spilt on the tiles. This occurrence may not at first sight seem to come within the phrase "workmanship" in clause 12, but at the same time I think that clause 12 probably does cover it, because I suppose "workmanship" covers everything that may be done or left undone by the workmen until the time that the house is handed over. But it is a rather special circumstance which was an unfortunate mischance.

As has been pointed out, this is not a case where the architect did nothing. He did write to the builder in January, 1953, asking that the tiles be dealt with. At a much later date, in June, 1953, he again wrote and asked that attention should be given to the matter. Then, as has been pointed out, it was found that they could not rub the paraffin stains off, although there is some suggestion that steel wool might achieve that purpose, but that the tiles would have to be taken up. Tiles could not then be found that matched, and so the result was that they had either to leave these stains, or else to take the whole of the floor up although it had been quite properly put down in the first place. In considering that I think the architect was entitled to have regard to the sort of stains that they were. [His Lordship reviewed the evidence regarding the stains, and continued:] On that evidence it seems to me that it was within the competence of Mr. Cotton, the architect, having regard to the whole of the circumstances and the size and number of these stains, to say that he could pass the work as being reasonably within the standard of what was to be done, and I do not think that the judge erred in principle.

The tests of a reasonable standard and of reasonable conduct are, after all, very good tests, and it may be that the judge thought that this matter—on which so much time has been spent, and of which nobody would ever have heard a word had it not been that a wrong claim was put in for more fees—was de minimis. It appears to me trifling.

C. A.

Morris L.J.

The money amount of this claim I do not know. Apparently the whole claim was put forward on the basis not of indicating the particular sum required to put any specific matter right, but of indicating how the value of the house had diminished because of the totality of these complaints, and it was said that the house was worth £200 less than it ought to have been, a figure which the judge thought in any case would have to be critically examined.

That is the item of the tiles which, perhaps, has assumed a major importance, and I do not want to take up time in dealing with other matters. It seems to me that they come within the principle primarily enunciated by the judge that the architect was entitled to apply his mind fairly and honestly to the question whether this work had reasonably been done so as to satisfy the contract, and he came to the conclusion that it had been. Whether someone else in similar circumstances might have come to a different conclusion does not seem to me to matter. It appears to me that the judge considered the evidence before him with very great care; he came to the conclusion which he indicated in his judgment, and I do not feel that this court should interfere with it.

Factory—Dangerous machinery—Fencing—Unfenced nip between conveyor belt and roller—Employee cleaning machine in motion—Causation—Contributory negligence—Apportionment of liability—Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 14 (1).

Causation.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants in their factory to operate and clean a sand preparation plant. Sand was carried along an electrically driven conveyor belt, over a headroller and into a suction fan. The fan was fenced, but there was no fencing of the nip between the conveyor belt and the roller. The plant was normally cleaned while the parts were stationary, but one evening, after work had ceased and the foreman had left, the plaintiff switched on the current and began to clean the plant with the machinery in motion and in doing so caught his hand between the roller and the belt and suffered injuries. The trial judge held that the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty to fence under section 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, but that the plaintiff had been guilty of contributory negligence; and he apportioned the damages equally between them:—

Held, (1) that the part of the machinery where the roller met the belt was dangerous, as, in the ordinary course of events, danger might reasonably be anticipated from its use without the protection of a fence, and the defendants were, accordingly, in breach of section 14 (1) of the Act of 1937.

Dictum of Wills J. in Hindle v. Birtwistle [1897] 1 Q.B. 192; 13 T.L.R. 129 applied.

(2) That the absence of a fence was in part the cause of the accident and it was no defence to say that a fence would have to be removed in order to clean the machinery, since it was impossible to tell whether the accident would still have happened had there been an effective guard—for example, whether the plaintiff would have been deterred from acting as he did or whether he would have removed the guard. Dictum of Lord Goddard C.J. in Roberts v. Dorman Long & Co. Ld. [1953] 1 W.L.R. 942; [1953] 2 All E.R. 428 applied.

(3) That in the circumstances the plaintiff's negligence was greater than the defendants' negligence, and liability would be apportioned one fifth to the defendants and four-fifths to the plaintiff and the damages recoverable by the plaintiff reduced accordingly.

APPEAL from Oliver J.

The plaintiff, Robert David Williams, was injured on August 15, 1952, when he was working for the defendants at their iron foundry at Port Penrhyn, near Bangor. He, together with his foreman, one Jones, was the operator of an electrically driven sand preparation plant. Part of the plant consisted of a conveyor belt which, gradually rising, carried sand up to and over a headroller where there was a suction fan. The fan drew the sand into a disintegrator where the cleaning process of the sand was completed. The fan was fenced, but there was no fencing of the nip between the conveyor belt and the roller. Some sand adhered to the roller and the belt and these were cleaned each evening by the foreman and the plaintiff when work on the plant had ended and whilst the machinery was stationary. On August 15, 1952, after the foreman had left, the plaintiff decided to carry out further cleaning work. He put the machinery in motion and placed a steel brush upon the belt at the point where it passed over the headroller. The movement of the roller drew the brush and the plaintiff's hand and arm into the nip between the roller and the underside of the conveyor belt. His arm was severely injured and amputation was necessary.

The plaintiff claimed damages against the defendants for negligence and/or breach of section 14 (1) [1] of the Factories Act, 1937, in that they had not protected the plant with a fence or guard. Oliver J. at Chester Assizes on November 2, 1954, held that the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty, but that the plaintiff had been guilty of contributory negligence and was equally to blame. He awarded the plaintiff £1,782 15s. damages, half the total amount which he would have awarded if there had not been contributory negligence.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 25. SINGLETON L.J. The plaintiff was employed by the defendants at their iron foundry as a labourer and, along with his foreman, Jones, he worked upon, and cleaned, a sand preparation plant at the foundry, which is a factory within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937. On August 15, 1952, his right hand was caught in a nip between the belt and the head-roller of an electrically driven belt conveyor on the plant, and he sustained severe injuries to his hand and arm. He brought this action against his employers alleging that his injuries were caused through breach of statutory duty or negligence on the part of the employers. At the trial of the action Oliver J. held that the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty, and that they were responsible in damages to the plaintiff, and, further, that the plaintiff himself was negligent. He found that they were equally to blame, and he awarded £1,782 15s. damages to the plaintiff, one-half of the amount the plaintiff would have recovered if he had not been guilty of negligence. The defendants appeal to this court.

The finding against the defendants is that they were in breach of section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937, in that the place on the machine at which the plaintiff's hand was caught was a dangerous part of machinery and was not fenced as is required. [His Lordship read sections 14 (1) and 16 of the Factories Act, 1937,[1] and continued:]

[1] Factories Act, 1937, s. 14 (1): "Every dangerous part of any "machinery, other than prime movers "and transmission machinery, shall "be securely fenced unless it is in "such a position or of such construc-"tion as to be as safe to every person "employed or working on the "premises as it would be if securely "fenced."

S. 16: "All fencing or other safe-"guards provided in pursuance of the "foregoing provisions of this Part of "this Act shall be of substantial "construction, and constantly main-"tained and kept in position while "the parts required to be fenced or "safeguarded are in motion or in "use . . ."

Mr. Beney, on behalf of the defendants, raised three points: 1. that this was not a dangerous part of machinery; 2. that the absence of a guard did not cause, or contribute to, the accident which was due to the deliberate act of the plaintiff himself; 3. that upon the judge's findings the fault on the part of the defendants was very much less than that upon the plaintiff, and the proportionate liability ought to be materially altered.

In an iron foundry much use is made of sand, and the plant upon which the accident happened was used for the purpose of reconditioning sand so that the same sand can be used again and again. The plant is in two parts. The first part crushes and cleans the sand, which is then delivered on to a conveyor belt of the second part which, gradually rising, carries the sand up to and over the headroller where there is a suction fan. The fan draws the sand into a disintegrator where the cleaning process is completed. The fan was fenced, but there was no fencing of the nip between the conveyor belt and the roller; when the plant was working the movement of roller and belt was slow, and it would appear that it had not been thought to be a dangerous part of machinery; it was about 3 ft. 6 ins. above floor level. A certain amount of sand adhered to the roller and belt, and in order to keep the movement even the plant was cleaned by the foreman and the plaintiff each evening when work upon it ended. There was a switch near the plant and a main switch a little further away, by which electric power was put on or off. On August 15 work upon the plant finished somewhat earlier than usual; the plant was cleaned, and the foreman left about 4.50 p.m. A little later the plaintiff determined to do some more cleaning and to do it when the plant was in motion. Accordingly he turned on both switches; he then used a steel brush upon the headroller which was moving round, and his hand was caught between the roller and the belt. The judge described his course of conduct as "hopelessly dangerous."

The plaintiff's case as pleaded was that he was cleaning away sand from the headroller by means of a wire brush whilst the conveyor was in motion. Particulars were asked for, and these were the particulars given: "As the defendants their "servants or agents well knew sand frequently accumulated on "the head roller of the conveyor causing tension on the con- "veyor belt. This frequently occurred while the plaintiff was "working on the disintegrator on dates which the plaintiff cannot "specify. On such occasions the plaintiff cleared away the "accumulated sand while the power was switched on. This "practice was known to the senior man working on the machine "and must have been seen by employees of the defendants "whom the plaintiff cannot identify. Nevertheless the plaintiff "was at no time warned that it was dangerous so to remove "sand and was never instructed not to do so or prohibited from "so doing. Accordingly, in the premises, the plaintiff says that

" the defendants impliedly acquiesced in the said practice and/ " or must be deemed so to have acquiesced."

That case was supported by the evidence-in-chief of the plaintiff and by that of some other witnesses, but on cross-examination it disappeared and the judge found that it was wholly untrue. His reference to the plaintiff's evidence is helpful: " Now one turns to his evidence. ' I cleaned this " ' roller twice or three times in all during the six months that " ' I had been working at the machine. I haven't cleaned it in " ' any other way. I cleaned it by wire brush '—and he " describes the way—' and I was successful when I did it.' Then " he describes how on this particular occasion the foreman went " away and then he says this: ' This roller, owing to sand upon " ' it, had not been working satisfactorily for about a week.' " That, of course, is a ridiculous statement. The roller was " cleaned, and had to be cleaned, at least once a day, and as " he later admitted in his evidence that was so and that it " had been cleaned earlier that evening. ' So I switched on " ' the machine,' he said, ' and continued my cleaning method.' " It was his hand that let the tiger out of the cage, and I am " quite satisfied—unpleasant as it is to admit it—that he knew " the proper way to do it; he had seen it done over and over " again. He had helped it to be done over and over again, and " it was a piece of sheer folly to have turned on this machine " that day—of that much I am quite satisfied. He had never " seen it done in this way, and I am quite satisfied he had " never before done it in this way himself. He was then cross-" examined. He said: ' Jones and I had cleaned this machine " ' many times.' He was asked over and over again, both by " counsel for the defendants and by me, whether it was not " cleaned every day, and he would not answer the question. " He never has answered it, and that remains unanswered. " ' When Jones was there the machinery was stopped when the " ' work was done. That is the proper way of doing it. The " ' roller would, of course, tend to draw the brush under the " ' belt. We used to stop the machine,' and he then described " what was the most proper process of cleaning the machine " which was to stop it and continue cleaning part of the surface " of the roller in the position in which it was stopped. Then " by manipulating the switch they ' inched ' the thing round, " by just touching the switch now and again the belt moved a " foot at a time, and that was the proper way of doing it. That " was how he described the way he had always seen it done. " That evidence comes from him. He is then pressed about " whether that roller had not been cleaned that very evening " before Jones went away and eventually he said this: ' It is " ' true that before Jones went away he and I had been cleaning " ' the roller and the belt.' And he admits—I have already " referred to this before—he went off and switched off not only " this machine but also the main check switch. That was how

" the evidence stood when he went out of the witness-box. He " had never seen Jones do it otherwise than when the machine " was stationary, that the correct method was the one described, " that the roller had been cleaned that very evening by him " and Jones. I hold in reserve, for the moment, the question " of whether I believe he had ever done that himself at all " before with the roller running."

The judge, having referred to the evidence of other witnesses, much of which he found to be entirely unsatisfactory, said: " I " find as a fact that this plaintiff, so far from having made a " practice of doing what he said he did on this occasion, never " did it at all, and the only guide he had as to how to clean it " was the guide he had had every day of the six months or " more when he was operating with Jones. He knew."

On the first point raised on the appeal, Mr. Beney submitted that the part of the plant at which the plaintiff's hand was caught was not a dangerous part of machinery within the meaning of section 14 of the Act. The belt, he said, moved very slowly, and the roller was close to a wall and in a position in which no one would anticipate danger; and, moreover, at the time the plaintiff went to the plant there was no danger, for it had been cleaned, and in the normal course it would not have been touched again until the next day. He drew our attention to section 16, from which it could be said that the obligation to fence only continued when a machine such as this was in motion, for there was no danger at any other time. The opinion of Oliver J. on this point was as follows: " Now to what con- " clusions does one come? First of all, this machine was " unfenced. So it was—absolutely unfenced. It was strenu- " ously argued for the defendants that although unfenced it was " not the dangerous part of the machine, but one does not want " experts' evidence on that. One's own experience tells one " that anybody who is moving about working near that belt " when it is unfenced may get caught, as the plaintiff got caught. " I say no more than probably get caught, but I do not think " you can imagine a more obvious result than this. It is not " without importance to observe that Mr. Jones, in spite of " the way he ended up his evidence, began by saying in effect, " that it would be madness to try and clean that thing with the " roller running. You could not do it, and if you tried to do " it you were almost sure to get caught. Now that statement " was in contradiction to the way in which he treated the back " roller, which was in all respects the same, which equally could " not be done this way without someone getting caught, so I " come to the conclusion therefore that that was a dangerous " piece of unfenced machinery."

I agree with the judge's conclusion. There will never be a more helpful guide upon this than the judgment of Wills J. in Hindle v. Birtwistle,[2] where he said: " It seems to me that

WILLIAMS v. SYKES & HARRISON LD.
Singleton L.J.

" machinery or parts of machinery is and are dangerous if in " the ordinary course of human affairs danger may be reasonably " anticipated from the use of them without protection. No " doubt it would be impossible to say that because an accident " had happened once therefore the machinery was dangerous. " On the other hand, it is equally out of the question to say " that machinery cannot be dangerous unless it is so in the " course of careful working. In considering whether machinery " is dangerous, the contingency of carelessness on the part of the " workman in charge of it, and the frequency with which that " contingency is likely to arise, are matters that must be taken " into consideration. It is entirely a question of degree." I believe it is unnecessary to look in a case of this kind further than the test laid down by Wills J. so many years ago. Applying the test there given, I consider that this was a dangerous part of machinery when the plant was working.

The question of causation presents much more difficulty. It is claimed that the injuries to the plaintiff were not caused by a breach of section 14 (if there was one), but were due to the deliberate act of the plaintiff himself. He turned on both switches and started to clean the plant when it was in motion. He had not done that before, so the judge found. If there had been a guard he would have moved it if he had decided to clean the plant. And, again, there was no reason why there should have been a guard upon it at night time when it was not, and was not intended to be put, in motion. Thus it was argued that the absence of a guard did not contribute to the accident in any sense. On the other hand, it was pointed out by Mr. Thompson that the accident could not have happened if the terms of section 14 were complied with: the dangerous part of machinery had never been securely fenced; an accident happened of a kind which was likely to happen if the statutory duty is not fulfilled, and it was the very thing which the section was designed to prevent happening. Reliance was placed on that which was said by Lord Goddard C.J. in Roberts v. Dorman Long & Co. Ld.[3] That was a case in which it was said that there was a breach of a statutory duty in not supplying belts for people who had to work at a height, and an argument was raised to the effect that the workmen would not have used them if they had been provided. The Lord Chief Justice said[4]: " It may " very well be that the judge could form the opinion on the " evidence that it was unlikely that if safety belts had been " available the deceased would have used one, but, in my " opinion, once it was proved that the defendants had not these " belts available, it was no answer for them to say: ' Even if " ' we had them available, the deceased would not have used " ' them.' The fact that they were not available gave him " no opportunity of exercising his election. Had one been

" available, and had he elected to use it, while it might not " have prevented him meeting with some injury, it would cer- " tainly have prevented him from falling to his death. Some " actions for negligence are based on the failure of a person to " make inquiries when the circumstances are such as to show " that he was put on inquiry. If he is put on inquiry, and " makes none, it is no answer to say: ' Well, if I had made the " ' inquiry it would have led to no result.' That is well estab- " lished, and I need only refer to the judgment of Bankes L.J. " in A. L. Underwood Ld. v. Bank of Liverpool.[5] It seems " to me that the two things are closely analogous. If a person " who has to make an inquiry fails to do so, he cannot be heard " to say: ' But even if I had, it would have led to no useful " ' result.' So, I think that if a person is under a duty to " provide safety belts or other appliances and fails to do so, " he cannot be heard to say: ' Even if I had done so they would " ' not have been worn.' "

In the same case Birkett L.J. said[6]: " I am of opinion " that the breach of statutory duty was proved, and I do not " think that it is any answer to a breach of that duty to say " that had it been fulfilled the result would have been the same. " The deceased man had no right of election given to him as " the regulation provides, and the defendants were guilty of a " breach of the regulations which occasioned or contributed to " the death of the deceased man."

Hodson L.J. said[7]: " I would, accordingly, find that safety " belts were not available for such persons who elected to use " them. If this is so, I think it cannot lie in the mouth of " the defendants to say that this was not the cause of the " accident on the ground that the probabilities are that the " deceased would never have elected to use a belt. The man " having been killed, there is no possibility of finding out " whether he would have exercised his election one way or the " other, and I must decline to assume that he would not have " elected to use a safety belt if one had been available."

Oliver J. treated the matter in this way: " The third doctrine " was a rather ingenious one. It was this, that any reliable " fence, which completely screened all the spinning roller from " possible contact with a human hand, must be such as to " prevent cleaning unless and until you took it off, and in order " to take it off you would have to stop the machine, and there- " fore this accident would not have happened. But I do not " quite understand that. Having stopped the machine and " taken off the fence, there is nothing to prevent you starting " the machine again with the fence off. It would not be doing " anything silly. On this occasion he thought running it again " would eventually save him trouble. Therefore, I have the " argument that the damage does not flow from the absence " of the fence, but I think it is not a sound argument, because " it is impossible to tell what might have happened had there " been an effective fence. I have come to the conclusion that " this accident must be shared, or at least the pecuniary conse- " quences of it must be shared. I always find it extremely " difficult to say who is more to blame. In the event, there was " no fence on this machine, and a man would be a great fool " to do what he did, but if there had been a fence there, a " proper fence, there would not have been an accident, and so " I say that each are equally to blame."

I find this an extraordinarily difficult problem. It would be easy to say that it was a matter for the decision of the judge of first instance and that this court ought not to interfere, but the parties are entitled to have the decision of this court upon it. It is not a pure question of fact; no question was raised on the judge's findings of fact. " ' Causation,' said Lord Wright in Yorkshire Dale S.S. Co. v. Minister of War Transport,[8] " is to be understood as the man in the street, and not as either " the scientist or the metaphysician, would understand it." Some might say that the cause of the accident was the plaintiff's own act, and that the lack of fencing had nothing to do with it. There was, as I have said, no statutory requirement that the machine should be fenced that night after work had ceased and it had been cleaned; it was not a dangerous part of machinery until power was switched on again. The plaintiff knew the plant well, and on the judge's finding he knew that he was doing something which he ought not to have done. He turned on both the immediate switch and the main switch and began to do something which was " complete folly," " sheer folly," " most " stupid," and " hopelessly dangerous," to repeat expressions used by Oliver J., though the judge thought that the plaintiff meant to do something useful and that he probably thought it would save him a lot of trouble. At the same time one must not overlook the fact that a guard or fence not only gives protection but also may be valuable as a warning. If there is a guard a workman may hesitate before removing it. It may act as a deterrent, or the removal of it may be difficult.

Left to myself, and without the help of the authorities, I am inclined to think that I should come to the conclusion that the defendants' failure to comply with their statutory duty ought not to be regarded as one of, or as part of, the causes of this accident. In Stapley v. Gypsum Mines Ltd.[9] the Court of Appeal had held that any negligence and breach of the Regulations by Dale did not cause or contribute to the death of Stapley. The House of Lords (by a majority) reversed that finding and held that Dale's fault, for which his employers were liable, was a contributory cause of the accident which resulted in the death of Stapley. In the speeches of each of their Lordships who formed the majority reference is made to a passage from the speech of Lord Birkenhead in Admiralty Commissioners v. S.S. Volute [10]: " . . . the question of contributory negligence " must be dealt with somewhat broadly and upon common-sense " principles as a jury would probably deal with it. And while " no doubt, where a clear line can be drawn, the subsequent " negligence is the only one to look to, there are cases in which " the two acts come so closely together, and the second act of " negligence is so much mixed up with the state of things " brought about by the first act, that the party secondly negli- " gent . . . might, on the other hand, invoke the prior negli- " gence as being part of the cause of the collision so as to make " it a case of contribution." Indeed, it may be said that this formed the basis of their decision.

Now, it is difficult to say that the lack of a guard upon the machine in the present case and the act of the plaintiff were not so closely " mixed up " that the lack of guard could be regarded as not being part of the cause of the accident, especially when one remembers the principle stated by Lord Goddard C.J. in Roberts v. Dorman Long & Co. Ld.[11] These considerations lead me to the conclusion that the decision of Oliver J. that the accident was in part due to the defendants' failure to perform their statutory duty ought not to be disturbed.

As to the degree or measure of responsibility, I would say that much the greater responsibility rests upon the plaintiff than upon the defendants. The defendants were in breach of their statutory duty, but their failure to comply with the statute was in respect of a part of machinery which they did not consider dangerous, and which no one appears to have thought to be dangerous before this accident; its position was such that many people might well not think of an accident happening. The plaintiff, on the other hand, knew just what he was doing and, as the judge said, " It was his hand that let the tiger out of " the cage."

Having regard to the opinion I have formed as to the fault on the part of each, I would scarcely attribute as much as 20 per cent. of the responsibility for the damages to the defendants, but as both my brethren think that is a fair proportion I am prepared to agree, and I consider that it is proper for the court to make such an alteration, having regard to the course taken by the House of Lords in National Coal Board v. England,[12] following upon Stapley v. Gypsum Mines Ld.[13]

I would allow the appeal to the extent I have indicated.

HODSON L.J. stated the facts and continued: The defendants contend, in the first instance, that no fencing was necessary, since the part was not a dangerous part. They rely on the fact that there had been no previous accident, although the machine had been working for a long time, and no factory inspector had required fencing to be erected; and they said that, applying the correct test, namely, the objective test of foreseeability, that is to say, posing the question: "Ought the employer to anticipate danger?" rather than the question: "Does the event show the part was dangerous?", the court should hold that the part was not a dangerous part.

In my view the trial judge directed himself correctly on this point. He said: "One's own experience tells me that anyone "who is moving about working near that belt when it is "unfenced may get caught as the plaintiff got caught." In answering the question: "Was it foreseeable?" he said, in effect, that he did not think he could exclude from consideration a negligent act such as the foolish action of the plaintiff in switching on the machine and trying to clean it when in motion. He considered the function of the machine and its working and the normal method of cleaning, and had before him the photographs which gave him a good idea of its height from the ground and accessibility to workmen employed at the factory together with the position of the controlling switches.

On consideration of the evidence he held that the part was clearly dangerous. In so doing, I am of opinion that he came to the right conclusion and that such conclusion is fully in line with the authorities beginning with Hindle v. Birtwistle,[14] the principle of which is summarized in Redgrave's Factories, Truck and Shop Acts, 18th ed., p. 32, in the passage: "The behaviour "of human beings that has to be regarded is such behaviour as is "reasonably foreseeable which is not necessarily confined to such "behaviour as is reasonable behaviour." This passage has received judicial approval in the judgment of Tucker L.J. in Smithwick v. The National Coal Board.[15]

The defendants have argued that even if they are in breach of the section by reason of the dangerous part of the machine being unfenced when the power was switched on, nevertheless, the effective cause of the accident was not the breach but the foolish conduct of the plaintiff in switching on the current and then trying to clean the machine. This argument is an attractive one for it is said, fence or no fence, in order to clean the machine the fence would have to be removed for cleaning, and the plaintiff would have been injured in any event if he switched on the power before cleaning. The plaintiff's expert agreed that when the man was employed in the work of cleaning the roller there would not then be a guard on the machine, because the machine could not be cleaned with the guard on. Hence it is argued that there is no nexus between the breach and the accident, which was caused by the turning on of the current when no guard was there.

I think the answer to that argument is, as Oliver J. said, that it is impossible to tell what might have happened had there been an effective guard. The plaintiff's injury was certainly of the kind which compliance with the statute was designed to prevent. If the guard had been there it might have acted as a deterrent indicating the danger of that part of the machine, so that he would not have entered on the foolhardy operation of switching on the power if and when he had removed the guard. The absence of the guard would tend to lull him into a false sense of security. In my opinion the breach of section 14 is to be regarded as one of the causes of the accident.

Finally, I share with Oliver J. the difficulty in making a fair apportionment in a case such as this. On the one hand the plaintiff acted, though zealously on his employers' behalf, yet in a foolhardy and reckless manner going far beyond that excusable inadvertence which may fall short of contributory negligence. This was the immediate cause of the accident. On the other hand, there was a static breach of the Factories Act in failing to fence securely a dangerous part of a machine, which failure resulted in an injury. When one finds a combination of a static breach of the statute with, as an immediate cause, the negligent act of the injured man operating at the same time, it is, I think, peculiarly difficult to assess the proportion of the fault. It is urged that far the greater proportion of blame should be attached to the plaintiff, and in the light of the recent decisions of the House of Lords in Staplcy's case [16] and England's case [17] this court can, and should, interfere. Not without hesitation I have accepted this submission and agree that 20 per cent. only of the blame should be attributed to the defendants, and accordingly I would allow the appeal to this extent.

MORRIS L.J. stated the facts and continued: The defendants advance three submissions: (a) that the roller need not have been fenced and that there was no foreseeable risk of injury; (b) alternatively, that the omission to fence the roller was not a cause of the plaintiff's injury; (c) alternatively, that the defendants' share of responsibility should have been adjudged to have been much less than one-half.

In regard to the first of these submissions, I consider that the roller was a dangerous part of the machinery, and that the roller should have been securely fenced, and that the fencing should have been of substantial construction and constantly maintained and kept in position while the roller was in motion or in use. (See Factories Act, 1937, ss. 14 and 16; and as to the meaning of the phrase "securely fenced" see John Summers & Sons Ld. v. Frost.[18]) The evidence as to the siting and location and height from the ground of the roller gave ample warrant for the view which the judge entertained. The fact that no complaint was forthcoming from visiting factory inspectors does not deflect the conclusion to which the evidence pointed. In my judgment, the unfenced roller was dangerous for the reason that " in the ordinary course of human affairs " (see Hindle v. Birtwistle,[19] and Mitchell v. North British Rubber Co. Ld.,[20] danger might reasonably be anticipated from the use of the machinery while the roller was unfenced. It could be added that in the ordinary course of judicial affairs knowledge of the danger which lurks where someone may be caught in the nip between a moving belt and a moving roller becomes cumulative.

WILLIAMS v. SYKES & HARRISON LD.
Morris L.J.

The second submission raises questions of no little difficulty. It is presented in two days. It is said that when the foreman went away the machinery was not in motion or use, but had been stopped with the current switched off; that while such state of affairs existed there was no breach of statutory duty; and that the plaintiff was himself solely responsible for his injuries in that of his own volition he put the machinery in motion and then proceeded to clean it by a method never previously employed. In regard to this matter the position appears to have been that when the foreman went away the plaintiff was left to do other work which included sweeping up round the machine. He was about 46 years old, and had been employed by the defendants for about six years. He and the foreman were due to operate the machinery the next morning. Accordingly, in the desire, as the judge held, to do " something useful," he decided to clean the roller. He proceeded to switch on the machinery. He did this because, hoping to employ his time profitably, he conceived the idea of cleaning the roller with a wire brush while the roller was revolving. This method had not been adopted before and was described by the judge as " complete folly "; but in the mere switching on of the machinery he was not doing something beyond the scope of his authority. He was perfectly entitled to decide to clean the machine, and he certainly did not intend to injure himself. Though he knew that it had always been the practice to clean the roller while it was stationary, he could not have realized that his method of cleaning would so inevitably be fraught with peril.

When he put the machinery in motion the defendants became in breach of their statutory duty just as they had been, in my judgment, during the day and during all the preceding periods when, with the roller unfenced, the machinery had been in motion or in use. After putting the machinery in motion, which, for any legitimate purpose, the plaintiff was entitled to do, he was injured. There was not, and had never been, any fencing provided for the roller, and the machinery was in such a state that when it was switched on the defendants would inevitably be and become in breach of duty. It could not be switched on without effecting this result. The machinery in that state was left in the charge of the plaintiff, or left so that he might put it in motion if he thought fit. In those circumstances it seems to me that the fact that the machinery was unfenced when put in motion and that the defendants became in breach of statutory duty cannot be excluded as having some casual connexion with the plaintiff's injuries. The purpose of having fencing is to prevent contact with a dangerous part. As Lord Simonds said in Nicholls v. F. Austin (Leyton) Ld.[21]: "The "fence is intended to keep the worker out . . ." He pointed out that section 14 (1) aims at security from unintentional and even intentional contact with a dangerous part. Other authority shows that the security must be from contact which may result from careless or ill-advised conduct. (See Smithwick v. The National Coal Board.[22])

In further support of the second submission it was said that even if the roller had been fenced it would have been necessary to remove the fencing before the surface of the roller could have been cleaned, and that therefore the absence of fencing could not be regarded as a cause of the plaintiff's injuries. The evidence as recorded is in some respects not entirely clear but was, I think, to the effect that a fence would have to be removed in order to allow the cleaning of the roller. The evidence further showed that to have a safe method of cleaning the roller should be stationary.

In approaching this submission it is relevant to have in mind the words of Lord Goddard C.J. in his judgment in the Court of Appeal in Lee v. Nursery Furnishings Ld.[23]: "where you find "there has been a breach of one of these safety regulations "and where you find that the accident complained of is the very "class of accident that the regulations are designed to prevent, a "court should certainly not be astute to find that the breach of "the regulation was not connected with the accident, was not "the cause of the accident."

In my judgment, the defendants cannot successfully assert that the plaintiff would have been injured even had there been fencing. I am not prepared to make so great an assumption in their favour. I agree with the trial judge when he said that "It is impossible to tell what might have happened had there "been an effective fence." It may be that an effective fence could not be removed in a short period of time, and had there been fencing the plaintiff might not have entertained his purpose or put it into execution, in view of the time available for him. He might not have possessed the knowledge how to remove it. He might have been caused to reflect that a fence betokens danger, and so he might have been diverted from any plan of cleaning the roller while it was moving. The consulting engineer who was called on behalf of the plaintiff expressed the view that the fencing of the roller which was later installed, and which is in the form of a hood, is not adequate. The question whether the fencing is, or is not, adequate, was not an issue before the judge. But if it is being urged by the defendants that the accident would equally have happened even if the roller had been fenced, it can effectively be said on behalf of the plaintiff that if there had been secure fencing on the day of the accident it might have been of a kind which incorporated an interlocking device which would have prevented power being switched on while the fencing was not in position. I do not think that the defendants can rely on mere surmise as to what might have resulted if they had done what they ought to have done. If speculations are being indulged in, they ought not to be those most favourable to a party in default.

For these reasons I consider that there was a breach of statutory duty which operated as one of the causes of the plaintiff's injuries.

The plaintiff himself was held by the judge to have been negligent. When it comes to considering how responsibility is to be shared the approach is different from that which is apposite when causation is being decided. The Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, s. 1 (1), directs that the damages "shall be reduced to such extent as the court thinks just and "equitable having regard to the claimant's share in the respon- "sibility for the damage." In Stapley v. Gypsum Mines Ld.[24] Lord Reid said: "A court must deal broadly with the problem of "apportionment and in considering what is just and equitable "must have regard to the blameworthiness of each party, "but 'the claimant's share in the responsibility for the damage' "cannot, I think, be assessed without considering the relative "importance of his acts in causing the damage apart from his "blameworthiness."

The judge held that the plaintiff, though well intentioned, acted in a most foolish manner. He set the machinery in motion. Though doing so for the legitimate purpose of cleaning the machine, he conceived and put into execution a method of cleaning which on the judge's findings must be regarded as negligent. In the light of all the circumstances, I consider that the plaintiff's share in the responsibility for the damage should be rated very much higher than that of the defendants; I would assess the defendants' share in the responsibility as one-fifth, and that of the plaintiff as four-fifths. I would therefore vary the award of Oliver J. accordingly.

Factory—Dangerous machinery—Fencing—Transmission machinery—Unfenced machinery nine feet above ground—Unauthorized interference by worker—Causation—Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 13 (1).
Causation.

The plaintiff, an employee of the defendant company in their factory, sustained injuries in respect of which he claimed damages, alleging a breach by the defendants of their duty under section 13 of the Factories Act, 1937, to fence transmission machinery at which he was working. The machine in question, called a "wheel-"abrator," was electrically powered and used to clean metal castings and forgings. On the day in question the machine suddenly stopped owing to the wire ropes used in the transmission slipping off the two pulleys, which were nine feet high from the ground. The established practice in the factory when such a breakdown occurred was, as the plaintiff knew, to summon men from the maintenance staff to put matters right. The plaintiff, however, instead of waiting for the maintenance men, elected to do the work himself; obtained a ladder and mounted to the pulleys, leaving the electric current still on. In consequence, when he was replacing the ropes the machine started to work and his left hand was crushed between a rope and the pulley. The trial judge held that the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty to fence under section 13, but he also held the plaintiff equally to blame.

The defendants appealed, contending that the ropes and pulleys being nine feet from the ground were in such a position as to be as safe for persons working on the premises as they would be if fenced, and there was therefore no breach of section 13. Further, that if there was a breach it was not a cause of the accident:—

Held, (1) that although the risk of danger was lessened by the height of the machinery from the ground it was not possible to say that the machinery was as safe as it would have been if it had been fenced, and the defendants were in breach of section 13 (1); (2) that their breach of statutory duty was a cause of the accident, for a guard was a kind of warning or deterrent; and (3) that the plaintiff must be held ninety per cent. to blame, for the defendants could not have foreseen the negligent acts of the plaintiff.

APPEAL of defendants from Havers J.

The plaintiff, George Hodkinson, was injured on December 10, 1952, when he was working for the defendant company at their factory in Manchester. He was the operator of a transmission machine called a "wheelabrator," an electrically powered machine used for cleaning metal castings and forgings. During the course of the afternoon the machine stopped, and it was seen by the plaintiff that the wire ropes above the machine and operating it had gone off the pulley wheels, which happened occasionally. There was a recognized practice in the factory that if that sort of thing happened, or if anything went wrong with the machine, it was the duty of the operator to communicate that fact to the charge-hand or to the foreman, who would summon the fitter-mechanics of the maintenance staff, who alone were entrusted with the duty of putting the machine in order. It was not part of the operator's duty to interfere once a fault of that kind had occurred. As a rule, the fitter-mechanics would attend to the fault quite quickly. On the afternoon in question, when the plaintiff saw that the ropes were off the pulley wheels, he told the charge-hand what had happened, and the charge-hand reported to the foreman, who sent for the fitter-mechanics, who arrived by the machine within two or three minutes of receiving the report. For some reason which was not explained the plaintiff did not wait for the fitter-mechanics. A short ladder was kept nearby for the use of the fitter-mechanics, and the plaintiff took the ladder, put it against the machine, got on top of the machine and tried to pull the ropes over the pulley wheels. As he was putting the second of the ropes over a pulley wheel the machine commenced to move, the power not having been cut off, and the plaintiff's left hand was caught between the rope and the pulley wheel, with the result that he lost two of the middle fingers of that hand. There was no sort of guard above the ropes and pulley wheels, which were nine feet above floor level.

The plaintiff brought the present action against his employers claiming damages for negligence and alleging a breach of statutory duty in failing to fence dangerous transmission machinery as required by section 13 of the Factories Act, 1937.

The claim of the plaintiff was heard before Havers J. at Manchester, and on March 22 the judge gave a considered judgment in which he found that the plaintiff was entitled to damages against the defendants in respect of the defendants' breach of the duty they owed to him under section 13 of the Act. He further found that the plaintiff himself was guilty of negligence to the extent of 50 per cent. He awarded the sum of £1,376 17s. as damages. There was some out-of-pocket loss, and the injury to the hand the judge thought would have called for an award of £2,500 general damages had the plaintiff not been at fault.

The defendants appealed.

Daniel Brabin Q.C. and Charles Elliott for the defendants.
Fenton Atkinson Q.C. and Philip Curtis for the plaintiff.

SINGLETON L.J., having stated the facts, continued: With regard to the plaintiff's claim based on negligence at common law, the judge decided in favour of the defendants. The plaintiff had given evidence to the effect that when the stoppage took place he approached the foreman, Mr. Oulton, and, after having had a word with him, the plaintiff offered to put the trouble right, and that the foreman said: "You'll help me very "much if you will do so." That was the reason, the plaintiff said, that he went up to put the ropes over the pulley-wheels. That was denied by the charge-hand and by the foreman. Havers J. rejected the plaintiff's evidence on that part of the case. Indeed, it may be said that Mr. Atkinson, during the course of the evidence of the defendants' witnesses, said that he could not pursue that point. Thus Havers J. found himself unable to accept the plaintiff's account of the accident. He accepted the evidence of the defendants' witnesses, particularly that of the charge-hand and the foreman, and there was left unexplained the reason why the plaintiff had gone up on to the machine himself, when he knew that the fitter-mechanics had been sent for and when he knew that it was no part of his duty to attend to the machine, which had stopped for some cause or other.

The defendants appeal against the award of damages to the plaintiff, and Mr. Brabin, on their behalf, raises four questions. The first is that there was no breach of the provisions of section 13 of the Act of 1937 as they have been construed in this court and elsewhere. The second is that if there was a breach by the defendants of section 13 that breach was not a cause of the accident. The third is that in any event the proportion of responsibility as assessed by the judge is wholly wrong in view of the facts found by him, and that the defendants ought not to be held responsible to the extent of 50 per cent. or anything like it. The fourth is that the damages are too high. Mr. Brabin did not pursue this last point in view of an intimation given to him by the court. It would be difficult for this court to say that the judge was wrong in assessing the general damages for the injuries to the plaintiffs' left hand at the sum of £2,500. It was a serious injury that he sustained. It may be that the amount awarded is higher than is sometimes given for an injury of that kind to the left hand, but it must be remembered that this was a man who had some years earlier sustained an injury to his right hand—the loss of his right thumb—so that his left hand would be more valuable to him after the earlier injury. I propose to say nothing more about that fourth and last point.

[His Lordship then read from the judgment of the court below the description of the machine and of the accident to the plaintiff, and continued:] Later in his judgment the judge found that the action of the plaintiff was not merely inadvertence or an error of judgment. He said: "He knew the established practice and he knew that it was not his business to deal with this breakdown, and, in defiance of the established practice, he did something which he knew it was not his business to do."

The first question which arises is upon section 13 of the Act. The judge's judgment, so far as it is in favour of the plaintiff, is based entirely on the allegation that there was a breach of section 13—the claim which was made by way of amendment during the hearing of the case. Section 13 (1) provides: "Every "part of the transmission machinery shall be securely fenced "unless it is in such a position or of such construction as to be as "safe to every person employed or working on the premises as it "would be if securely fenced." The submission of Mr. Brabin is that there was no breach of that section, for it has been held in this court that when you are considering a question of this kind you must have in mind the question of foreseeability—a question which arises under both section 14 and section 13. Mr. Brabin agreed that the part of the machinery with which we are concerned was transmission machinery, but he submitted that there was no breach because the dangerous part of the transmission machinery was at a height above the ground of nine feet. Therefore, Mr. Brabin submitted, although it was not securely fenced it was in such a position as to be "as safe for every "person employed or working on the premises as it would "be if securely fenced." The submission really is that neither section 13 nor section 14 of the Act would apply to machinery nine feet above the ground, placed as this was.

Mr. Brabin cited a number of authorities including Burns v. Joseph Terry & Sons, Ld.[1] I do not propose to go into those authorities. It is sufficient for this purpose to look at the words of the section itself and to ask whether this part of the transmission machinery, nine feet above the ground, was in such a position as to be as safe to every person employed or working on the premises as it would be if securely fenced? I do not think it is possible to say that it was. I accept readily that the risk is much less if the part of machinery is nine feet above the ground than if it is five feet above the ground, but I do not think it can be said that transmission machinery nine feet above the ground is, by reason of that fact, "in such a position as to " be as safe to every person employed or working on the premises " as it would be if securely fenced."

There was a ladder near by which somebody spoke of as " a ' temptation." Sometimes maintenance fitters might have to go up to do a repair or make an adjustment, according to the ordinary working arrangements. (I bear in mind the provisions of section 15 of the Act.) Everyone who was asked, with regard to persons who might have to go up to the place where the ropes and pulley wheels are, whether they were safe, must surely answer " No." The question depends not upon the construction of the section, but upon a plain question of fact: Is the transmission machinery in that position in such a position as to be as safe to every person employed as it would be if securely fenced? As I have said, I do not think it was, and, in spite of the argument of Mr. Brabin, and the authorities he cited, I am satisfied that his first submission fails.

His second point, that, assuming there was a breach of section 13, that breach was not a cause of the accident, presents more difficulty. Again we have been referred to various authorities. I do not propose to go into them at length. Reliance is placed by Mr. Atkinson on the judgment of Denning L.J. in Cork v. Kirby Maclean Ld.,[2] where the Lord Justice said: " Subject to the question of remoteness, causation is, I " think, a question of fact. If you can say that the damage " would not have happened but for a particular fault, then that " fault is in fact a cause of the damage; but if you can say that " the damage would have happened just the same, fault or no " fault, then the fault is not a cause of the damage. It often " happens that each of the parties at fault can truly say to the " other: ' But for your fault, it would not have happened.' In " such a case both faults are in fact causes of the damage." I am not sure that that passage carries one very much further in the determination of the question before this court today.

Some months ago there was a somewhat similar question before this court on an appeal from a decision of Oliver J. in Williams v. Sykes & Harrison, Ld.[3] In that case judgment was given by this court on March 26, 1955. That case is not yet reported but we have the transcript of the shorthand notes of the judgments. Dealing with the question of causation in that case, I said—and I hope I may repeat it—" I find this an extra- " ordinarily difficult problem. " ' to be understood as the man in the street, and not as either the " ' scientist or the metaphysician, would understand it.' "

In the present case the plaintiff went to a place to which he had no right to go. According to the judge's view, he determined to put right himself that which he saw to be wrong, and at the same time he knew he ought not to have done it; he knew that it was not part of the established practice for him to do it. It might be said that he was seeking to help his employers, and to help himself as well—he was a piece-rate worker. He went to a position which he knew was dangerous. He was asked in cross examination: "(Q.): It stands to reason, " of course, once you get these ropes back on the pulley, if " you have not locked the machine, going into the reversing " position the machine is going to move, is not it? (A): Yes. " (Q): If you are putting the rope over a pulley on something " that is going to move, you are going to get your fingers " trapped? (A): Yes."

It was said that there ought to have been a guard upon each of the ropes and pulleys, and the kind of guard mentioned by the expert witness for the plaintiff was a guard over the whole of the rope, or where the rope and wheel came together, fastened down by four screws or nuts. Havers J. wondered what good that would be in regard to a matter of this sort, and he put to the expert witness: " The guard would have to be taken off " before the rope could be put over the pulleys?" That was so; but, none the less, it has been said more than once that a guard is a kind of warning or deterrent. If there had been a guard there and the plaintiff had gone up to it and had seen the guard, with its bolts and nuts, he might well have decided to leave the adjustment of the thing to the fitter-mechanics. Again, if there had been any sort of guard over these pulley wheels, it is clear that before the plaintiff could have got to the second of them, the one on which the accident occurred, the fitter-mechanics would in fact have been there. They were there in two or three minutes, and arrived just as the plaintiff's hand was trapped between the pulley and the rope.

Therefore, I think it is right to say that if there had been a guard there this accident would not have happened—and it is important to remember that the accident is of the very kind which the statutory requirement is intended to avoid. Again I find it difficult to accept Mr. Brabin's argument that the breach of the statute was not a cause of the accident. I am inclined to think that a guard would have prevented this accident happening. Moreover, if there is a breach of statutory duty and an accident takes place of a kind which is likely to happen if the statutory duty be not fulfilled, the court ought to be slow to say that the failure to perform that statutory duty has nothing to do with the accident. I think Mr. Brabin's second point fails.

The third point deals with the division of responsibility between the plaintiff and the defendants. The learned judge in the course of his judgment did not deal specifically with the question of causation; but in two paragraphs he may be said to cover that question and the question of apportionment. These are the passages to which I refer: "A further question which I "have to consider is this: Was the plaintiff guilty of negligence "which contributed to this accident? Mr. Atkinson conceded "that there was considerable negligence, which he suggested "was about 50 per cent. I am satisfied that the plaintiff's con- "duct was not merely inadvertence or an error of judgment; he "knew the established practice, and knew that it was not his "business to deal with this breakdown; and in defiance of the "established practice he did something which he knew it was "not his business to do. Of course, he sought to make Oulton "the author of his act, and I think the reason he did that was "because he knew that he really had not got any answer unless "he succeeded in seeing that the company was saddled with a "degree of blame. In those circumstances, I think I must hold "that he was 50 per cent. to blame, and that the defendants "share the degree of culpability and responsibility."

In my opinion, there are other considerations beyond those mentioned by the learned judge and although I have reached the opinion that it is impossible to say that the defendants were not in breach, or that their breach was not a cause of the accident, I feel that it ought to be remembered that an accident of this kind was unlikely to happen and that it would not have happened to the plaintiff but for his acting in a way which the judge described as "in defiance of the established practice"; The fault of the employers is their breach of a statutory duty. Though it was a breach it was a breach which no employer would think would lead to the accident to the plaintiff so long as the plaintiff kept to the place at which he was expected to work and did not go somewhere in defiance of the accepted practice. When these considerations are borne in mind, it appears to me that the portion of blame to be attached to the plaintiff is much higher than that which ought to be attached to the defendants, even though they were guilty of breach of statutory duty. In my judgment, the plaintiff ought to bear 90 per cent. of the responsibility and the defendants should be saddled with no more than 10 per cent. of the responsibility, and I would allow the appeal to that extent.

JENKINS L.J.: I agree that this appeal should be allowed to the extent of increasing the plaintiff's proportion of blame from 50 per cent. to 90 per cent. Beyond saying that, I cannot add anything.

Building—Safety regulations—Application—"Repair or maintenance"—Preparation for—Fall of workman through fragile asbestos roof—Failure of employers to affix prominent notices that roof fragile—Workman sent up to take measurements for new roof gutter—Whether regulations applicable—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, regs. 2 and 31 (3) (a) and (b).

A workman employed by the defendants having been sent up to the roof of a building in the defendant's factory, to take a "profile" of the gutter, which needed renewing, in some manner unknown slipped and fell through the asbestos roof covering a lower building and was killed. His widow sued the defendants for damages under Lord Campbell's Act, alleging, inter alia, that the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty under reg. 31 (3) (b) of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, to give prominent notice of the fragile character of the roof:—

Held, that, on these particular facts, the work on which the deceased workman was engaged at the time of the accident was not an operation of repair or maintenance within regulation 2 (1) of the regulations, but only work in preparation for repair or maintenance and, therefore, the Building Regulations did not apply.

Decision of Oliver J. approved.

APPEAL from Oliver J., sitting at Maidstone Assizes.

The deceased, William Harry Sumner, a workman employed by the defendant company, Robert L. Priestly Ld., at their factory at Gravesend, as a handyman, was on the morning of August 11, 1953, instructed by the foreman to go up to the roof of a building and take particulars of the guttering which needed replacing. In the afternoon of that day Sumner mounted to the roof by means of a ladder and, while taking the required measurements of the gutter, he fell through an asbestos roof a distance more than 30 feet and sustained injuries from which he died. No one saw him fall and no evidence could be given of what happened.

The widow, Mrs. Amy Edith Sumner, brought the present action, claiming damages under the provisions of Lord Campbell's Act for herself and her infant children. Counsel on her behalf alleged, inter alia, that the defendants had been guilty of breaches of regulation 31 (3) (a) and (b) of the Building Regulations, 1948,[1] and that the death of Sumner was caused by those breaches.

Oliver J. held that the Building Regulations did not apply because the work on which the deceased was engaged at the time of the accident was merely work done in preparation for and not in performance of a building operation. He therefore dismissed the action. The plaintiff appealed.

Leonard Caplan Q.C. and F. E. C. Grundy for the plaintiff.
Martin Jukes Q.C. and P. H. Ripman for the defendants.

Sexton v. Scaffolding (Great Britain) Ld.[2]; Attorney-General v. Lockwood[3] were referred to in argument.

SINGLETON L.J. stated the facts and continued: On the morning of the accident the defendants' foreman, Jessup, according to his evidence, instructed Sumner to take particulars of a roof gutter—a profile of the gutter—and reminded him to take the usual precautions. It appears from what Oliver J. said in his judgment that the way of taking a profile of or recording the shape of the gutter is to use a piece of wire and to bend it until it fits into the gutter, so that it gives the dimensions of the gutter itself. It appears, further, from the evidence, that the intention of the foreman, or of the management, was that when proper particulars had been ascertained, a new gutter of the right length and of the right shape would have been ordered from someone, and that at some time that gutter would have been erected either by the defendants' own men or by someone else; I know not which. The instructions were given by the foreman in the morning, but it was not until afternoon that Sumner went upon the roof. The next thing that was known was that Sumner had met with the accident. He had apparently gone up by a ladder and then, for some reason, which no one knows, had walked along the guttering to the other end of the building, and had then fallen from that end of the building through a hole in an asbestos roof.

Sumner had been employed by the defendant company for a good many years, and for about 15 years he had been accustomed to going on the roof when there was anything to be done up there, to the knowledge of the foreman. He knew, as the judge said, better than anyone else, what he should take if he was going to do some particular work upon the roof. There were ladders and duck boards available at some part of the defendants' premises, if it had been thought necessary to take them up on the day in question, though it would have taken a little trouble, and probably would have needed the help of someone else in order to get the boards and ladders up.

Only one point was taken in this court, and that arises on the Building Regulations of 1948. Regulation 31 (3), on which the plaintiff relies, provides: "Where work is being done on or "near roofs or ceilings covered with fragile materials through "which a person is liable to fall a distance of more than 10 feet— "(a) where workmen have to pass over or work above such "fragile materials, suitable and sufficient ladders, duck ladders "or crawling boards, which shall be securely supported, shall be "provided and used; (b) prominent notices stating that the "coverings are fragile shall be affixed at the approaches thereto." The submission made on behalf of the plaintiff is that there was a breach of (a) and (b), that the death of Sumner was caused through one or both breaches, and that the plaintiff is entitled to damages.

Of course, Sumner knew more about the nature of the work than anyone else, and it might be said that a notice would not help him much, and it might be said that a breach of regulation 31 (3) in either respect was not the cause of the accident which brought about his death. I do not think it is necessary to consider those matters further, for there is a point raised by the defendants below and in this court, to the effect that these regulations do not apply to the facts of this case; and, in my opinion, the submission of the defendants, raised thereon, is right. Perhaps I should put it in another way: I am not satisfied, upon the argument of Mr. Caplan, that the Building Regulations, 1948, apply. That question depends upon a view of regulation 2 as applied to the facts of this case.

I wish to make it clear that I am dealing with the facts of this case and with nothing else. Instances have been put as to what the position would be if certain facts were proved. Some might be on one side of the line, some on another; and it is not easy to set a line which would be a guide for all purposes. Each case must depend upon its particular facts. Regulation 2 is headed: "Application of Regulations" and it reads: "These "Regulations shall apply to the following operations where under- "taken by way of trade or business or for the purpose of any "industrial or commercial undertaking, or by or on behalf of "the Crown or any municipal or other public authority, namely, "the construction, structural alteration, repair or maintenance "of a building (including re-pointing, re-decoration and external " cleaning of the structure), the demolition of a building, and " the preparation for, and laying the foundation of, an intended " building."

The first thing to which I draw attention is that there is a provision that the regulations shall apply to the preparation for certain things, the preparation for and laying the foundation of an intended building. There is no provision that the regulations shall apply to the preparation for the following operations: " the " construction, structural alteration, repair or maintenance of a " building." Oliver J. described the activities of Sumner at the time of his accident as " gaining information, making prepara- " tion for the purpose of being able to order an item belonging " to the building." He was of opinion that the regulations did not apply to the facts of this case.

It seems to me that the case falls to be determined very largely upon a question of fact. This man, at the time of his accident, had gone up to the roof in order to make a profile of the gutter. He might have been asked to make a measurement. A profile was thought better. He was not told to do any repair nor did he commence to do anything by way of repair. He was, at the request or on the instructions of the foreman, to obtain something which would have enabled a gutter to be made and which would have enabled a repair to be done. If he had been asked, when he went up the ladder, " Are you " going to repair the gutter? ", I should imagine his answer would have been " No; I am going to take measurements (or " take a profile) so that a new gutter can be ordered." If any- one was asked: " Was the man Sumner, when he was upon the " roof, engaged upon an operation of repairs? ", I think the answer would have been " No, he was not." If that was followed by the question: " Was he engaged upon an operation " of maintenance?", I am inclined to think that the answer of the ordinary person would have been the same, " He was not," though that is not quite so clear as the other part.

The first thing, as I have said, is to ascertain the facts, and I am inclined to think that this is really a question of fact, though I recognize that in many instances where the facts have been found, the question of construction of these regulations has arisen, as it will again. If one considers the question of con- struction alone, it is necessary to remember that this is a penal regulation. If there had been an inspector present when Sumner went up the ladder and upon the roof, and if the inspector had laid an information alleging an offence against regulation 31 (3), and if the information had come before justices to determine the question, what would they have had to ask themselves?—this plain, but perhaps not simple, question: Was the employee at that time engaged on an operation of repair or maintenance? Looked at in that way, it is a question of fact.

Mr. Caplan asked us to bear in mind the words of Baron

C. A.

SUMNER v. R. L. PRIESTLY LD.

Singleton L.J.

Alderson in Attorney-General v. Lockwood,[1] where the Baron said: "The rule of law, I take it, upon the construction of all "statutes, and therefore applicable to the construction of this, "is, whether they be penal or remedial, to construe them accord- "ing to the plain, literal, and grammatical meaning of the words "in which they are expressed, unless that construction leads to a "plain and clear contradiction of the apparent purpose of the "act, or to some palpable and evident absurdity." I have sought to construe the words in their plain, literal and grammatical meaning. For the purpose of this regulation, I do not think that it is shown that Sumner was, at the time he met with his accident, engaged upon an operation of repair or maintenance. That is sufficient for the determination of this question, but I prefer to look upon the matter rather as a question of fact which was decided by the learned judge against the plaintiff; and, in spite of the argument of Mr. Caplan, I am of the opinion that the judgment of Oliver J. was right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

JENKINS L.J. I agree. In my opinion the task on which the deceased was engaged at the time when he met with his accident, consisting as it did simply and solely of the making of a profile of the gutter, was not an "operation of repair" according to the ordinary and natural meaning of those words; and, inasmuch as I see no ground for construing the language of regulation 2 of the Building Regulations, 1948, otherwise than according to its natural and ordinary meaning, it follows that, in my judgment, this appeal fails and should be dismissed. I entirely agree with my Lord that every case of this kind must depend on its own particular facts, and that it is neither necessary nor desirable to attempt to lay down an exhaustive definition of what is or is not "repair" or an "operation of repairs" or "maintenance," within the meaning of the regulation. I agree that the appeal fails.

PARKER L.J. I also agree, and there is nothing I can usefully add.

Appeal dismissed.

Criminal Law—Police obstruction.

H., the son of the licensee of a hotel, returned to the hotel one night after permitted licensing hours and, seeing that police were watching the premises, knocked at the door and shouted warnings to his parents that the police were about. A police constable immediately knocked at the door, but some ten minutes elapsed before the licensee admitted him to the premises. No licensing offence was proved against the licensee, but H. was charged with obstructing the police in the execution of their duty, contrary to section 2 of the Prevention of Crimes Amendment Act, 1885, and convicted:—

Held, that the police had a right, under section 151 of the Licensing Act, 1953, to enter licensed premises at any time to see whether or not offences were being committed, and to detain them from so doing, as H. had done by giving a warning, obviously amounted to obstruction of the police in the execution of their duty and, therefore, justices were entitled to convict H.

Bastable v. Little [1907] 1 K.B. 59; 23 T.L.R. 38 and Betts v. Stevens [1910] 1 K.B. 1; 26 T.L.R. 5 distinguished.

CASE STATED by Saddleworth justices.

On June 23, 1954, an information was preferred by the police against the appellant, Roy Hinchliffe, alleging that he, on May 27, 1954, at Diggle, Saddleworth, Yorkshire, wilfully obstructed Police Constable William Charles Jones, then acting in the execution of his duty, contrary to section 2 of the Prevention of Crimes Amendment Act, 1885.

On July 21, 1954, the justices heard the information and found the following facts. The appellant was a student accountant who lived with his parents at fully licensed premises known as the Floating Light Hotel, Manchester Road, Diggle, Saddleworth. On May 27 at 11.17 p.m. Constable Jones was, with two other constables, on duty in uniform in Manchester Road. At the time the lights were on in the bar of the hotel and two cars were in its car park. The three constables saw the lights and the cars. Jones went to the front of the premises and the other two constables stood by a garage from which the rear of the premises was visible. About the same time the appellant arrived at the premises, garaged his car, knocked at one of the two front doors of the premises and said "It's me, Mum, it's all right." He stepped back from the door and saw Jones. Thereupon he knocked at the door again and said "The police are outside" and ran to the rear of the premises.

HINCHLIFFE v. SHELDON.

Immediately afterwards Jones knocked at the door and got no reply. At the rear of the premises the appellant saw one of the other constables and said to him "You'll not catch them because "I've told them you are here" and some conversation passed between the appellant and that constable about getting in through a window. The appellant then returned to the front of the premises and shouted "Make sure you are clear before you open "the door" and a few seconds later, "The place is surrounded "by police." There was no further knocking on the door which at 11.25 p.m. was opened by the licensee of the premises. Jones and one of the other constables then entered the premises and found the licensee, his wife and a hotel resident in the bar. There were no glasses or intoxicating liquor in sight; the bar counter was wet. In a room beside the bar, the door of which was closed, were six persons one of whom was the licensee's daughter. They were not consuming intoxicating liquor. The licensee had objected to the police entering that room without his permission. Jones told the appellant that he had committed the offence of obstructing the police in the execution of their duty and the appellant replied: "It wasn't obstruction; I saw you "standing out there like a fool." Jones told him that he would be reported for the offence and the appellant replied "I only "shouted 'the police are here.'"

It was contended by the appellant (a) that it was an extension of the Prevention of Crimes Amendment Act, 1885, to say that warning could be an obstruction; (b) that the decision in Betts v. Stevens [1] only applied to a person employed and paid for the purpose of defeating the police; that the justices should take no notice of the fact that the police evidently suspected a breach of section 151 of the Licensing Act, 1953 [2]; that the appellant did not try to prevent the police from entering; that there was no reason why a son should not warn his parents of the presence of the police; and that the appellant had assisted the police to gain admission to the premises.

It was contended by the respondent (a) that there was nothing in the judgments in Betts v. Stevens that prevented the justices from deciding that speech could amount to obstruction; (b) that the words used by the appellant had had the effect of rendering both observation of and gaining admission to the premises more difficult than it would normally have been.

The justices were of the opinion (a) that it was not necessary for the prosecution to prove a breach of section 151 of the Licensing Act, 1953, and no breach was proved; (b) that at all material times Constable Jones was engaged in the execution of an ordinary police duty; (c) that the conduct of the appellant was calculated to impede and obstruct the police constable in keeping observation on the licensed premises and that the words spoken by the appellant were the substantial cause of the police constable's not being admitted to the premises in a normal time after knocking for admittance. Accordingly, they convicted and fined the appellant who appealed to the Divisional Court.

[2] Licensing Act, 1953, s. 151: "(1) A constable may at any time "enter licensed premises . . . for the "purpose of preventing or detecting the "commission of any offence against "this Act."

The appellant appeared in person.
F. P. Neill for the police.

Case cited in argument (other than those referred to in the judgment): Duncan v. Jones.*

LORD GODDARD C.J. stated the facts and continued: The case made against the appellant is that, by giving the alarm in the way he did when he knew the police were outside the premises intending to go in to look round, he gave the people in the house the opportunity of delaying the police so that the traces of any offence, if an offence was being committed, could be removed. Section 151 of the Licensing Act, 1953, provides: "A constable may at any time enter licensed premises . . . for "the purpose of preventing or detecting the commission of any "offence against this Act." Therefore, the police have a right to enter and see whether or not there is any likelihood of an offence being committed. That is their right, and it is therefore their duty to enter the premises if they can see circumstances which call for investigation.

The case on which the defendant relies principally is Bastable v. Little,[1] a case decided in the early days of motoring, in which it was held that it was not an offence for an A.A. scout to warn motorists that they were entering a police trap, because there is no evidence that the people concerned were committing an offence, and there was no reason to conclude that by the time they reached the police trap they would be committing an offence. But that case was followed three years later by Betts v. Stevens,[2] in which it was decided that directly it was shown that an offence was being committed by a motorist by travelling more than twenty miles an hour when the scout gave him warning, then the scout was interfering with the police.

The appellant says that that means that he could not be convicted unless it was shown that there was an offence being committed, but to say that is to overlook section 151 of the Licensing Act, 1953. There is no similar section in the Road Traffic Act, 1930. Section 151 gives the police the right to enter licensed premises whether an offence has been committed or not. They can go in and see whether it is likely that an offence will be committed and, if they are detained from going in, that obstructs them in the execution of their duty because it gives the people concerned an opportunity, if they are committing an offence, to remove the traces. In fact, in police raids, it is essential that the raid should be done as quickly as possible without previous warning being given, otherwise there might as well not be a raid.

For these reasons, I think that the police, in the execution of their duty, intended to get into this hotel and that they wanted to get in there before anybody in the house had an opportunity of putting things away. If the police knocked at the door and the licensee did not open it for several minutes, the justices could have found that the licensee was obstructing the police. Obstructing, for the present purpose, means making it more difficult for the police to carry out their duties. It is obvious that the defendant here was detaining the police by giving a warning; he was making it more difficult for the police to get certain entry into the premises, and the justices were entitled to find as they did, and therefore the appeal is dismissed.

A husband and wife entered into a contract under which they became joint managers of a café, the arrangement being that they should share the profits of the business with the owner in agreed proportions. The receipts of the business did not provide a sum sufficient to enable the owner to receive his stipulated £15 a week, to provide the managers with reasonable remuneration, and to meet the outgoings. After being dismissed by the owner they brought an action for damages for wrongful dismissal, in which they contended that the contract fell within the terms of the Catering Wages Act, 1943,[1] and that they were each entitled to remuneration as an "assistant in charge" in accordance with the terms of the Wages Regulation (Unlicensed Place of Refreshment) Order, 1953:—

Held, (1) that the arrangement between the parties constituted a contract of employment in the way of trade of the plaintiffs as workers such as to fall within the terms of section 4 (1) of the Act, which applied to the plaintiffs, whether they were engaged individually or as a number; (2) that under the regulations each of the plaintiffs was to be regarded as an "assistant in charge," and that their remuneration could be properly ascertained accordingly in assessing the damages.

Parkinson v. H. & J. Plumpton [1954] 1 W.L.R. 75; [1954] 1 All E.R. 201 distinguished.

ACTION.

In September, 1951, the plaintiffs, a husband and wife, orally agreed with the defendant to manage a café at Cambridge, of which the defendant was the owner. The basis of the general arrangement between them was that the defendant required a fixed amount to be paid to him each week, his only obligation being to pay the rent of the premises. All other expenses were being met by the plaintiffs, who were to receive the remainder of the profits, after paying the fixed weekly amount to the defendant. The parties agreed that the contract should be for one year certain and thereafter subject to three to six months' notice. The plaintiffs began their management of the premises in November, 1951.

The profits of the business did not reach a sufficient amount to enable the required sum of £15 a week to be paid to the defendant as well as a reasonable remuneration for the plaintiffs. Prolonged negotiations took place for the terms of the agreement to be made the subject of a written document, in accordance with a promise which the defendant had made; but he finally refused to execute such a document and dismissed the plaintiffs without notice before they had completed 12 months' service.

They commenced an action against the defendant claiming damages for wrongful dismissal and loss of remuneration; the question arose whether the contract came within the provisions of the Catering Wages Act, 1943.

HEARST v. CLARK.

LLOYD-JACOB J. stated the facts and continued: The plaintiffs voluntarily and willingly entered on an arrangement whereby their remuneration was to be the balance of profit derived from this business after the weekly payment had been made to the defendant and the other outgoings had been met, an arrangement which, as it turned out, was an extremely unfortunate one. They say and plead that, by reason of the Catering Wages Act, 1943, they are in fact safeguarded as to proper remuneration by the terms of that Act, and that on its true and fair construction they are and were at all material times, notwithstanding their bargain, to be entitled to receive such wages as are set out in the appropriate regulations made under the Act. In that connexion they are, of course, prepared to bring into account such amounts as they did in fact draw from the business for their maintenance.

The propriety of that claim rests on the construction of the Catering Wages Act, 1943. In approaching that construction I have had the advantage of being referred to two authorities in which various aspects of that Act have been canvassed, and one, on which the defendant places considerable reliance, is a judgment of Lord Goddard C.J. in Parkinson v. H. & J. Plumpton,[1] a certain passage in the judgment being said to decide that this Act does not apply in cases where the arrangement between the employer and the employee is, as here, one for the joint employment of two parties. I do not myself regard that judgment as deciding that point; it is true that Lord Goddard C.J. indicated that he did not think that the question of joint engagement was contemplated by the Act, an observation with which I find myself in complete agreement; but it by no means necessarily follows that, because joint engagements may not have been contemplated by the Act, the application of its words to particular circumstances may not in fact require that persons employed under a joint engagement must be found to be entitled to the remuneration required by the legislature. The other passage in the judgment [2] in which, as I think, Lord Goddard C.J. makes his meaning even more clear is where he points out that he cannot find any provision in the Act that, where there is joint employment, the joint remuneration is to be treated as divisible, again an observation with which I find myself in complete agreement. It must be remembered that those observations were made in a case in which the claim was by one of the two persons engaged jointly in the absence of the other and would require for its true determination an estimation of the amount of the joint remuneration which was to be attributed to the one party and the amount which was to be attributed to the other.

In the present case, as I have already indicated, both the employed persons are parties to the proceedings and no difficulty whatever is presented by any apportionment, for no apportionment is required. In those circumstances I do not find that the decision in Parkinson v. H. & J. Plumpton [3] is directly relevant to the issues which I have to decide, and accordingly I must necessarily approach the matter afresh.

Section 1 of the Act identifies the persons to whom the Act applies. They are referred to as "workers," and workers are defined in subsection (2) as "all persons employed in "any undertaking, or any part of an undertaking, which "consists wholly or mainly in the carrying on (whether for "profit or not) of one or more of the following activities . . .", and the following activities, it will be noted, include the supply of food or drink for consumption. There can, therefore, be no doubt whatever that the undertaking, namely, the café business in Mill Road, Cambridge, consisted, if not wholly at any rate mainly, in the supply of food or drink for immediate consumption, and if, as I have already held, these two plaintiffs were employed in that business, then, seeing that they are both of them persons, I must, as I understand the statute, hold that they are workers within the meaning of the Catering Wages Act. By subsection (4) of section 1 there is a provision that "any worker who, for the purposes of any undertaking or "part of an undertaking, performs any work in pursuance of an "arrangement express or implied made by the worker by way "of trade with the persons carrying on that undertaking shall be "deemed to be employed by them in that undertaking or part." The arrangement between the parties in this case was that the two plaintiffs should manage the defendant's business, but it was an arrangement entered into by way of trade, the operation of running and managing a café business being the trade or occupation in which all three of these parties were engaged, and in those circumstances, whether or not the agreement between the parties can properly be termed an agreement of employment, I am satisfied that the terms of section 1 (4) are so wide that persons in the position of these two plaintiffs, who in fact carried out the work of operating this café business, must be regarded as workers within the purview of the Catering Wages Act, 1943.

In respect of any such workers, the Act provides that the minimum remuneration to which they are entitled, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, is to be fixed by the appropriate machinery, and section 9 (1) provides that "If a "contract between a worker"—which expression I construe to mean a worker or workers—"to whom a wages regulation order "applies and his employer provides for the payment of less "remuneration than the statutory minimum," then that contract shall have effect as if for the agreed remuneration there were substituted the statutory minimum, clear of all deductions. If the employer in fact fails to pay a worker the statutory minimum, then he is liable on conviction to a substantial fine, and there is

HEARST v. CLARK.

Lloyd-Jacob J.

a provision that employees who are denied the statutory minimum remuneration shall be entitled to receive the deficit.

It was urged in the present case that the contract between the parties was not a contract of employment. I do not need to say any more about that; from what I have already said it will be plain that the contrary conclusion is manifold. Secondly, it was submitted that the arrangement was not entered into by the parties by way of trade. In my view, there was here an agreement for the commercial employment by the defendant of the plaintiffs, and that I regard as an agreement entered into by way of trade; but it was suggested, and there is some colour for the suggestion, that, by reason of the arrangements between the parties, the agreement cannot be regarded as a contract of service, but ought to be put into that limited category of contracts which are compendiously referred to as contracts for services, and in that connexion the defendants relied on a judgment of Birkett L.J., sitting as an additional judge of the Queen's Bench Division, in Pauley v. Kenaldo Ld.[4] In his judgment the Lord Justice quotes a speech of Lord Thankerton, in which the indicia of a contract of service are set out, namely, the master's power of selection of his servant—clearly no question arises on that because both plaintiffs were selected by this defendant for the doubtful privilege of running his restaurant; secondly, the payment of wages or other remuneration—no question arises about that; thirdly, the master's right to control the method of doing the work; and fourthly, the master's right of suspension or dismissal. No question turns on the last, and so far as the third is concerned the requirement which the defendant endeavoured to put on the male plaintiff to enter up inaccurate books is a sufficient indication that he cannot now suggest that he was not in a position to exercise any right of control of the method in which one aspect of the conduct of this business, namely, the keeping of accounts, was to be conducted.

In those circumstances I entertain no doubt that on its true construction this Act applies to employees whether they are engaged individually or as a number. Difficulties arise because the determination of the precise minimum remuneration is left to be determined by statutory instrument, and the statutory instruments do not appear to have been drafted with the idea particularly in mind that the conduct of some of the duties falling within the Catering Wages Act might require for their completion more than one person. For example, if this had been a simple agreement between the male plaintiff and the defendant, there could have been no doubt that under the statutory instruments that applied at the relevant time he would have been entitled to the minimum remuneration appropriate to an assistant in charge; that is to say, he was aged 21 years or over, and he was performing the duties to which the appellation assistant in charge can properly be attributed, that is to say, wholly or mainly engaged in catering work and in direct control of a catering undertaking in which not more than four persons exclusive of himself are employed and who is immediately responsible for its operation. Such a person, in respect of a working week of 47 hours, would have been entitled in the early part of his employment to £5 2s. a week, and in the subsequent part of his employment to a sum slightly in excess of that. Nor could there be any doubt that, if the agreement had been between the female plaintiff and the defendant, she, too, because she accepted with her husband the obligation of controlling and running this business, would have been an assistant in charge, although the schedule appropriate to female workers provides that she would have received a less remuneration than that to which a male assistant in charge would be entitled.

It is suggested that there is here no provision which would cover the case of these two persons in that the definition of an assistant in charge requires that he shall be a person in direct control with not more than four persons other than himself employed. I can see no difficulty whatever in construing these regulations as meeting the conduct of a business where one assistant in charge is responsible for the control of the business during the 47 hours of the week for which he is prepared to accept the responsibility, and another assistant in charge is entitled to be treated as falling within the Catering Wages Act in respect of the remainder of the period of time in respect of which the catering business is kept open. In the present case there is no question that the business was running for a period of time far in excess of 47 hours a week. Under those circumstances no harm could conceivably be done to the defendant in regarding the two plaintiffs as being alternately responsible for the direct control of this catering establishment during the period which the Act provides and permits an assistant in charge to control it. Not that it makes much difference because, as one would have expected, the regulations carefully provide that, if the duties on which workers are engaged do not fall precisely within the definition sections of the various categories, then they are to fall within the provisions of " any other worker except manageress or shop " assistant," and I construe the expression " manageress or shop " assistant " to mean persons falling within the definition of those two expressions in the regulations themselves. Accordingly, I can see nothing in the regulations which would require me to reconsider my construction of the Catering Wages Act and so to construe it as to exclude these plaintiffs from the purview of its provisions.

That brings me to the next point, as to what in those circumstances is the category into which they fall, because, having determined that they can properly be regarded individually as an assistant in charge, it next becomes necessary to see into which of the various sub-divisions of that category they can be placed. Generally speaking, the sub-division is in one or other of three alternative headings: first, where the employer supplies the worker with full board and lodging for seven days a week; secondly, where the employer supplies the worker with neither full board nor lodging but supplies him with meals of good and sufficient quality and quantity while on duty; and thirdly, where the employer supplies the worker with neither meals nor lodging. The evidence establishes that these plaintiffs, although permitted to occupy certain rooms, were not provided with lodging. At some time there was some question of a few sticks of furniture being available in these rooms, and whether or not that was sufficient to exclude the operation of the Rent Restriction Acts I do not know and I am not called upon to decide. It is sufficient for my purpose to hold that the defendant here cannot contend that he provided these employees with lodging. Therefore it is necessary to hold that he cannot then take advantage of the minimum payments set out in respect of workers who are so provided. Nor can I hold on the evidence that the payments can fall within the category which relates to cases where the employer supplies the worker with neither meals nor lodging, for, as I understand the evidence, both these plaintiffs did receive their meals from the operation of the café business. In those circumstances the only remaining category is that which is referred to in the Schedule as column 3, and is in respect of the duties which these persons performed. I am satisfied that they would be and are entitled to receive the minimum remuneration set out in column 3 in respect of an assistant in charge aged 21 years or over, in the case of the male plaintiff under the appropriate category for male workers, and in the case of the female plaintiff under the appropriate category for female workers. In those circumstances their employment was one to which this Act relates and they are entitled to the balance between the minimum payment and the amount they have received, and I so hold.

HEARST v. CLARK.

Lloyd-Jacob J.

Family Provision — Widow — Annuity — Partnership between testator and his brother—Annuity (nominated by will) payable, on death of partner, to widow by surviving partner during joint lives—Abatement if profits less than specified sum annually—Further provision—Any portion of annuity not received out of partnership funds payable out of residue during widowhood.

A testator by his will, in addition to bequeathing half the income of his residuary estate to his widow for life, bequeathed her an annuity of £500 a year payable to her during the joint lives of herself and the surviving partner out of the profits of a business forming the subject-matter of a partnership deed between himself and his brother. The annuity was bequeathed to her in the exercise by the testator of a right conferred on him by the articles of partnership and was liable to abatement if the profits amounted to less than £3,000 in any year. The widow applied to the court that further provision might be made for her maintenance:—

Held, that, while the court would not interfere with the quantum of the amount bequeathed, the provision made was, having regard to the contingencies relating to annuity, not reasonable, and that further provision should be made by a direction that there should be paid out of the income of the residuary estate an annuity at the rate of £500 per annum during widowhood, with a proviso that neither that annuity nor any part of it was to be payable except to the extent that that sum was not received under the provision contained in the partnership deed.

ORIGINATING SUMMONS.

By his will, dated March 31, 1949, Eric Duncan Doring bequeathed to his wife, Jean Edmet McGill Doring, the whole of his personal chattels (which were valued for probate at £900) and a pecuniary legacy of £250. He also gave her a life interest in one half of his residuary estate which was estimated to produce £600 per annum and, subject to that life interest, he bequeathed his residuary estate to his brother and sister.

The testator also exercised a right which he had under a deed of partnership, dated January 1, 1948, between himself and his brother, which provided that, in the event of the death of a partner leaving a widow or fiancée or other person nominated by him in his will to receive an annuity, the surviving partner should pay to such person during their joint lives an annuity of £500, subject to abatement if the net profits of the business should be less than £3,000 in any year.

It was agreed between the parties to these proceedings that the value of the net estate of the testator, which had not so far been finally fixed, would amount to between £28,000 and £30,000.

A summons was taken out by the testator's widow under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, asking that reasonable provision be made out of the estate for her maintenance.

Cases referred to in argument: In re Borthwick *; In re Inns†; In re Franks.‡

WYNN-PARRY J. stated the facts and considered the evidence, and on the question whether the testator had made reasonable provision for the plaintiff, cited two passages (1) in In re Borthwick [1] and (2) in In re Inns,[2] and concluded that, in all the circumstances, and having regard to the principles which had been enunciated and applied by the court under the Act of 1938 he did not feel that he could interfere in this case so far as quantum was concerned.

His Lordship continued: There remains the second point, one which, from the point of view of the plaintiff, is the most important point in the case. The annuity of £500 is liable to cease altogether on certain contingencies—for instance, on the death of the surviving partner, the second defendant—and it is liable to abate if the net profits of the business out of which it is payable fall below £3,000 per annum. The question arises whether the testator, who had obviously given careful consideration to the amount of income received by the plaintiff, was reasonable in making the source of approximately one half of that income subject to such contingencies. He could safely have achieved his object of leaving her in receipt of an income of £1,100 a year if, for instance, he had given her the income of the whole of his residuary estate. I assume, however, and I think I am entitled to assume, on the facts, that his reason for not doing that was that he intended to benefit as well as the plaintiff not only his brother but his sister and, in order to benefit his sister, he, so to speak, threw the burden of the other half of his intended provision on the profits of the business, which is now owned by the brother.

That, no doubt, is a perfectly laudable intention, but is it reasonable to subject so much of the plaintiff's future income to the contingencies I have mentioned? I have come to the conclusion that it is not reasonable, and that on this part of the case I ought to interfere. I propose, therefore, to make the necessary declaration that further provision ought to be made for the plaintiff. I propose to order that there shall be paid out of the income of the residuary estate an annuity at the rate of £500 per annum during widowhood, with a proviso that neither that annuity nor any part of it is to be payable except to the extent that it is not received under the provision in the partnership deed.

It was urged on me by Mr. Francis that, if I should accede to any extent to the application of the widow, I should do no more than make a declaration that she should have further maintenance and stand the matter over generally to a future date, with liberty to apply on the authority of In re Franks.[3] In my view, however, that case is entirely distinguishable from the present case. In this case I am able to say that I think the widow ought to have £1,100 per annum, and all I am designing to do is to see that there is set up the necessary machinery whereby she will receive that sum during her widowhood. In In re Franks[3] it was not possible at the date of the hearing to quantify the amount of provision which should be made for the infant, Peter Franks. As I pointed out in the course of my judgment[4]: "it is clear that Richard Brandt the son of the "first marriage requires, and will for some time require, a "substantial part of the income of the estate for his maintenance "and education, while on the other hand, the infant Peter "Franks requires nothing now, but will require something "later." In my view, the reasonable view is that the widow requires now, and will continue to require, £1,100 per annum as income; therefore, I cannot regard In re Franks[3] as being in any respect a guide to me in this case.

Order accordingly.

DAWSON v. PRESTON.

Practice and Procedure—Garnishee proceedings—Procedure—Garnishee order absolute—Right of judgment debtor to appear at the hearing —Right of appeal—R.S.C., Ord 45, r. 1.

Legal Aid—Charge on property recovered—Garnishee—Order against Law Society—Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1939 (12 & 13 Geo. 6, c. 51), s. 3—Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (S.I. 1950, No. 1359), reg. 16 (6).

On July 27, 1954, the Law Society, as administrators of the Legal Aid fund, had received £350, as a result of a judgment given in favour of a judgment debtor, in an action in which he was legally aided. On November 11, 1954, the judgment creditor obtained a garnishee order nisi, in respect of a judgment awarded in his favour against the judgment debtor, attaching the money in the hands of the Law Society. On April 27, 1955, the master made the order absolute finding that £66 14s. 6d. was due from the Law Society to the judgment debtor and ordering that sum to be paid to the judgment creditor. The judgment debtor appealed against that order:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, (1) that since R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 1, required the garnishee order nisi to be served on the judgment debtor, he was entitled to appear at the hearing to make the order absolute, and, a fortiori, if he had a right to be heard when the order was made affecting him, he had a right of appeal; the Law Society, whose counsel desired to support the argument of the judgment debtor, but who did not serve a notice of appeal, had no locus standi.

(2) That the payment of money to the Law Society by virtue of a judgment in favour of a legally aided person to be held by them created a debitum in praesenti solvendum in futuro, and therefore an attachable debt, in favour of the assisted person, notwithstanding that at the time when the garnishee order nisi was made the exact sum might not have been calculated by reason of the Law Society's statutory charges on the money which might in certain circumstances entitle them to deduct certain sums.

O'Driscoll v. Manchester Insurance Committee [1915] 3 K.B. 499; 31 T.L.R. 532 applied.

APPEAL from Master Lawrence.

In 1954 the judgment debtor, Ronald Preston, as a legally aided person, brought an action to recover damages for breach of contract. The action was settled and on July 27, 1954, the agreed damages of £350 were paid to the Law Society, as administrator of the Legal Aid fund, under the provisions of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, and the regulations made thereunder. On August 5, 1954, £275 was paid out of the Legal Aid fund to the judgment debtor, on the Law Society being informed that the costs of the action when taxed would not exceed £75.

On November 11, 1954, the judgment creditor, D. J. Dawson, suing as a firm, obtained a garnishee order nisi. The judgment creditor's affidavit stated: "By a judgment of the court given "in this action and dated June 8, 1954, it was adjudged that I "should recover against the . . . judgment debtor, R. Preston, "the sum of £77 7s. and costs allowed at £8 8s. (2) The said "judgment still remains unsatisfied to the extent of £85 15s. "(3) The Law Society as administrators of the Legal Aid fund

" are indebted to the judgment debtor R. Preston in the sum of " £75 damages or thereabouts."

On February 16, 1955, an application was made to Master Lawrence for the garnishee order to be made absolute. The judgment debtor and the Law Society opposed the application. The master adjourned the matter in order that an inquiry might be held to ascertain to what amount the Law Society was indebted to the judgment debtor.

On April 27, 1955, an inquiry having been held, Master Lawrence made the garnishee order absolute, finding that £66 14s. 6d. was due from the Law Society to the judgment debtor, and ordered that sum to be paid to the judgment creditor.

The judgment debtor appealed against that order.

Frederick Hallis for the judgment debtor.
J. R. B. Fox-Andrews for the judgment creditor.
John Perrett for the garnishees, the Law Society.

Webb v. Stenton [1] and O'Driscoll v. Manchester Insurance Committee [2] were cited in argument.

LORD GODDARD C.J. Mr. Fox-Andrews took two preliminary points: first, that the judgment debtor was not entitled to appeal, and, secondly, that as the judgment debtor was not a person who could be said to be affected by the order, no appeal could in any event be entertained. By R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 1, where garnishee proceedings are taken, the garnishee order nisi has to be served on the judgment debtor, and it must follow that he is entitled to appear on the hearing to make the order absolute and to submit any argument he might have. We pointed out in the course of Mr. Fox-Andrew's argument on this point that the judgment debtor might desire to show that there is no attachable debt.

In our opinion, from the mere fact that the rule relating to attachment of debts provides that the judgment debtor should be served not merely with notice of the proceedings but actually with the order nisi, it must follow that he has a right to be heard, and if he has a right to be heard and an order is made which affects him, I think he has a right of appeal.

There is one other matter: the Law Society gave no notice of appeal but were represented here by counsel, and we have to consider whether counsel had any locus standi. Counsel said that the Law Society had been served with the notice of appeal. We thought we could not hear the Law Society unless they were on the record either as appellants or as respondents. Apparently their counsel desired to support the argument Mr. Hallis put forward on behalf of the judgment debtor, but if they wanted to take part in the argument it seems to the court that they ought to have served a notice of appeal against the order. The court gave them the opportunity of serving notice of appeal during the hearing, Mr. Fox-Andrews saying that he would not object, and they elected not to do so, and therefore we have not heard them.

DAWSON v. PRESTON.

[His Lordship stated the facts as set out above and continued:] It is not necessary, as far as I know, that the judgment creditor who is seeking to get an order of attachment on a garnishee should set out in his affidavit the exact amount which the garnishee owes to the judgment debtor. He only has to show the court by an affidavit that there is a debt due to the judgment debtor from the garnishee. The debts which can be attached are not only debts which are presently payable; they include also debts which exist in praesenti, although they may be debita in praesenti solvenda in futuro. The law with regard to the attachment of debts is put very concisely and neatly by Bankes L.J. in O'Driscoll and Another v. Manchester Insurance Committee[1]: "It is well established that 'debts "'owing or accruing' include debts debita in praesenti solvenda "in futuro. The matter is well put in the Annual Practice, "1915, p. 808: 'But the distinction must be borne in mind "'between the case where there is an existing debt, payment "'whereof is deferred, and the case where both the debt and "'its payment rest in the future. In the former case there is "'an attachable debt, in the latter case there is not.'"

As soon as the Law Society received the agreed damages they became an accounting party to the judgment debtor, the plaintiff in the action, on whose behalf they received the money. The money was not the Law Society's money and it never became the Law Society's money. The effect of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, and the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, is to impose a charge on that money in the Law Society's favour in order that they may reimburse the legal aid fund any additional sums of costs to which they had been put other than the costs which they recovered from the other side. The Law Society is paid solicitor-and-client costs which are not recoverable from the other side, and the Law Society therefore have the right to take those costs out of the money recovered; if they do not receive the full amount of the party-and-party costs from the other side they can still, if they see fit, take the balance out of the damages. If it were not for the fact that this charge were imposed, as soon as the Law Society received that money they would be liable to pay it over immediately to the person for whom they had been acting.

But because of this charge the Law Society, before they pay over the money, are entitled to find out how much the costs will be and such other matters as the law allows them to deduct.

It may be that those costs in some particular case would absorb the whole of the damages recovered, but in the general case the costs of a successful plaintiff would not swallow up the whole of the damages. The Law Society are always liable to account to the assisted person for the moneys they have received. When a person finds out that an assisted person has been successful in an action and the money is payable to the Law Society, he knows that the Law Society are holding the money for and on account of his debtor. Thereupon it seems to me quite clearly a garnishee order on the Law Society will act as an attachment of the money in their hands but it will only attach to the money which is payable by the Law Society to the legally aided person. The fact that the amount they have to pay over has not been ascertained at the date of the order nisi is quite immaterial. If there is a debt, the fact that the debt has to be quantified does not make it any the less a debt which is owing although the amount which is to be paid may have to wait until some calculations or taxations are gone through.

As Glyn-Jones J. pointed out in the course of the argument, if it were not for the statutory charge imposed by section 3 of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, it would be the duty of the Law Society to pay over the money received to the legally aided person. The Law Society is given the right to reimburse themselves from the Legal Aid fund the amounts which are due to them and the balance is to be paid over to the legally assisted person.

It seems to me that this is a perfectly clear case. The money when it was paid to the Law Society and held by the Law Society was the plaintiff's money. They were bound to account for it. They were bound to hand over the money to him, although no doubt by virtue of the statutory charge which is given, they could retain it in their hands until the amount of the charge was found; it is a case of debitum in praesenti solvendum in futuro and debts which partake of that nature are and always have been attachable. In my opinion, there is no doubt here that the master was right in making the order he did. This appeal fails and will be dismissed with costs.

ORMEROD J. I agree. The argument of Mr. Hallis, as I understand it, is that an existing debt may be attached even although the payment of the debt is deferred to some future date. But if that debt is not ascertained at the time when the garnishee order nisi is made, it cannot be an existing debt unless all the factors are present at that time which enable it to be ascertained; and as in this case those factors could not be present because the Law Society, by virtue of section 3 of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1950, and the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, made under the Act, had the power of exercising their discretion in various ways and exercising it only at some future time, in those circumstances, it is submitted, this cannot be an existing debt. I cannot agree with that submission. It seems clear from regulation 16 (6) that it is the duty of the Law Society when money is paid into their hands under these circumstances, to pay the balance of the money to the assisted person after certain deductions have been made which are set out in the paragraph of the regulations. In those circumstances there is an existing debt because there is a liability on the Law Society, having received that money, to pay it over to the assisted person. It may be that by reason of the regulations and by reason of certain provisions of the Act, the Law Society have power to make deductions from that sum because of a charge which they may have, but that is merely a question of ascertaining the amount which has to be paid over to the assisted person and, as I see it, does not prevent the debt from being an existing debt at the material date. In these circumstances, I agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

GLYNN-JONES J. I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Rylands v. Fletcher—Exceptions to rule—Consent to danger—Escape of water from stop tap in common passage way—Damage to tenant's stock on lower floor—Negligent system of water supply—Liability.

The freehold owners of a large block of property granted to the plaintiffs a lease of the ground floor lock-up shop with the right to use lavatories on the second floor in common with other tenants. On the passageway of the second floor there was a wash-basin with a small section of redundant pipe from the main water supply pipe under it. This pipe was $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches above floor level, with an open end from which water was only prevented from escaping by a stop cock. The owners let the offices on the first, second and third floors to B. & Co., with rights of passage over common ways to reach their rooms and the right to use the lavatories in common with others, including the plaintiffs. At the date of the lease to B. & Co. the owner's estate agent had inspected the property and he knew of the existence of the basin and pipe on the second floor.

The plaintiffs suffered damage to their stock, furniture and equipment when in circumstances unknown the stop tap of the redundant pipe was left turned on and water seeped into their shop.

Held, that the defendants were liable for the damage, since (1) the tenants could not be taken impliedly to have consented to the installation as it existed; (2) the owners, being in occupation and control of the passageway where the redundant pipe was situated, and knowing or having means of knowing through their estate agent of its existence and condition, which rendered it a potential source of danger, were guilty of negligence in failing to take reasonable steps to prevent the escape of water in the event of the stop tap being accidentally turned on; and that the damage to the plaintiffs' goods followed from that negligence.

Held, further, that there was no evidence on which the court would be justified in holding that the escape of water was caused by the mischievous or deliberate act of a stranger.

Decision of Havers J. reversed.

Appeal from Havers J., sitting at Manchester Assizes.

The plaintiffs were the occupiers of a lock-up shop on the ground floor of 15, Market Street, Manchester, when on June 5, 1953, there was an escape of water from above and much damage was caused to the plaintiffs' goods and fittings. The owners of the premises were the first defendants, Alexander Levy, Sarina Levy and John T. Marshall, the trustees of the Levy Estate Trust. They had purchased the freehold of the premises in the year 1951, at which time the plaintiffs were occupiers of the ground floor under the terms of a lease which was still running on June 5, 1953. On July 2, 1951, the trustees had granted a lease of offices situate on the first, second and third floors of the building to the second defendants, Barder Morris Incorporated Ld., giving to these lessees the right (in common with all others to whom the lessors might give the like right) of ingress, egress and regress through or by means of the entrance doors, staircases and passages serving the first, second and third floors. On March 25, 1953, the second defendants, Barder Morris Inc. Ld., let to Mr. Leslie James Thorpe, trading as A. Robinson & Sons, the four offices situate on the second floor, together with a right of access thereto, by means of the common staircases and passages, together with the use (in common with all persons having the like right) of the lavatories and conveniences on the second floor.

The escape of water which damaged the plaintiffs' goods and effects in the ground floor shop took place from a pipe under a wash-basin in the passage way on the second floor. Beneath the basin, and only some three and a half inches above floor level, there was a redundant ½-inch copper pipe attached to the mains pipe, which presumably had been connected with another pipe which carried water to one of the offices. Only a small portion of the copper pipe remained. Towards the end of it there was a stop tap, but the end of the pipe was not closed. On the day in question the stop tap had at some unknown time and in some unknown way been knocked or turned on, with resulting damage to the plaintiffs' shop and goods, and they claimed damages from the Levy Estate Trustees and Barder Morris Incorporated Ld.

The action came before Havers J. at Manchester Assizes, and on March 21, 1955, he dismissed the action. He held that the owners were in occupation and control of the passage where the redundant pipe was situated; that they knew or had means of knowledge through their estate agent of the existence of the redundant pipe and its condition; that knowing, or having means of knowledge, of the redundant pipe and its condition they were negligent in not taking steps to prevent the escape of water from the pipe if the stop tap was accidentally turned on; but that as the proximate cause of the escape of water which caused the damage was, as he concluded, the mischievous or deliberate act of a stranger and not an accident, they were not liable to the plaintiffs for such damage. He dismissed the second defendants from the action.

The plaintiffs now appealed, claiming judgment against the Levy Estate Trustees.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 31. SINGLETON L.J., delivering the judgment of the court, read the findings of Havers J. as to the facts and continued: The escape of water took place from a pipe under the wash-basin in the passageway on the second floor. There is little evidence as to the use of this basin. So far as the evidence shows, it was not used by those employed by Barder Morris & Co. Ld., who only occupied one room on this floor. One assumes that it was used by the employees of A. Robinson & Sons, who occupied four rooms on the floor, but no witness was called from Robinsons. The position of the rooms and of the wash-basin is shown upon the plan, which also shows the design of the wash-basin and mirror above. The basin had a 1¼-inch lead waste pipe. The pipe which carried water to the basin was a ½-inch lead water pipe. Some three and a half inches above floor level there was a ½-inch copper pipe at right angles to the ½-inch lead pipe; only a small portion of the copper pipe remained. Towards the end of it there was a stop tap, but the pipe had an open end.

Havers J. said of this copper pipe: "This section of pipe "was completely redundant and served no useful purpose what-"ever. It had a thread end and the probability is that at one "time it had been connected with another pipe which provided "water for the office marked E on the plan. The stop tap "which is near the end of this piece of pipe was not designed " for the purpose of stopping water coming out from this small " section of pipe; it had originally been used for stopping the " flow of water if a leak had occurred in the pipe connected to " it which supplied water to office E. The stop tap was a normal " type of stop tap approved by the Manchester Corporation " Waterworks Department and was a perfectly standard stop " tap on a ½-inch supply pipe. To open this stop tap fully you " had to make three or four turns. If it was turned so as to be " fully open and flow at maximum pressure, water would gush " out and this would be obviously noticeable to anybody who " turned it fully on. If the tap was opened slightly from its " closed position some water would come through. The volume " of course would increase as you opened it more and more until " you got maximum pressure when the stop tap was fully open.

" Now owing to its position so close to the ground—3½ inches " above the ground—and its position underneath the washbasin " and slightly to the right, I had evidence from Mr. Gomersall, " which I accept, that a cleaner sweeping the floor or anybody " mopping the floor, or even catching a foot against it while " washing, could knock it on. It could not accidentally be " knocked on completely, but it could be knocked on sufficiently " to cause water to start seeping out. By knocking against it " unintentionally in this way or by a cleaner touching it, it could " not be turned on more than half a turn. As soon as you start " to turn water comes out, which would be noticeable; indeed, " Mr. Gomersall said you would notice it far before as much as " half a turn had taken place, and with a half-turn the flow of " water would not be in excess of 50 per cent. of the maximum " flow. This stop tap is vertical when closed and you move it " to the left, anti-clockwise, to open it out."

At 5.45 a.m. on June 5 a call was received at the London Road Fire Station and officers from the fire brigade and police officers went to 15, Market Street. They could see through the windows that the ground floor part seemed to be sodden, and water in quantity was dripping from above. They went to the second floor and found that the escape was from the open end of the copper pipe. Mr. Harris, the assistant divisional officer of the fire brigade, was unable to say how far the tap was turned on. He described the flow of water in this way: " It was a very " lazy flow: no pressure behind it: sort of bubbling out and "gurgling"; and he said he would imagine that the stop tap was slightly turned on, unless the supply was at low pressure. P.c. Bowker said that the water was not coming out with fierce pressure; it was coming out in quantity, but not to spread all over the floor. He added that the tap was turned full on when he found it. He formed that impression from the feel of the tap: he did not check it by the number of turns required to turn on the tap to the full extent. The judge accepted the evidence of P.c. Bowker and said: " I find accordingly that " somebody during the night of June 4–5 turned on this stop

C. A.

A. Prosser & Son Ld. v. Levy.

" tap so that the water did flow out on to the floor. I find that " the person who did it turned it fully on and that it was not " accidental, but deliberately turned on."

We are not satisfied upon the evidence that it was satisfactorily established that the stop tap was fully turned on, though it does seem that it was turned on to an extent that would have been unlikely to happen from an accidental kick or knock. It is not clear what is meant by the words " during the " night." It appears from the evidence that the outside door of the building was locked each evening when the last person left and, if the ordinary practice was followed, it is unlikely that anyone would enter the building afterwards.

The basin was used by Robinsons. If someone turned on the tap and no water came, it is possible that he, or she, would try the copper pipe below and if no water came, it is equally possible that the person would omit to turn the stop tap to the off position. This might occur if the supply was cut off about the time the employees of Robinsons were leaving. And though the copper pipe was said to be of no use whatsoever, it is possible that one person might try to get water there while another was using the basin. There is no evidence to show whether the supply was cut off at any time during the evening of June 4, nor is there any evidence from anyone in the employ of Robinsons. We do not know how many were employed there, who was the last to leave, or who last used the basin. On the evidence, we should think it is more likely that the stop tap was turned on, and left turned on, by someone employed there than that someone entered after the place was closed and turned on the tap deliberately in order to cause damage. If perchance the stop tap was left turned on when the supply was off, trouble was bound to occur when the supply came on again.

It is unfortunate that the judge was left without any information from Robinsons and without any information as to who was last in the building and as to who locked the outside door, if it was locked. There is no doubt upon the evidence that the leaving of the copper pipe with the open end was wrong and constituted a source of potential danger, for there was no sink or means by which the water could be carried away without causing damage. Again, the evidence does not show when the alteration was done, or by whom. Mr. Adams, a plumber of experience, who was called on behalf of the plaintiffs, said that the pipe ought not to have been left in the way it was: it should have been taken off the rising main altogether and the main then soldered up, or a brass cap specially made for such a purpose should have been fitted on to it. He said: " I should not think " anybody in his right mind would have it like that," and, in reply to the judge, " Unless a lunatic." Mr. Gomersall, an architect, who gave evidence before an examiner, said in answer to these questions: " What is your opinion as to the manner in " which that tap and pipe were at the time when you saw them?

"How would you describe them? (A) I would say that the "plumber who had disconnected that branch service should have "put a screwed stop or plug in the end of the pipe to stop any "water coming out from the end of the pipe if the stop tap "happened to be turned on, which is quite a normal procedure. "(Q) There is nothing difficult about it? (A) Oh, no. (Q) What "was the potential situation, that not having been done? (A) A "cleaner sweeping the floor or anybody mopping the floor, or "even catching their foot against it whilst they were washing, "could knock it on—not completely, but sufficient to cause "water to start seeping out. (Q) Left in that way, would you "say it was a proper or safe system? (A) Certainly not. (Q) "How would you describe it? (A) As a potential danger. "(Q) Was it a danger which would or would not have been "obvious to anyone who had taken the slightest chance to look "at it? (A) I do not think a lay person would have noticed it "perhaps, but certainly a plumber should notice it and not leave "it like that."

Mr. Fieldhouse, an estate agent, called on behalf of the trustees, was asked questions on this when he was cross-examined by Mr. Laski, and he said it was a possible source of danger.

The findings of Havers J. upon this are set out at page 9 of his judgment. The judge said: "Now the trustees through Mr. "Fieldhouse knew of the existence of this basin and of this pipe "with a stop tap on it and the open end. They certainly had "the means of knowing it had this stop tap on it and an open "end. In my view, they ought to have realized it was a source "of potential danger to persons occupying the lower floors if it "was accidentally knocked on. I accept the evidence of Mr. "Adams and Mr. Gomersall. I think leaving the pipe in this "condition 3½ inches above the floor and close to the basin with "a stop cock and open end was a very slipshod and inefficient "piece of plumbing. There was no drain to take away water if "it was left on and if it was left on accidentally, as might well "happen, in one of the ways indicated by Mr. Gomersall, the "water would come out on to the floor, and if negligently left "on it would in course of time seep through the floors to the "ground floor and do damage. I am satisfied that there was a "duty upon the trustees to take reasonable care to prevent the "escape of water and I think that they ought to have foreseen "the possibility that this stop tap might be accidentally turned "on in one of the ways Mr. Gomersall described, and that they "were negligent in failing to take reasonable care in not adopting "one or other of the methods of preventing water escaping which "Mr. Adams and Mr. Gomersall described."

Thus the judge was satisfied that there was negligence on the part of the trustees, or of their agent, in regard to the water supply in the building. He said that if he was satisfied that the tap was accidentally or unintentionally turned on he would have been disposed to find that the plaintiffs had established a case against the trustees, but—"As it is, however, I am satisfied "that this turning on of this tap must have been a deliberate "and mischievous act." He added: "I have not had the "advantage of having Messrs. Robinsons called before me or "any of their servants or employees. I do not know whether or "how often they used this basin on the second floor. I do not "know at what time their employees left on the material date "or what the condition of the property was when they did last "leave. I am quite satisfied as regards the second defendants "that neither Mr. Barder, Mr. Driver, nor Miss Dobson "deliberately turned this stop tap on. It may have been caused "by the mischievous act of one or other of the occupiers of the "building or by a stranger who came in from outside, or possibly "it may have been caused by somebody who came in when the "door was left open. It is quite impossible for me on the "evidence to say who it was that did in fact turn this stop tap "on."

We cannot accept as accurate the finding that the turning on of the tap was a deliberate and mischievous act. It is, of course, possible that someone deliberately and mischievously turned on the tap, though we do not regard that as so likely to happen as that someone tried the tap, and, failing to get water, forgot to turn it off. One ought not to assume a deliberate act with the intention to do damage if there are other equally likely explanations. It seems to us upon the evidence that there exists complete uncertainty as to how the escape came about. If the judge was entitled to draw the inference that the damage was caused by the deliberate and mischievous act of some person unconnected with the trustees, we would agree with him that the trustees are not liable in damages. As we take a different view upon the facts, we must consider the law upon the subject.

The general rule in regard to damage caused by the escape of water from one man's land onto that of another was stated in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, delivered by Blackburn J. in Fletcher v. Rylands,[1] in these terms: "We think "that the true rule of law is, that the person who for his own "purposes brings on his lands and collects and keeps there "anything likely to do mischief if it escapes, must keep it in at "his peril, and, if he does not do so, is prima facie answerable "for all the damage which is the natural consequence of its "escape." This statement of the law was expressly approved in the House of Lords[2] and cannot be challenged. There are, however, exceptions to the rule. If the plaintiff has consented to the source of danger and there has been no negligence on the part of the defendant, the defendant is not liable, and the same applies if the water is maintained for the common benefit of both the plaintiff and the defendant.

It is not necessary to cite the older authorities: they are admirably summarized in two judgments of Goddard L.J. The first is Kiddle v. City Business Properties Ltd.[3] In that case the plaintiff was the occupier of a shop which formed part of a building belonging to the defendants, who had demised the shop to him. The shop was situated in an arcade, the glass roof of which was the property and under the control of the defendants. Rain-water from this roof ran into a gutter over the plaintiff's shop and was carried to the sewer by a piping which ran down the side of the shop. Owing to an accumulation of rubbish in the piping, rain-water escaped from the gutter, found its way into the plaintiff's shop, and damaged his stock. The defendants had made adequate arrangements for the inspection and cleansing of the gutter and piping, and there was no negligence on their part. It was held that, in the absence of negligence, the defendants were not liable to the plaintiff in an action for nuisance for allowing the water to escape onto his premises as (1) the plaintiff's shop formed part of a larger building belonging to the defendants and he must be held to have taken the shop as it was and could not complain that the building was not constructed differently; and (2) the arrangements for the collection and carrying away of water from the glass roof to the sewer was for the joint benefit of both the plaintiff and the defendants.

The Lord Justice was unable to find that there was any neglect of duty on the part of the defendants and, after referring to certain of the authorities, he said: "But all these cases arose between "adjoining owners whose holdings were entirely independent the "one of the other. There is another line of authority which has "to be considered where the water has escaped from a place "where it has been brought with the consent or for the common "benefit of both parties. I need refer to no more of the cases "than Carstairs v. Taylor,[4] Ross v. Fedden[5] and Cockburn v. "Smith.[6] It is now settled law that where the plaintiff and the "defendant occupy parts of the same building, whether it be two "floors of a warehouse, two sets of offices, or two flats, and water "which is laid on to the building escapes and does damage, the "person from whose part the escape takes place is not liable in "the absence of negligence. The reason for the escape is imma-"terial as long as the exercise of reasonable care would not have "prevented it, and it seems to me that the true reason is most "clearly stated in the judgment of Baron Martin in Carstairs v. "Taylor,[4] where he says: 'Now, I think that one who takes a "'floor in a house must be held to take the premises as they "'are, and cannot complain that the house was not constructed "'differently.' So here the plaintiff has taken part of the defen-"dants' premises with a sloping roof outside down which rain " must run to the gutter provided to carry it off, and it therefore " follows that, if the flooding from the gutter occurred without " negligence on the part of the landlords, the latter are not liable."

The second is Peters v. Prince of Wales Theatre (Birmingham) Ld.,[7] in which case the plaintiff leased from the defendants shop premises forming part of the defendants' building which contained a theatre and a rehearsal room, the defendants covenanting (inter alia) to keep the exterior of the demised premises in good and tenantable repair and condition. When the lease was granted the plaintiff knew that the rehearsal room was fitted with a system of sprinklers, which also extended to his shop, designed to discharge automatically large quantities of water in case of fire. Owing to an exceptionally severe frost, and not to any default on the part of the defendants, the sprinklers burst and water percolated to the plaintiff's shop and damaged his goods. In an action by the plaintiff against the defendants for damages it was held (1) that the defendants had not broken their covenant to keep the exterior of the demised premises in repair since the covenant must be construed as referring to every exterior part of the demised premises, to the exclusion of what was not demised, and the sprinklers were no part of the demised premises; (2) that the doctrine in Rylands v. Fletcher[8] did not apply as the plaintiff had impliedly consented to the presence of the sprinklers. The plaintiff's claim, therefore, failed.

The judgment of the Court of Appeal was given by Goddard L.J., who reviewed the authorities from Carstairs v. Taylor[9] onwards, and said at pp. 77 and 78: " A case almost identical " on its facts with the last is Blake v. Woolf,[10] where the judg- " ment of the Divisional Court was delivered by that most learned " and accurate lawyer, R. S. Wright J. He said: ' In this case " ' the plaintiff, by taking these premises with water laid on to " ' them and accepting his supply of water from the defendant's " ' cistern, must be taken to have assented to water being kept " ' on the premises by the defendant.' He then cited the cases " to which we have referred, and held that, as there was no " negligence proved the defendant was not liable. The same " result followed in Rickards v. Lothian,[11] although in that case " the emphasis was laid on the supply of water for water-closets " and lavatories being a necessity, and, indeed, a landlord's duty, " in modern life. So there is unbroken authority from 1871 to " 1913 that where the plaintiff and defendant occupy different " floors of one building and water laid on to the building escapes, " the party from whose rooms the water escapes is not liable in " the absence of negligence.

" The latest case on the subject is Kiddle v. City Business " Properties Ld.,[12] where it was decided that this matter was

" now settled law, the reason for which was most clearly stated " in the passage from the judgment of Baron Martin in Carstairs " v. Taylor.[13] In truth, it appears to depend on consent, and " it seems to us that the fact that in most of the cases, at any " rate, the benefit of the water or the gutters was common to both " parties is really an element, although, no doubt, an important " element, in showing that there was consent. The contractual " relationship between landlord and tenant, or the willingness of " the plaintiff to take a lease of part of a house so constructed " that at the time when he takes his lease other occupiers are " being supplied with water, removes the case from the sphere " of the common law doctrine laid down in Rylands v. Fletcher.[14] " This explains why the plaintiff failed in Carstairs v. Taylor [13] " and succeeded in Humphries v. Cousins.[15] "

From these judgments it appears that there are two important elements for consideration, namely, negligence and consent. In the case of an ordinary water supply in a block of premises each tenant can normally be regarded as consenting to the presence of water on the premises if the supply is of the usual character. It cannot be said that he consents to it if it is of quite an unusual kind, or is defective or dangerous, unless he knows of that. Havers J. said: " I do not think, therefore, that in the light of " that evidence it can be taken that the plaintiffs gave any implied " consent to the existence of that particular section of pipe. They " must, as I say, have been taken to have impliedly consented to " the installation of a water supply." It appears to us that they cannot be said to have consented to the set-up or installation as it existed at the time the damage was caused. Over and above this, negligence on the part of the defendants which causes or contributes to the damage takes the case out of the exception to the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher.[16] It cannot be disputed that the leaving of the pipe in the condition in which it was constituted negligence, as the judge said.

The trustees owed a duty to the plaintiffs. To determine whether there was a breach of that duty it is not necessary to look further than to the words of Baron Alderson in Blyth v. Birmingham Waterworks Co.[17]: " Negligence is the omission to " do something which a reasonable man, guided upon those con- " siderations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human " affairs, would do, or doing something which a prudent and " reasonable man would not do." The leaving of the copper pipe in the position, and in the condition, in which it was was something which no reasonable person would do, and the damage to the plaintiffs' goods was damage of a kind which might naturally follow from it.

In Haynes v. Harwood [18] Greer L.J. said: " There can be "no doubt in this case that the damage was the result of the "wrongful act in the sense of being one of the natural and "probable consequences of the wrongful act. It is not necessary "to show that this particular accident and this particular damage "were probable; it is sufficient if the accident is of a class that "might well be anticipated as one of the reasonable and probable "results of the wrongful act."

In order to excuse themselves, the trustees must show that the escape of water was due to the act of a subsequent conscious volition. It is clear from the decision of the Privy Council in Dominion Natural Gas Co. v. Collins [19] that the onus of showing this is upon them. If they can show that the proximate cause of the damage is the malicious act of a third party against which no precautions would have been of use they are not liable in damages: see Rickards v. Lothian.[20] It appears to us that they have not approached this stage. The position is one of complete uncertainty. It does not excuse the trustees if the stop tap was negligently left on by a third party. As to which see the judgments in Philco Radio and Television Corpn. of Great Britain Ld. v. J. Spurling Ld.[21] Unless it can be established that the act was at the least "a deliberate and mischievous act," to use the words of Havers J., the trustees are not absolved. And, as we have said, we do not consider that that finding of the judge was warranted upon the evidence which was given.

Mr. Paull, on behalf of the appellant plaintiffs, put the case in another way. He submitted that it was clear that the trustees had not taken all reasonable precautions to prevent an escape of water and that such reasonable precautions would have prevented the damage suffered by the plaintiffs. Consequently, he claimed, the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed on their claim. We prefer to look upon the case in the way already stated. The trustees were the owners of the building and the occupiers of the part on which the basin and copper pipe were. They were found to be negligent in relation to the pipe from which the escape occurred. The immediate cause of the escape remains wholly unexplained.

The position might have been made much clearer if further evidence had been called. Having regard to the way in which the case was left, we consider that the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed. Their appeal should be allowed and judgment should be entered for them for the amount of damages agreed, with costs in this court and in the court of first instance.

Appeal allowed.

Husband and Wife — Divorce — Discretion — Exercise — Only matters proved to be taken into account—Matters relevant in discretion statement—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 25), s. 4.

By the proviso to section 4 (2) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, the court "shall not be bound to pronounce a decree of "divorce and may dismiss the petition if it finds that the petitioner "has during the marriage been guilty of adultery. . . ."

The wife petitioner in an undefended petition for divorce had previously been married to an American, who had divorced her on the ground of adultery. In her discretion statement the wife admitted having committed one act of adultery with one P., and continued "save as aforesaid I have never committed adultery." In a confession statement which was put in, the husband alleged that the wife had committed adultery with P. on numerous occasions, which the wife denied in evidence.

The trial judge, while finding the wife's case proved, criticized her discretion statement as untrue in view of the previous divorce; professed himself not satisfied that there had been only one act of adultery, refused to exercise his discretion, and dismissed the petition. On appeal:—

Held, (1) that in refusing his discretion the judge had given weight to irrelevant and unproved matters, for a discretion statement had reference only to acts of adultery committed during the marriage in suit, and there was no evidence on which he could find that the wife had been guilty of more than one act of adultery; (2) that a decree nisi should be pronounced, and the matter referred to the Queen's Proctor for investigation.

Observation of Lord Simon in Blunt v. Blunt [1943] A.C. 517, 526; 59 T.L.R. 315; [1943] 2 All E.R. 76 applied.

APPEAL from Judge Reid, sitting as a special commissioner.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Denning L.J.

Alan Lipfriend for the wife.

The husband did not appear.

DENNING L.J. The petitioner in this case married her husband on March 8, 1947, when she was 18 years of age and he was 19. At that time she was the divorced wife, we were told, of an American serviceman. In these proceedings she sues her second husband for divorce on the ground of his adultery. His adultery is established. He is living with another woman by whom he has a child. But, nevertheless, the judge has refused to exercise his discretion in the petitioner's favour.

The first point arises on the wife's discretion statement. The wife in her discretion statement said that on one occasion in October, 1951, she committed adultery with Peter Cunningham at 36, Harp Road, Hanwell, and then said: "Save as "aforesaid I have never committed adultery." The judge criticized that sentence. He said that it was inaccurate, because she herself had been divorced for adultery by her previous husband. It seems to me that in these proceedings the prior divorce for adultery was irrelevant. Section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, which confers a discretion on the court, says that the court "shall not be bound to pronounce a "decree of divorce and may dismiss the petition if it finds that "the petitioner has during the marriage been guilty of adultery." Those words show that the only relevant adultery is adultery during the marriage. The discretion statement should be construed in the light of the statute. On its proper construction, it meant: "Save as aforesaid I have never committed adultery "during the marriage." So read it was not inaccurate. It should not be taken against the petitioner in any way.

The second point—the point on which the commissioner refused a decree—arose out of the fact that the husband, in a statement which he had made, alleged that his wife had committed adultery on numerous occasions with a man named Pete. The judge asked the petitioner about that statement, and she denied that there were numerous occasions. She said: "That is "just lies." The judge was not satisfied. He said: "I am "not satisfied about this story about the single act of adultery. "I am not satisfied in this case that the petitioner has shown "me the frankness which somebody who asks for the discretion "of the court ought to apply." On that account he refused to exercise his discretion in her favour.

It is plain, on the wording of the Act, that, in order to refuse a decree, the only adultery upon which the commissioner can act is adultery which he "finds" to have been committed, that is, adultery which is proved or admitted before him. In this case, there was only one single act of adultery proved or admitted before the court. Suspicion of other acts is not enough. Suspicion that she is telling an untruth is not enough.

Let me take a case which often happens. A petitioner may not put in a discretion statement at all. But yet the other spouse may have made a statement, not on oath, saying that the petitioner has committed adultery with other people. The judge cannot on that statement refuse to exercise his discretion in the petitioner's favour. He can only refuse a decree if he "finds" the petitioner guilty of adultery during the marriage. His proper course is to put the statement before the petitioner to see if she admits it or not. If she denies it and he is still not satisfied where the truth lies, his proper course is to send the case for the Queen's Proctor to make inquiries.

In this present case, in my judgment, the commissioner ought not to have dismissed the petition altogether. If he was not satisfied and had his suspicions aroused then the proper course for him to have taken would have been for him to send the case to the Queen's Proctor.

That, indeed, is I think the course that this court should take today. In my judgment, in view of the one admitted act of adultery, the court should exercise its discretion and a decree nisi should be pronounced on the grounds of the husband's adultery, which has been clearly established, but, nevertheless, the court should send the matter to the Queen's Proctor so that he can look into it and see if there are any steps which he thinks he ought to take. I think the appeal should be allowed accordingly.

HODSON L.J. I agree. This is an appeal against the refusal of the judge to exercise discretion. In Blunt v. Blunt [1] Lord Simon said in this connexion [2]: "If it can be shown that the "court acted"—I will leave out words which do not apply—"in "that it either gave weight to irrelevant or unproved matters or "omitted to take into account matters that are relevant, there "would, in my opinion, be ground for an appeal." In this case, Mr. Lipfriend says, I think with justification, that in one respect the judge gave weight to an irrelevant matter, because the petitioner had sworn that she had never committed adultery save as admitted in her discretion statement, whereas in fact she had previously been divorced from a former husband on the ground of adultery. I think the construction of what she said is quite plain. I think that she only intended to refer to the particular marriage and ought not to be taken as referring to an irrelevant marriage, namely, her previous marriage. Indeed the only relevant adultery on her part (as section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, says) is adultery during this marriage.

That is not to say that I wish in any way to criticize the form in which the statement was drawn. It was drawn in a form which Mr. Lipfriend tells me is commonly used in compliance with rule 28, sub-paragraph (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, which directs that the statement is to set out particulars of the act of adultery committed and all the facts which it is material for the court to know for the purpose of the exercise of its discretion. It would be highly undesirable if the court were to endeavour to lay down lines or indicate forms to be rigidly followed in such cases.

I am afraid that the commissioner allowed himself to be influenced by a misconstruction of that sentence of the petitioner's, because he said in his judgment, that although he would agree that in one sense he was not concerned with it, he did feel that he was concerned that she should tell the truth in her discretion statement, and he did refer to the fact that that particular paragraph was not accurate. So one cannot, I think, avoid the conclusion that he was in some respects influenced by that matter.

The other complaint which Mr. Lipfriend makes (which is, I think, well founded) is that the judge paid attention to an unproved matter. The unproved matter was this, that although she herself had admitted adultery once with a man called Pete, her husband, in a statement which he had given to an inquiry agent and which he did not support by evidence, alleged that she committed adultery more than once with Pete. The judge also heard during the course of the evidence of the existence of a diary which the petitioner had kept apparently containing references to Pete. He was left in this position, that he would not accept her statement that she had only committed adultery on one occasion with Pete. Mr. Lipfriend says that that is tantamount to saying, in the light of the husband's statement, that he was finding her guilty of further adultery without evidence.

One does not wish to say anything which would lead any trial judge to suppose that it was not for him to ascertain the facts and make up his mind as to whether or not a witness is telling the truth, and to see, so far as he is able (difficult though it is, and must necessarily be, in these undefended cases) that the court is not deceived. Yet in this case, in the state of the evidence as it stands I feel that the commissioner, the husband not having given evidence in support of his charge of adultery, should have pronounced a decree in the exercise of the court's discretion and sent the matter to the Queen's Proctor for investigation; and I think that that is the course which the court ought to take.

I am not, of course, excluding the possibility that the commissioner might have refused to exercise discretion on some ground other than his refusal to accept the wife's evidence. However, he did not state any other ground upon which the discretion was refused.

Therefore, I agree that in this court we ought to substitute our decision for his for the reasons which I have given and for those which my Lord has given, and that the matter should be dealt with in the way that has been indicated.

There was a third matter referred to by Mr. Lipfriend, namely, that the circumstances in which the wife left her husband were left in rather an unsatisfactory state. Of course, that is a material matter to consider in considering whether or not the discretion should be exercised. The judge did say that the wife's proceedings before the magistrate, which she had taken on the ground of desertion after she had apparently left her husband, were dismissed for some reason; and the commissioner adds that he was not told why. That is not quite accurate, because in the wife's evidence a leading question was put to her which she agreed with giving a reason for the dismissal of those proceedings. However, I do not think that that is a particularly important matter in this case. The circumstances of the separation were not fully investigated, and I think it would have been well if they had been more fully investigated.

* IN THE ESTATE OF ALBERTI, DECD.

Conflict of Laws—Immovable property—Assignment—Will—Revocation—Real estate in England—Disposition only revocable by English law—Wills Act, 1837 (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26), ss. 9, 20.

Whatever the domicile of the testator, no document can revoke a valid testamentary disposition of real estate in England unless it has been executed in accordance with the provisions of the Wills Act, 1837.

A testator executed a will and codicil in accordance with English law while resident in England, whereby he disposed inter alia of all his real estate in England. He later made a holograph will in Switzerland which was valid by the law of Switzerland but which was not executed in accordance with the provisions of the Wills Act, 1837. By that will he revoked all former wills although he did not in terms dispose of real estate in England of which he died possessed:—

Held, that, as the revocation in the Swiss will did not comply with section 20 of the Wills Act, 1837, it did not revoke the previous disposition of the deceased's real estate in England.

PROBATE MOTION for grant of letters of administration to real estate in England.

By a will dated April 21, 1939, made and executed in England in accordance with section 9 of the Wills Act, 1837, the deceased, Pietro Alberti, who was born in Switzerland and was then in business at Worthing, Sussex, gave, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate, except real estate or any share of real estate in Switzerland to which he might be entitled at his death to his executors, Barclays Bank Ld. upon trust for his niece, Serafina, and his nephew, Guido, in equal shares beneficially as tenants in common. The deceased returned to and remained in Switzerland throughout the war, and returned to England in 1946, with the intention of clearing up his affairs and returning permanently to Switzerland. In fact, he remained in England, paying periodical visits to Switzerland until February 2, 1953. By a codicil dated October 28, 1946, also made and executed in England in accordance with section 9 of the Wills Act, 1837, which recited that Serafina had died, the deceased directed that the residue of his estate should be held in equal shares in trust for his niece Adelaide and his nephew Guido.

On February 15, 1952, the deceased made, in Switzerland, a holograph will valid by the law of Switzerland but not executed in accordance with section 9 of the Wills Act, 1837, by which he revoked and cancelled all former wills and disposed of his estate in England and Switzerland, and of his real estate in Switzerland in favour of his nephew, Guido, his nephew's wife, Maria, and their five children, and of his niece Adelaide. This will did not in terms dispose of the testator's real estate in England. The deceased died on February 23, 1953, domiciled in Switzerland, leaving him surviving in addition to Guido and Adelaide three other nephews and nieces. These were the only persons entitled to his real estate in England in the event of an intestacy. At the date of his death the deceased owned a freehold house in England, arrangements for the sale of which were not completed until after he had died. The value of the real estate in England consisted of £3,000, being the proceeds of the sale.

Guido and Adelaide, by their attorney, Barclays Bank Ld., applied on motion for " a grant of letters of administration with " the English will and codicil annexed " for their use and benefit on the ground that, as the Swiss will was not executed in accordance with section 9 of the Wills Act, 1837, it was inoperative to revoke the English will and codicil so far as they disposed of the testator's real estate in England.

The application came before Mr. Registrar Wilkinson, who refused it, setting out his reasons for doing so and directing that the matter be referred to the judge on motion.

Clifford Mortimer for the applicants.

The other nephews and nieces entitled in the event of intestacy did not appear and were not represented.

H. Clifford Mortimer. Dicey's Conflict of Laws (6th ed., p. 529) states that all rights over immovables are governed by the lex situs and further (at p. 535) that every question as to the devolution of immovables, whether on intestacy or by will, is governed by the lex situs. It is submitted that if the formalities required for a devise of immovables situated in England are those required by the testamentary law of England, namely, section 9 of the Wills Act, 1837, a will disposing of English land could only be revoked in the manner required by English testamentary law, namely, according to the provisions of section 20 of the Wills Act, 1837. In the Estate of Gossage [1] is authority for the proposition that " . . . the power of " revocation is merely another aspect of the power of disposi- " tion. . . . " It is, however, stated in Tristram and Coote's Probate Practice (20th ed., p. 91) that " . . . it would seem that " a testator who, by a will made strictly in accordance with the " law of his domicile, specifically revokes all previous wills, " effectively revokes a will valid to pass realty in England, even " though his last will may not be valid to dispose of English " realty." The passage purports to be developed from In re Cartwright,[2] but in that case the subsequent will containing a revocation clause was not valid according to the law of the testator's domicile, and was admissible to probate only by virtue of Lord Kingsdowne's Act. In In re Bradby [3] the testator died domiciled in France, leaving real estate in England. He had executed a will in English form disposing of his real and personal estate, but subsequently made a will valid according to French law disposing of all his estate. It was held that the French will did not revoke the English will as far as the English real estate was concerned. It is submitted that in In re Bradby[3] the law was correctly applied, and that it should be followed.

*BURFORD v. BURFORD.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Discretion—Exercise—No finding on issue of desertion—Refusal of court to exercise discretion on petitioner's admission of adultery—Duty of court to find for or against petitioner on matrimonial offence alleged before exercising discretion—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 25), s. 4 (1) (2).

Husband and Wife — Divorce — Practice — Answer — Amendment — Husband's petition for divorce on grounds of desertion—Admission of adultery by husband in evidence—Application by wife for leave to amend answer and cross-charge adultery—Refusal of leave to amend—Grounds for refusal of leave to amend held insufficient—Order for new trial.

A husband petitioning for divorce on the grounds of his wife's alleged desertion asked the court to exercise its discretion under section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, in his favour in respect of his adultery with a named woman. By her answer the wife denied the desertion but did not pursue her defence until at the hearing the husband admitted to further adultery with another woman. The wife thereupon applied for leave to amend her answer in order to ask for a divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery. The commissioner refused leave to amend (a) because the husband did not consent to it and (b) because the second named woman would not like to be named in the wife's cross petition. He made no finding on desertion, refused the exercise of the court's discretion to the husband, and refused the wife leave to amend her answer:—

Held, (1) that the court was not entitled to consider the exercise of its discretion under the proviso to section 4 until it had reached a conclusion as to whether the desertion had been proved; (2) that, although the grant of leave to amend was a matter within the discretion of the court, the reasons for refusing leave to this wife to amend her answer were insufficient to justify such refusal; and that accordingly there must be an order for a new trial in order that justice might be done to both parties.

BURFORD v. BURFORD.

APPEAL from an order of Mr. Commissioner Edgedale Q.C.

The wife of a marriage which took place in 1949 left her husband on May 7, 1951, and refused thereafter to live with him, despite letters from him asking her to come back. After three years had elapsed, the husband presented a petition for divorce on the grounds of her desertion, and filed a statement admitting that he had committed adultery with an American woman, now believed to be in the United States. By her answer the wife denied the desertion, and she set up various other matters in her defence, but she did not pursue. She indicated, inter alia, that during the period when the alleged desertion was running, she and her husband had had sexual intercourse on a number of occasions. The husband did not deny those ocasions but said that they had occurred when he had been trying to get his wife to come back and set up home with him again, and that, in consequence, they did not prevent the desertion from running in his favour. In the course of his evidence, the husband told the court that he had committed adultery with another woman, now living in this country. Counsel for the wife thereupon asked for leave to amend her answer in order to cross-charge the husband with adultery and pray for a divorce herself. That application was refused by the commissioner who, in an interlocutory observation, said that unless the other side consented to the amendment he could not allow it; and he accepted as a further reason for refusing the leave to amend a suggestion by counsel for the husband that the second named woman would not like it if she were named in the wife's answer.

At the conclusion of the hearing on July 28, 1955, the commissioner made the following order: "The commissioner "having taken the oral evidence of the petitioner and of the "witness produced on his behalf in support of the petition . . . "the respondent having filed answer . . . but not defending the "suit at the hearing pronounced . . . that he made no finding "in respect of the matters alleged in the said petition, and that "since the celebration of the marriage between the parties the "petitioner had been guilty of adultery and refused to the "petitioner the exercise of the discretion conferred on the court "by section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950,[1] and refused

The husband appealed.

J. E. S. Simon Q.C. and C. J. T. Pensotti for the husband.
Ifor Lloyd Q.C. and John Mortimer for the wife.

The following cases were referred to in the argument: Stone v. Stone [2]; Blunt v. Blunt.[3]

DENNING L.J. I will ask Hodson L.J. to deliver the first judgment.

HODSON L.J. read the order of the commissioner, stated the facts set out above, and continued: The case was concluded by the commissioner refusing to make any finding at all on the husband's case of desertion, because (as I think is plain from his judgment) he was shocked by the circumstances of the husband's own adultery.

I do not propose, having regard to the course which I think must be taken here, to say anything about the husband's own adultery; but it seems to me that, the adultery having been admitted, it was not open to the commissioner to take the course that he did, namely, to refuse to exercise his discretion without coming to a conclusion whether or not desertion had been proved. I say that, because section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, provides for the duty which the court has to perform on the hearing of a petition for divorce, and subsection (2) provides that if the court is satisfied on the evidence that the case for the petition has been proved, the court shall pronounce a decree of divorce, but if the court is not satisfied it shall dismiss the petition.

It is only, in my judgment, in cases where the court is satisfied on the evidence that the case has been proved that the following proviso comes into operation: "Provided that the "court shall not be bound to pronounce a decree of divorce and "may dismiss the petition if it finds that the petitioner has "during the marriage been guilty of adultery." That was this case; but the commissioner was not in a position to consider the question of discretion without deciding the matter of desertion first; and, indeed, that is not only right, I think, according to the plain reading of the statute, but it makes good sense as well, because in order to determine whether or not the discretion of the court ought to be exercised in the petitioner's favour the court ought at the same time to make up its mind as to the circumstances in which the parties separated, and whether or not (as Mr. Simon rightly put it) it was indeed the wife who was to blame for breaking up the home. That task the commissioner did not perform, and the question, therefore, arises as to what ought to be done.

I must mention another matter. When the petitioner went into the witness-box and disclosed that he had committed adultery with two women—one of them being an American woman who was probably abroad, and the other a woman whose name was given and who was said to be living in this country—the wife's counsel thereupon asked for leave to amend, in order to cross-charge adultery with the women and ask for a divorce herself.

That application for leave to amend was refused. Of course, it is in the discretion of the court to decide whether or not leave to amend should be given, but, so far as appears, no good reason in this case was given for refusing leave to amend. The first reason which the commissioner put forward in an interlocutory observation was that unless the other side consented he could not do it. That was not a good reason. The second reason, suggested to him by Mr. Pensotti on behalf of the husband and, presumably, accepted by him, was that it would not be a very good thing from the point of view of the woman who would have to be named if leave to amend were given, because she would not like it. That does not seem to be a very good reason for refusing leave to amend.

In all the circumstances of this case, the husband being anxious to have the finding, to which he claims to be entitled on the issue of desertion, the only course open to this court, I think, is to order a new trial. Mr. Simon has urged that his case on desertion is clearly proved, and that we ought to substitute our finding for the absent finding below, and put the matter right. The difficulty about that is that we should be asked to exercise our discretion in addition, and it seems to me that as the matter now stands that might produce injustice upon the wife. It looks very much as if she should have had leave to amend below, and then both issues would have been before the court which had to consider the question of discretion—on the one hand, the wife's desertion and, on the other hand, the husband's adultery; and it would have been open to the court to grant a decree to one or other, or to both, or to neither. But, having regard to the way in which this case has gone, this court cannot really put the matter right. It now appears that, faced by the refusal of leave to amend, and having succeeded in getting the husband's petition dismissed, the wife could not appeal against that decision becaue she had been successful in the case, and she has herself presented a petition for divorce based on her husband's admitted adultery with the second woman referred to by him in his evidence.

If we order a new trial the effect of that will be that the husband's case can come on with the wife's case. In my view, the only way of producing a just result is that each party should have the opportunity of having their cases heard. The order of Mr. Commissioner Edgedale must be set aside and a new trial ordered.

* DIRPHYS (OWNERS) v. SOYA (OWNERS). THE SOYA.

Shipping—Collision—Damages for detention—Vessel under charter—Rise in freight market during detention of vessel—Vessel delayed from trading under enhanced freight rates in subsequent charter—Measure of damages.

The plaintiffs' vessel Dirphys, while on a voyage to London for loading under a charter, dated October 13, 1950, was in collision with the defendants' vessel Soya. The Dirphys was diverted to Rotterdam for repairs, which occupied a period of 20 days. While the Dirphys was undergoing repairs, the plaintiffs fixed the vessel under a charter, dated January 18, 1951, for a voyage subsequent to the voyage on which she was then engaged, and at a much enhanced freight rate, owing to a sharp rise in the freight market. But for the collision, the Dirphys would have completed the earlier charter and entered upon the subsequent charter 20 days earlier. The net rate of profit under the charter, dated October 13, 1950, was £144 3s. 10d. per day, and that under the subsequent charter was £819 17s. 4d. On the question of the measure of damages to be awarded to the plaintiffs in respect of the detention of their vessel during the period of repair:—

Held, that the loss of profits arising from the detention of a vessel was a question of fact, to be proved with reasonable certainty, and was not a matter on which the court was entitled to speculate. A claim for loss of profits, at the enhanced rate, was not proved with reasonable certainty, and was thus a speculation and too remote to be considered a consequence in law of the detention. An average of previous and subsequent voyages should not be resorted to, since it had not been proved that, but for the collision, the plaintiffs would have had any use of their vessel during the period of detention, other than that under the charter, dated October 30, 1950. Accordingly, the measure of the plaintiffs' damages for loss of profits was the equivalent of 20 days' detention at the rate of £144 3s. 10d. per day.

Report of the registrar confirmed.

THE SOYA.

MOTION in objection to the registrar's report.

The plaintiffs' vessel Dirphys was in collision with the defendants' vessel Soya. By an agreement of terms of settlement, the respective claims of the vessels were referred to the Admiralty registrar. At the time of the collision, the Dirphys was under a charter whereby a net profit of £144 3s. 10d. was earned per day. Owing to a sharp rise in the freight market during the period of detention, the net profit earned by the Dirphys in the subsequent charter was £819 17s. 4d. per day.

Before the registrar, the plaintiffs claimed 20 days' detention at the rate of £819 17s. 4d. per day, contending that, as a result of the collision, they had been delayed by 20 days from engaging their vessel upon a voyage at the profitable rates existing at the beginning of 1951 in the Far East. The defendants contended that the rate should be that under the charter, dated October 13, 1950, or alternatively, the mean between that rate and the rate of the voyage previous to the collision, being £203 10s. 9d. per day.

The registrar held that, for the purposes of ascertaining the loss of profits during the period of detention, the Dirphys could not be regarded as a free ship, since she was proceeding under a charter at the time of the collision, and the loss of profits fell to be determined under that charter. The net profit on that voyage was £8,939 16s. 5d., and the voyage was of a duration of 82 days, inclusive of the 20 days' detention at Rotterdam. The plaintiffs earned this sum in 82 days, giving a net daily profit of £109 0s. 5d., whereas, but for the collision, this profit would have been earned in 62 days, giving a net daily profit of £144 3s. 10d. The measure of the plaintiffs' loss was the difference between these two figures, amounting to £35 3s. 5d. multiplied by 82. The delay in arriving at Bombay may have deprived the plaintiffs of the opportunity of engaging their vessel in highly profitable trade in the Far East earlier than they in fact did, but that is a speculation and too remote a consequence in law to carry damages.

The plaintiffs moved that the decision of the registrar, in so far as it concerned damages for loss of profits, be set aside or varied. The plaintiffs contended that, in disallowing the plaintiffs' claim in full, the registrar was acting against the weight of evidence; that there was evidence on which the registrar should have found that but for the collision with the Soya, the Dirphys would have been fixed in January, 1951, for a charterparty commencing on or about March 10, 1951, from Dungun to Japan, or would have been fixed in January and March, 1951, with charterparties at rates similar to, or better than, those in the charterparty of January 18, 1951; the registrar was in error in fact and in law in taking 82 days instead of 62 days in calculating the amount of the plaintiffs' loss; the registrar was wrong in law in basing his decision on "the charter under which she (the Dirphys) was proceeding"; and in holding that, although the delay in arriving at Bombay may have deprived the plaintiffs of the chance of becoming engaged in highly profitable ventures in the Far East earlier than they were so engaged, this was a speculation and too remote in law to carry damages.

K. S. Carpmael Q.C. and R. F. Stone for the plaintiffs.
H. V. Brandon and D. L. Rait for the defendants.

The following cases and authorities were cited in argument: Roscoe's Measure of Damages in Maritime Collisions, 3rd ed., pp. 87, 91 and 108; The Argentino [1]; The Ikala [2]; The Mediana [3]; The Volturno. [4]

WILLMER J., having stated that the only question raised in the objection related to the measure of damages to be awarded to the plaintiff in respect of the detention of their vessel during the repair of the collision damage, continued: It is common ground that, in consequence of the collision, the plaintiffs' vessel, the Dirphys, was detained for 19¾ days. For the purpose of ease of calculation, everybody, including the registrar, has taken that as being substantially equivalent to 20 days.

In respect of those 20 days it is, I think, not unimportant to observe that, in addition to the loss of profit which has been the subject-matter of this dispute, there has been a substantial allowance in respect of the costs of running the vessel which were thrown away. That, I think, is a matter which is not to be lost sight of. Actually, as far as that figure is concerned, although I do not quite know how it is arrived at, the registrar appears to have taxed down the sum which was originally claimed; but that has not been the subject of argument before me. All I am concerned with on this appeal is the amount which, over and above that, should be awarded for loss of profits.

The matter arises in this way. At the time of the collision the Dirphys was proceeding in ballast, bound for London, where she was due to load a cargo of sugar under a charterparty for carriage to Bombay. In consequence of the collision she was diverted to Rotterdam where the collision repairs were executed and, having completed the repairs, she then went on to London and was in time to load her cargo under the charterparty for Bombay.

As a result of that voyage, which lasted until March 21, 1951, the Dirphys made a profit of £8,939 odd which, calculated on a daily basis, and excluding the 20 days whilst the vessel was immobilized under repair, produced a daily rate of £144 3s. 10d.

[3] [1899] P. 127.
[4] [1921] 2 A.C. 544; 37 T.L.R. 969.

Although the registrar in his reasons has, if I may say so, stated it in rather a roundabout way, he has, in fact, adopted that figure as his measure for the daily rate to be allowed for loss of profit.

The plaintiffs' claim is based upon the subsequent history. The arresting thing that happened was that during the early part of 1951 freight rates generally climbed very steeply; in particular there was a very profitable trade, which I suspect was not entirely unconnected with the Korean war, between India, Malay and the Far East.

On January 18, 1951, during the period while the Dirphys was actually under repair at Rotterdam, a charterparty to carry iron ore from the port of Dungun, in Malay, to Japan, was concluded, which was to come into operation at the conclusion of her voyage to Bombay.

It was stated in that charterparty, which was for a vessel to be nominated (and one in respect of which the Dirphys was in fact nominated), that the vessel to be nominated was expected to be ready to load about March 17. The Dirphys was not ready to load under the charterparty until March 31, but she carried out that charterparty although a little later than expected.

The result of that was an extremely profitable voyage in which, during the course of 36 days, the owners made a net profit of £29,515, which gives an average daily rate of profit of £819 odd.

The plaintiffs' contention, both before the registrar and before this court, was to the effect that, in assessing the loss of profit that ought to be awarded to these owners for detaining the vessel during the 20 days of repair, regard should be had to the very substantial margin of profit earned upon this subsequent voyage, the engagement for which was actually negotiated during the period when the vessel was undergoing repair.

Moreover, the case for the plaintiffs goes a little further than that because, among the documents presented to the registrar, there were accounts in respect of two further voyages subsequent to the one to which I have referred, and, in the case of both these subsequent voyages also, a very high rate of profit was shown, averaging in both cases substantially more than £800 per day.

It is on the basis that the daily rate ought to be calculated at something in excess of £800 per day that the plaintiffs arrive at the large claim for £17,000 odd by way of damages for detention.

As the learned registrar said in the reasons for his decision, the plaintiffs' argument was perfectly simple. Having lost 20 days before loading in London, she was 20 days behind time at Bombay and, therefore, she lost 20 days' profit at the high rates then prevailing in the Far East, as evidenced by the charterparty of January 18, 1951, and the subsequent charters.

All the authorities, I think, recognize that questions of this sort must, in the last resort, resolve themselves into questions of fact. It is a matter of fact to assess what the injured party has in fact lost by reason of the detention of his ship. It is elementary, of course, that it is for the party claiming damages for the loss of use of his vessel to prove to the satisfaction of the court both the fact of the loss and the amount of the loss.

It is not, in the circumstances, particularly helpful to refer at length to authorities, but I think I may refer to two short statements, both of which have been referred to during the course of the argument, and which, as I see it, crystallize the question that the court has to decide in a case of this character.

The first authority I want to refer to is that contained in the well-known and often-quoted words of Bowen L.J. in The Argentino [1]: "A ship is a thing by the use of which money may "be ordinarily earned, and the only question in case of a collision "seems to me to be, what is the use which the shipowner would, "but for the accident, have had of his ship, and what (excluding "the element of uncertain and speculative and special profits) "the shipowner, but for the accident, would have earned by the "use of her."

The only remark I venture to make in passing upon those well-worn words is with regard to the special exception which the learned Lord Justice makes in the case of "uncertain and "speculative and special profits." It is, I think, implicit in his statement of the law that it is for the plaintiff to prove his loss of profits at any rate as a matter of reasonable certainty.

If that is the correct interpretation of what was said by Bowen L.J., it marries very well with what was said by Viscount Sumner in The Ikala [2]: "A ship's day is not like a unit of "currency, always good for so many shillings. It has to be "proved that, in doing the shipowner the wrong of laying his "ship idle at the time in question, work, which she would other-"wise have done during the time, went undone to his measurable "loss or was only done by resorting to other expedients at a "measurable outlay."

If I seem to emphasize the use in two places by Viscount Sumner of the word "measurable," it is for the purpose of stressing what, as I said before, is implicit in Bowen L.J.'s words, that loss of profit is a matter to be proved or measured with reasonable certainty, and not a matter on which the court is entitled to speculate.

The plaintiffs contend that they have proved a loss of over £800 a day for 20 days as a matter of reasonable certainty. Counsel for the defendants, on the other hand, applying himself to the question posed by Bowen L.J. in The Argentino,[3] as to what was the use of his ship which the shipowner would have had but for the accident, contends that, but for the accident, this ship, during those 20 days, would in point of fact have been pursuing her voyage between London and Bombay in pursuance of the earlier charterparty. On that basis the defendants admit that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover some loss of profit, but they submit that the fair loss of profit to take is represented by the average daily profit made on that particular voyage, excluding, for the purpose of arriving at that figure, the 20 days that were lost during repairs.

But, as I said, the plaintiffs' claim that what they lost was 20 days at the enhanced rate of profit of over £800 per day. The argument is put in this way: but for the collision, the voyage from Bombay would have been completed 20 days earlier; the fixture from Dungun to Japan would equally have been arranged to begin 20 days earlier, and the result would have been that the plaintiffs would have enjoyed a further 20 days of trading at the extremely profitable rates which appear to have been maintained throughout at least several months of the year 1951. Persuasive as the plaintiffs' argument is, I am not satisfied that, by proving the facts they have proved, they have shown with any reasonable certainty that there was a loss of profit on anything like this scale.

It may very well be true that, but for the collision, the Dirphys would have started her profitable Far Eastern trading, if I may so describe it, 20 days earlier than in fact she did; but whether in the long run the plaintiffs would have been any better off has been left, as far as I can follow the evidence, as a matter of complete speculation. If the plaintiffs could have proved that, because of those 20 days' detention, they lost the opportunity of a complete voyage at those enhanced rates, then that would have been a measure of damage which I could well understand. But I do not know, on the evidence which has been given, what the ultimate outcome of this loss of 20 days may have been. For all that I know, that loss of 20 days may, in fact, have cost the plaintiffs nothing at all. All the engagements to which the ship was committed were in fact carried out. There is nothing to show, one way or the other, what would have been the result if the programme had all been accelerated by 20 days. For all that I know, different rates of freight might very well have been agreed in relation to the subsequent charters if the loading had in each successive case been 20 days earlier. It is, I suppose, even conceivable that, working it out over a long period, the plaintiffs may have been left actually better off, having regard to the rates prevailing on the particular dates when their various commitments were negotiated.

I mention these considerations as tending to confirm the view at which the registrar arrived, that the loss of profit at this very enhanced rate which the plaintiffs are claiming, and claiming on the basis of the subsequent charterparties into which they entered, was too speculative and too remote to be taken into consideration as a consequence in law of the detention in respect of which this claim arises.

Attractive as the plaintiffs' argument is, and attractively as it has been presented by Mr. Carpmael, I cannot persuade myself that the registrar was wrong, in all the circumstances, in coming to that conclusion.

THE SOYA.

Willmer J.

The only question therefore remaining is whether I ought to leave the award of damages as it is, namely, calculated on the basis of the profit actually earned in the course of the voyage on which the vessel was engaged at the time of the collision, or whether I ought to look to the period both preceding and succeeding the collision voyage and average the daily profits so as to get a fairer basis of comparison. If I am to do that, a further question arises: how many voyages ought I to go back and how many voyages ought I to go forward? I have given very careful consideration to that and, on the whole, I am not prepared to depart from the method adopted by the registrar, namely, that of assessing the loss of profit on the basis of the voyage on which the vessel was actually engaged at the time of the collision.

I come to that conclusion largely because, as I have said, in answering the question raised by Bowen L.J. in The Argentino,[4] the only answer I can give as to what use the shipowner would have had of the vessel during the period of detention, is that he would have used her for prosecuting the voyage from London to Bombay; and, if he had so used her during 20 days, he would have been earning a profit at the rate of about £144 per day. I cannot say that the learned registrar was wrong in arriving at that figure and, accordingly, I dismiss the objection and confirm the registrar's report.

Registrar's report confirmed.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

*GREGSON v. HICK HARGREAVES & CO. LD.

Factory — Dust — Elimination — "All practicable measures" — Substantial quantity of dust—Visible dust not dangerous—Invisible dust dangerous—Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 47 (1).

The defendants had employed the plaintiff as a moulder in their iron foundry from 1934 to 1951. In January, 1951, he was certified as suffering from silicosis. Substantial quantities of dust were given off at three stages of the process of dismantling loam moulds. Up to the time when the plaintiff's condition was diagnosed the defendants did not know of the danger of the dust, and it was discovered that although the visible dust given off was not injurious, an invisible dust containing silica remained in the atmosphere which, breathed in over a long period, might severely damage the lungs and cause silicosis. The cause of the plaintiff's silicosis was inhalation of this silica. Protective masks were provided for some employees only at one stage of the dismantling process.

---

[Reported by G. D. BLACK, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

On a claim by the plaintiff for breach of section 47 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, Donovan J. held that the defendants had taken all practicable measures to overcome the dangers of which they had contemporaneous knowledge and gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.—

Held, that, as a substantial quantity of dust was given off at three separate stages of the process, and the defendants had failed in their duty to take all practicable measures by not providing masks for those moulders likely to come into contact with the dust, or instructing them to keep away from the places where a substantial amount of dust was given off until such dust was gone, the defendants were in breach of section 47 (1). That section required employers to take all practicable steps if a substantial quantity of dust was given off, and it was no defence to employers who failed to take all practicable steps against visible dust to contend that what caused the damage was invisible dust given off at the same time of which they had no knowledge and whose dangerous qualities were unknown to them. Accordingly, the defendants were liable to the plaintiff.

Decision of Donovan J. [1955] 1 W.L.R. 1025; [1955] 2 All E.R. 860 reversed.

APPEAL from Donovan J.

The plaintiff, Robert Gregson, contracted silicosis while employed as a moulder in the defendants' iron foundry. He claimed damages for breaches of section 4 (1) and 47 (1)[1] of the Factories Act, 1937. On the appeal the plaintiff relied solely upon section 47 (1).[1]

The facts are fully set out in the judgment of Singleton L.J.

Fenton Atkinson Q.C. and Godfrey Heilpern for the plaintiff.

GREGSON v. HICK HARGREAVES & Co. LD.

Ld.[3]; Richards v. Highways Iron Founders (West Bromwich) Ld.[4]

SINGLETON L.J. The plaintiff is a man just under 60 years of age, and he was employed by the defendants at their factory in Bolton as a moulder. The defendants have a large foundry in which they make castings of various kinds, some of them being heavy and big. Everyone says that they are good employers in the best sense of the term. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants alleging that he had suffered injury to his health through their negligence or breach of statutory duty. Donovan J., who had the case before him at the assizes at Manchester in April of this year, gave his considered judgment on May 3, and by that judgment he held that the defendants were not responsible in damages. The plaintiff appeals to this court.

The plaintiff had been employed by the defendants for many years; from the year 1934 until 1951 he was continuously employed in this same factory; he had been employed by the defendants on and off before that date, and he had been engaged in the same sort of work for most of the time after his service in the first world war. In January, 1951, he was certified as suffering from pneumoconiosis, and it is agreed that he was then and is now suffering from that species of pneumoconiosis which is called silicosis. It is further agreed that this disability has arisen out of and in the course of his employment by the defendants. His claim against the defendants was for damages which he alleged were due to the defendants' breach, or breaches, of sections 4 and 47 of the Factories Act, 1937.

He had worked for many years as a moulder. During certain of the moulding processes dust is given off. In the course of his judgment Donovan J. said[1]: "The present case has revealed, "it seems for the first time, that dust from loam may contain "silica; that is, minute fractured particles of sand floating in the "air which, breathed in over a long period, severely damage the "lungs. This is what has happened to the plaintiff." Thus, one has it proved or admitted that the illness from which the plaintiff was found to be suffering, and from which he is still suffering, was caused through the inhalation of minute fractured particles of sand floating in the air, and that that happened during the course of his employment with the defendants.

There were several questions raised in the course of the hearing before Donovan J. In this court Mr. Atkinson directed our attention to one part of section 47 of the Factories Act, 1937, and said, quite frankly, that he was not raising any other point. There have been a number of decisions of the courts both under section 4 and section 47 of the Act, some of which have been cited to us; but I do not think that in the present case they are of very great help. I come directly to section 47 of the Act in order to consider its provisions. It is headed: "Removal of dust "or fumes," and subsection (1), as far as is material, reads: "In every factory in which, in connection with any process "carried on, there is given off any dust or fume or other impurity "of such a character and to such extent as to be likely to be "injurious or offensive to the persons employed, or any substantial "quantity of dust of any kind, all practicable measures shall be "taken to protect the persons employed against inhalation of the "dust or fume or other impurity and to prevent its accumulating "in any workroom . . ." That part of the section which I have read has two distinct branches; the first deals with "dust or "fume or other impurity of such a character and to such extent "as to be likely to be injurious or offensive to the persons "employed," and the second refers to "or any substantial "quantity of dust of any kind"; and in either case "all practic- "able measures shall be taken to protect the persons employed "against inhalation of the dust or fume."

Mr. Atkinson does not place any reliance on what I have described as the first branch of the section; he recognizes that upon some of the authorities there might be considerable difficulty in his way. He relies on the second part, and in particular on the words "or any substantial quantity of dust "of any kind." He submitted to the court that it was quite clear that in certain parts of the processes which were carried on in this foundry there was given off a considerable quantity of dust; and, that being so, he submitted that the employers were under a duty to take "all practicable measures to protect the persons employed against inhalation of the dust." He submitted further that upon the evidence it was clear that the defendants had not taken all practicable measures to protect the persons employed against such inhalation.

The shop in which the plaintiff was employed to work was some 300 feet long and 45 feet wide, and moulding was done in different parts of the shop. The work which was done was mostly the making of large castings, and there were employed both moulders and labourers. The castings are made in large moulds which are built up for the particular castings. The times at which dust is given off in quantities are said to happen on three different occasions. The judge said[2]: "With regard "to the second category of dust dealt with by section 47 (1), "namely, 'a substantial quantity of dust of any kind,' the "position is this: such a quantity of dust is given off in the "moulding shop when the following operations are carried on" —"Such a quantity," at that point in his judgment, clearly means a substantial quantity—"(i) The removal of certain steel "grids embedded in the mould. This takes place after casting

C. A.
1955
GREGSON v. HICK HARGREAVES & CO. LD.
Singleton L.J.

"and while the mould is still warm. The removal of these "grids breaks part of the mould and dust ensues. The heat of "the mould causes this dust to rise vertically and most of it "escapes through the roof windows. (ii) The breaking down "of the mould by manual labour after casting has taken place "and the mould is no longer required for similar castings. "(iii) The tipping up by a crane of the heavy steel plate on "which the mould was originally built up. This is the final stage "of the breaking-up operation and it gets rid of the residue of "the debris of the mould in one operation, on to what is called "a dust ruck. All these operations take place in the moulding "shop."

Thus Donovan J. found that in each of those three operations there was given off a substantial quantity of dust. The question which arises is: Did the defendants take all practicable measures to protect the persons employed against inhalation of the dust? One measure which can be taken is to provide a mask which would cover the nose and the mouth of the person employed, and which would thus prevent inhalation of the dust. Mr. Atkinson submitted that the persons who were near or within range of the place at which the dust was given off in any one of the processes I have mentioned ought to have been provided with and made to use masks, or at least ought to have been warned and directed not to remain near the place at which the substantial quantity of dust was given off.

The judge dealt with the three occasions on which dust in his view would be given off in substantial quantities in this way[3]: "The measures which the defendants took to protect "workpeople against inhaling the aforesaid dust were these. "When the steel grids were being removed from the mould, "masks were provided for and were worn by the men doing "this job. To these masks a tube some 30 feet long was fitted, "and the other end of the tube usually tied to a stanchion some "five or six feet from the ground, the idea being that the "worker should breathe uncontaminated air. So far as anyone "could tell, this was the result. This mask and tube were "primarily a protection against fumes which were released when "the grid was taken away from the casting, though they served "to protect against the inhalation of dust as well. Due to the "heat, any one man could work only two minutes or so at this "job and would then be relieved by another moulder who would "wear the same mask, as a rule, as the man he relieved. "While waiting to take their turns, the other moulders would "stand around the job, and one of the plaintiff's contentions "is that they were not protected at all while so waiting. I am "satisfied that no such moulder was ever inconvenienced by "dust while so waiting. There were no complaints. The dust, "as I say, rose vertically with the heat and the waiting moulders

" were free to stand where they liked while awaiting their turn " at the work of dislodging the grids." There were six moulders employed; at one point it was suggested that there were six standing in the vicinity at the same time, and I am not sure whether the total number of moulders was six or eight. Two moulders at one time went down inside the mould, and the others were waiting nearby. A considerable quantity of dust was given off, as the evidence shows, when the grids were pulled up. The grids are pulled out by a crane. Mr. Gregson, the plaintiff, was asked some questions upon this, and he said that two men would go down, they could only remain there for about two minutes; they took it in turns, and when the other men were waiting their turn they would be standing a few yards away. It would appear that the next two men had to be near so that when the first two men had done their two minutes turn and came up they would be ready to go down. If a substantial quantity of dust was given off by the operation of pulling up the grids, it is obvious that the men would be in some risk of inhaling dust unless some precautions were taken. The two men who were down in the mould were provided with masks; those who were standing near were not provided with masks, nor were they given any instructions, so far as I can find from the evidence, that they should keep some distance away so as to be out of range of the substantial quantity of dust. No precaution was taken to prevent them inhaling dust, apart from the fact that the premises were ventilated. They were found by the learned judge to have been well ventilated, although it is a fact that soon after this trouble arose a better and more elaborate system of ventilation was introduced. It is said by Mr. Nelson that practicable means had been taken by way of ventilation. In my view it would have been possible for the employers to take further steps than that, and their duty to take all practicable measures in such circumstances would include either the provision of masks for those men who were waiting by, or instructions to the men who were waiting to keep away from the place where the substantial quantity of dust was given off until it had gone. They did not take those steps, and it appears to me that, in that respect, they did not fulfil that which was their duty under the statute. The judge said [3]: " While waiting to " take their turns, the other moulders would stand around the " job, and one of the plaintiff's contentions is that they were " not protected at all while so waiting. I am satisfied that " no such moulder was ever inconvenienced by dust while so " waiting."

It is a little difficult to see how far that finding goes, though it is right to say upon the evidence that there was nothing to show inconvenience, or it may be that no one had complained of inconvenience at that stage; but the duty under the statute is to take all practicable measures to protect the persons employed against inhalation of the dust. It appears to me that there were further practicable measures which could have been taken, such as were mentioned in some of the evidence which was given, in particular in that of Mr. Hepburn, a witness who had been a factory inspector at one time and chairman of a joint standing committee in connection with foundries to review problems in the industry. Mr. Hepburn was asked: "In 1938 "what form of masks were there available and recommended "for use?" and he answered: "In 1938 the Factory Depart- "ment approved a new and important type of respirator which "was developed by the Ministry of Supply and a registration "number was taken out. It was approved after the most "exhaustive tests had been carried out"; he added that it was the Mark IV respirator, which he said is still in use although it has been slightly improved. Then he was asked: "Was a "mask of that type available to the ordinary employer? (A.) "In 1938 it was put on the market and the staff of factory "inspectors were instructed to advise people to get it." In another part of his evidence he said: "I do not think it would "be bearable to wear it continuously, but certainly it should be "worn for short periods." In cross-examination he was asked: "When you speak about respirators being approved by the "Ministry in 1938, what were they approved for? (A.) They "were approved for the purpose of preventing the wearer from "breathing dust into the lungs, which would be injurious to "health. (Q.) Well, now, did the Ministry, or the department "who approved them, recommend their use in iron foundries "in 1938 and from that time onwards? (A.) Yes, the Chief "Inspector gave approval of them"—and then he said that it was the Home Office who recommended them. He was further cross-examined as to the difficulty of using them and he said: "It was part of a policy for factory inspectors to recommend "respirators to firms for the use of their workers to prevent "them from breathing this dust"—and a little later he added: "I should say they have all been advised at some time or other "by an inspector of factories." Later he said he did appreciate that there were difficulties if a man had to wear a Mark IV mask the whole day. Mr. Nelson, on behalf of the defendants, put to him: "I noticed you said yesterday that it is not to "wear all day long? (A.) I suppose not, no. It is meant to "cover periods where the dust is excessive and is not being "removed by general ventilation. (Q.) You see, in this case "we have been told that the dust, or rather the knock-out, "would continue for as long as two days. (A.) There is nothing "to prevent a man from wearing it for two days. It is so "designed as to give very little resistance to breathing, and "for that purpose you will notice that there is a double filter "on it, whereas the usual patterns up to that date had just a "single canister fitting. The whole principle of this respirator

"is a large breathing area for settling in the air so as to give "as little resistance." In further answers he said: "I am "suggesting that it is for the use primarily of those people who "are near to the dust exposure," and he was asked: "Such "as the labourers who are doing the work? (A.) And that the "other dust that is in the atmosphere—floating in the atmo-"sphere of the foundry—should be dealt with by good circulation "of air as required by section 4. (Q.) I think it sounds as though "you are agreeing with the suggestion I was going to make. "It would be absurd to suggest that the plaintiff at one end "of this loam moulding shop should wear a mask while the "labourers, some half of the way down the shed are knocking "out? (A.) I would not suggest that for one moment. (Q.) It "is not practicable? (A.) Oh, yes, it is practicable to wear it." Another answer he gave was: "If the ventilation of the whole "was not adequate then the alternative practical means was "the wearing of a respirator. (Q.) In this case what you are "saying is that the real trouble here was that the ventilation "was not adequate? (A.) It was not adequate, in my opinion, "but at the same time, from the evidence we have heard that "six men were standing waiting their turn to go down into "this core, they would be as much exposed to this dust as a "man inside, because the casting is hot at the time and the "hot air rises up above just like the position I am in standing "here. The core is like this and the men are standing round "and they get the dust round them." I would add that the defendants' foreman, Mr. Hardman, when he gave evidence, said that the men who were waiting would be fairly near. Furthermore, it was not suggested by the defendants that the Mark IV respirator, or some other form of mask, would not be a help against the inhalation of dust.

It appears to me rather as though these employers, and no doubt other employers, looked upon this branch of the Factories Act as creating a duty only to provide against dust or fume or other impurity of such a character and to such an extent as to be likely to be injurious; they did not realise that the dust which was given off in their factory contained silica. The protection given by the Act is not only against impure dust or fume, but there is protection to be given against inhalation if any substantial quantity of dust of any kind is given off. Here there was a substantial quantity of dust given off, and the provision of a Mark IV respirator or a mask of a similar kind would have been something which would have helped to prevent this workman inhaling dust.

The judge in dealing with the second operation said[4]: "As "regards the breaking down of a mould when no longer required, "this was done by labourers and not by moulders. The "labourers were not made to wear masks, though they were "available, nor were the labourers pressed to wear them. If "the plaintiff had been a labourer who had had to do this work, " different considerations might arise. But as a moulder the " plaintiff was 60 to 70 yards from where this process, known " as 'knocking off,' was done and there was nothing to suggest " that any dust was reaching him and being inhaled by him." Thus the learned judge recognized that different considerations would arise if the plaintiff had been a labourer who had to break down the mould. It seems that he would find that the labourers, in such circumstances, should be provided with masks while doing the breaking down, for there was a substantial quantity of dust given off when that was being done, and it was the duty of the employers to take all practicable measures to protect those employed by them against inhalation of the dust. But Donovan J. thought that that did not apply to the plaintiff, who was a moulder, because, according to his view of the evidence, the plaintiff was 60 to 70 yards from the place at which the operation known as knocking off was done, and there was nothing to suggest that any dust was reaching him and being inhaled by him.

When Mr. Hardman, the foreman of the shop and the responsible official with the defendants, was asked about these three operations he gave some answers which I propose to read. He was asked first about the easing of the bars and the pulling out of the grids, and he agreed that there was a substantial quantity of dust given off then. He was asked: " The next " stage is the knocking off process "—that is the second process I have mentioned—" and is it right that with the big castings " the labourers come and knock to pieces the main part of the " mould actually in the pit where the casting has been done? " (A.) They break it down in the pit where it has been done. " (Q.) And that is, of course 10 or 15 feet from where a moulder " is working at some other job? (A.) Yes, approximately "—10 or 15 feet, the defendants' foreman said. It may be that Donovan J. had not a note of that part of the evidence, for in his judgment he says[4]: " But as a moulder the plaintiff was " 60 to 70 yards from where this process, known as 'knocking " ' off,' was done." That may have had something to do with the conclusion at which the learned judge arrived.

The witness was asked further: " (Q.) And then labourers " come in with crowbars and pick-axes, do they not? (A.) No " picks, only spades and crowbars. (Donovan J.): Is the casting " still inside the mould at this stage? (Mr. Fenton Atkinson): " Yes, the casting is still inside, is it not? (A.) Yes. (Q.) This " is only a small mould, but I suppose three or four of them set " to work and they bash it to pieces with these implements they " have got? (A.) Yes. (Q.) That must give a substantial " quantity of dust? (A.) It does in a way, but we must not " forget that the men who are doing the job do not like the dust " and naturally they keep it down as much as they possibly can,

" and you will hear them argue 'Keep that dust down, boys.' " (Q.) They grouse about the dust, do they? (A.) Between themselves; never complain to me about it. (Q.) I know there is a " difference between private grousing and official complaint. " (A.) Yes. (Q.) But amongst themselves they regard it as a " pretty dusty job? (A.) Yes, to be honest, yes. (Q.) I suppose " you will say there is a substantial quantity of dust given off " at that stage? (A.) There is some given off. (Q.) That is a " very mild way of describing it? (A.) Well, substantial—can be. " (Q.) At any rate, the moulders who are not doing the job " themselves may be working quite close enough to get the dust? " (A.) They could. (Q.) Very often would be? (A.) Well, very " often would only be once in six weeks. (Q.) But this breaking " up goes on for how long, several hours? (A.) It takes up one " complete day to strip the outside of that mould, from half-past " 7 until 7 o'clock in the evening. (Q.) Then the rubble, or " whatever I should call it, which is left when the labourers have " broken up the mould at the pit is loaded into tubs, is it not, " and transported to your dirt ruck by the crane? (A.) The " material is put in the tubs and taken away as they are breaking " it down. (Q.) And it is going on all the time? (A.) All the " time, yes. (Q.) And that you agree, is one of the things " that gives rise to dust when the tubs are tipped out? " (A.) Yes. (Q.) I suppose shovelling the material into the tubs " will give rise to a substantial amount of dust, will it not, and " then there are the later stages of the process carrying it to— " do you call it the dirt ruck? (A.) Yes." Later the witness was asked: " (Q.) Was there one large pit approximately 50 feet " from the dirt ruck? (A.) Yes. (Q.) In which castings were " cast? (A.) Yes, one large pit will be about 50 feet from the " dirt ruck. (Q.) Is that a place where the plaintiff would " frequently have to work? (A.) He would work there if he was " making castings that would require to go into that pit." And later again: " (Q.) At any rate, are we agreed so far that at " varying stages of the operation with these big castings, a " substantial amount of dust was given off? (A.) Yes." The foreman's evidence agreed to some extent with the plaintiff's evidence as to the different processes, and with the estimate of time that the plaintiff gave for these different processes. The plaintiff has said that the men inside the mould who had to get the grids away would be occupied on that work for most of the day, and that the knocking off, or the breaking up process, would take two days or more.

If the plaintiff was employed, as Mr. Hardman said, 10 or 15 feet from the place where the knocking off was going on, it is quite a different thing to being employed 60 or 70 yards from it. If it was necessary, in the judge's view, for the labourers to be protected by the provision of respirators or masks, equally, I should have thought, precautions ought to have been taken in respect of a moulder who was perhaps 10 or 15 feet away; he ought to have been provided with a mask or he ought to have been warned of the risk and told to keep out of the way when the concentration of dust was heavy; but it was not regarded by his employers as necessary to provide him with a mask or to give him any particular warning.

The same applies, as I think, to the third process, the final tipping, as to which the judge said[5]: "With regard to the "final tipping of the plate, this is the operation which gives off "most dust. It takes place about twice a month, and when it "was being done the doors were opened and the moulders were "sent out of the shop until the resulting cloud of dust—which "at times might fill the whole shop for a few moments—had "dispersed. It was, whenever possible, done on a Saturday "morning, when few moulders were in the shop." It does appear from that passage in the judgment that more precautions were taken when that was done than during either of the other processes which I have mentioned. "The doors were opened "and the moulders were sent out"—that was questioned upon the evidence, but the judge found that "the moulders were sent "out of the shop until the resulting cloud of dust—which at times "might fill the whole shop for a few moments—had dispersed." There is nothing to show who told the men when they could come back. However, the work was done, when possible, on a Saturday morning when there were few moulders about.

It is upon those three processes which were carried out in the shop that Mr. Atkinson, on behalf of the plaintiff, submits that it is clearly shown that the defendants did not perform their duty under the statute. Mr. Atkinson submitted that in relation to each of the processes, if a moulder was near the work which was being done, he ought to have been provided with a mask; a mask is something which is recognized as preventing, or at least lessening, the risk of inhalation; and he added that if employers have in their shop a process which gives off any substantial quantity of dust of any kind they are under a duty to take all practicable measures to protect the persons employed against inhalation of the dust. They ought, he submitted, to provide masks; furthermore, they ought to have taken some steps to warn the men not to be near the accumulation of dust which was there at a particular time, and here neither of those things was done. Upon the judge's findings in the early part of his judgment, upon the admission as to the plaintiff's illness, and the finding as to the cause of it, Mr. Atkinson submitted that the judgment ought to have been in favour of the plaintiff. He said it was clear that the plaintiff's illness was caused by inhalation of dust, and that the defendants could not be heard to say that their breach of the statute was not the cause of the damage; in other words, he submitted that once there was proved a breach of the statute, followed by damage of a kind which the section is designed to prevent, the onus was then upon the defendants to show, if they could, that if they had taken all practicable measures the damage would not have occurred. He added that the defendants did no such thing; they called no medical evidence, and upon the findings of the judge there ought to have been judgment for the plaintiff.

Mr. Nelson, on the other hand, submitted that upon the evidence as a whole it was shown that the defendants had taken all practicable measures to prevent the inhalation of dust. He said that the two men who had to go inside the mould in order to get out the grids were provided with masks; furthermore the defendants watered their floor, and when the tipping process was going on the men were sent out, and that work was done as a rule on a Saturday morning. He submitted that that showed that the defendants had taken all practicable measures to prevent inhalation of the dust. He drew our attention to the fact that Mr. Hepburn, the witness for the plaintiff, said that masks or respirators were for use primarily by people who were near to the dust, and that is quite right. No one could successfully contend upon this evidence that if there was given off a considerable quantity of dust at one end of this 100 yards long shop, everyone down to the other end of the shop should be provided with a mask. Against that, if there be workmen quite near to the point at which a substantial quantity of dust is given off, there is a duty to take all practicable measures to prevent their inhaling the dust. They are at risk because they are near; they are near because of the nature of their work, they have to be there, and the duty upon the employers is to take all practicable measures. Those measures appear to me to include a warning to the men to keep away while the substantial quantity of dust is there and, I think, the provision of respirators or masks for the men who have to be close to the place at which the substantial quantity of dust is given off, and the men ought to be instructed to wear their masks at that time.

I recognize that that places a considerable obligation upon the defendants. I understand they are now undertaking that duty. It was argued at one time that they ought not to be found to have so high a duty upon them, because no one knew of the risk of silica in this class of work, but that question to my mind does not arise. On the latter part of the section on which Mr. Atkinson relies, he is entitled to say there was given off a substantial quantity of dust, and thus the employers were under a duty to take all practicable measures to protect the plaintiff and others employed against inhalation of the dust. I am inclined to think that Donovan J. might have taken a different view except for the mistake in the distance in one case, on the defendants' own admission. I see no difference between the position of a labourer engaged in the second process and that of a moulder who is working 10 or 15 feet away from that labourer. As Mr. Nelson has said, it is really a question of degree. I am satisfied upon this evidence that the defendants did not fulfil the duty they owed to this workman under section 47 of the Factories Act, 1937. I am further satisfied upon this evidence that the court ought to hold that the damage which accrued to the plaintiff arose from that breach. It follows that, in my opinion, the appeal ought to be allowed and judgment be entered for the plaintiff.

HARGREAVES

JENKINS L.J. I agree. It is clear that the defendants' iron foundry was, within the meaning of section 47 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, a factory in which a process was carried on, namely, the process of moulding, in connexion with which substantial quantities of dust were given off. It follows that, as from the commencement of the Factories Act, 1937, the defendants were under a statutory duty to their workmen employed on this moulding process to take all practicable measures to protect them against inhalation of the dust. The question in this case is whether the defendants have discharged their statutory duty in that regard to the plaintiff, a man who was employed as one of their moulders.

The judge came to the conclusion, if I understand him correctly, that the defendants had in fact already taken all practicable measures, and that there was nothing further they could be called upon to do under the section. In reaching that conclusion the judge described the three stages or phases in the moulding process which produced significant quantities of dust, and he dealt with them in this way: The first was the easing process, which involved two men having to go into the mould to break out the grids. As to that, the judge pointed out that the two men who were actually working in the mould were equipped with respirators, and as to the others he said that the dust produced rose vertically and that these men need stand no nearer than they chose to the source of the dust. As regards the second process, the knocking out process, which undoubtedly produced a great deal of dust, the judge thought that moulders at all events, as distinct from labourers, were not affected by that because it took place 60 or 70 yards away. As my Lord has pointed out, that distance is inaccurate, and on the evidence of Mr. Hardman, the defendants' foreman, the defendants cannot put it higher than, say, 20 feet away. Finally, there was the tipping up process, which was the end of the knocking out. In that case, as the learned judge observed, the men were told to leave the shop, the doors were opened, and the men were supposed to stay outside until the dust, which for the time being filled the foundry, had settled or dispersed.

As to the precautions taken in these three stages, speaking for myself I can only regard those taken in the third as adequate. As the plaintiff pointed out with regard to the easing off, the men waiting while two of their number were inside the mould breaking out the grids, could not be far away because they would be wanted to take their turn. The judge's reference to the dust going up vertically came from Mr. Hardman's evidence, but other witnesses described it differently. The plaintiff and another man named Gregory, gave evidence to the effect that the dust spread about a great deal, and the plaintiff's expert, Mr. Hepburn, said that the dust came up and diffused and there was no strong current of air. In my view, it is impossible to hold that in this easing off operation the dust rose in a course so completely vertical, and with such rapidity, that a person standing within a few yards of the ascending dust was not exposed to any risk of inhalation.

Accordingly, in my view, there were at least two phases in this moulding process which did involve exposing the workmen, and, in particular, the moulders, such as the plaintiff was, to the inhalation of dust; and, with respect to those two phases of the process at least, it cannot, in my view, be said that all practicable measures were taken to protect the men against the inhalation of dust.

It follows, in my view, that this appeal should succeed. In reaching a contrary conclusion, the judge seems to have founded himself to some extent on the fact that the injurious constituent in the dust produced in an iron foundry is what is known as free silica, which consists of minute fractured particles of sand, the presence of which in iron foundry dust has only recently become known. The judge, taking the view that all practicable measures had been taken against the dust which the defendants could see, or of the existence of which they knew, came to the conclusion that they could not be held liable for damage done by the silica dust, which was treated by him as a distinct and invisible cloud of minute particles. With respect to him, I think it is wrong for the present purpose to treat the silica dust as separate from the rest. No one, I apprehend, would suggest that under section 47 employers such as the defendants are required to guard against elements the existence of which is unknown and the presence of which cannot be detected. The defendants' duty under the second branch of the section is to protect against dust so far as practicable. That, as it seems to me, means to protect against the ordinary, visible, dust arising in the course of the foundry operations. Once it became known that there was some other noxious element produced by the process, it would be their duty under the first branch of the section to guard against it; but, prima facie, as matters stood at all events in 1938, their duty was simply to prevent so far as practicable the inhalation of dust, that is to say, the dust manifestly produced by their moulding operations. In my judgment, however, if they had taken all practicable measures to prevent the inhalation of that dust, the result in all probability would have been to protect the plaintiff against the injurious element in that dust in the shape of free silica, even though the presence of that injurious element may not have been known.

v.
HICK HARGREAVES & CO. LD.
Jenkins L.J.

As my Lord has observed, the section is divided into two branches, the first of which refers to "any dust or fume or other "impurity of such a character and to such extent as to be "likely to be injurious or offensive to the persons employed," whilst the second branch, with which we are here concerned, deals simply with dust of any kind, and provides that where there is "any substantial quantity of dust of any kind, all practicable "measures shall be taken to protect the persons employed against "inhalation of the dust."

Cases of this sort may be said to bear to some extent heavily on employers, certainly cases covering periods, say up to 1950, because it has only comparatively lately become known that the dust produced in an iron foundry contains this noxious constituent in the shape of free silica; but their duty is clearly set out in section 47. It is to take all practicable measures to protect their workpeople from the inhalation of dust, and their duty to do that does not depend on the question whether the dust is known or believed to be noxious or not.

I will only add in conclusion one word about a submission made by Mr. Nelson with regard to the damages. He pointed out that the plaintiff had been employed as a moulder by the defendants and others for a considerable number of years before 1934, and for a still greater number of years down to the commencement, in 1938, of the Factories Act of 1937, which created the statutory duty sued upon. Mr. Nelson pointed out that silicosis is a disease which is produced by contact with free silica, involving more or less continuous contact over a long period, and he invited us to infer merely from the dates that this plaintiff had already contracted silicosis in 1938. There was, so far as I have been able to discover, no medical or other evidence whatever to show from what time the plaintiff's disability should be treated as having begun. It is a matter upon which we cannot speculate; we cannot treat it as progressing by degrees from year to year from the moment of his first employment in an iron foundry. I take it that the length of time required to contract this disease, and the progress made by the disease when contracted, must vary greatly from case to case, and it is impossible for us, without any evidence, to come to any conclusion on the matter. In my view the damages should be dealt with on the footing that the plaintiff's disability is wholly attributable to the period of his employment with the defendants.

PARKER L.J. I have come to the same conclusion. I confess that I have considerable sympathy with the employers in this case. Until the plaintiff became ill, they did not know, and it was not suggested that they ought to have known, that the dust which was given off in the course of certain processes carried on in their factory was injurious. They had no reason to think it would do more than to cause some discomfort if the workmen got too close to it. Thus, to a large extent they left it to the workmen to stay away from any concentration of dust and, where this was impossible, as in the case of the men going down into the mould, they provided masks, and in the case of the tipping of the plate they got the workmen to leave the building. They were, as the judge found, enlightened employers, anxious to introduce all possible amenities for their workmen, and who, if the workmen complained, would have sought to remedy the position.

However that may be, the sole question here is whether they have, on the facts of this case, fulfilled their duty under the statute, it being clear that in, at any rate, three processes a substantial quantity of dust was given off. Their duty under section 47, in those circumstances, was to take all reasonable measures to protect the workmen against inhalation. The meaning of the word "practicable" has been discussed in several recent cases. The introduction of the word, as qualifying the measures to be taken, clearly negatives an absolute duty to protect against inhalation, since only measures which, in the light of current knowledge, are feasible can be regarded as practicable. Nevertheless, it seems to me that the words "practicable "measures," as opposed to the other expression to be found in the Act "so far as is reasonably practicable," imports a high duty.

The learned judge, as I understand him, is saying this: Having regard to the ventilation provided, and having regard to the position in which the men were allowed to work, they were not inhaling dust given off in substantial quantities in those three processes, and accordingly no special or further measures were called for. He appears to treat the dust, which has turned out to be dangerous and which is in fact of such fine particles as to be invisible, as something apart from what may be called the visible dust. Thus he says this[6]: "Then, unhappily, the truth "became known that some invisible dust must have remained "in the atmosphere and was of such a kind that breathing it "over a long period of years, albeit in small quantities, had "produced silicosis in the plaintiff." Speaking for myself, I do not think on the evidence that such a view was justified. Upon that point, Mr. Rogers, who was an expert called by the defendants, was asked this question by Mr. Nelson in re-examination: "You said that it is not the breathing of this visible dust which "constitutes the danger of silicosis, it is some other dust? "(A.) Yes, it is the breathing of the dust which is less than five "microns in size, which is the dust you cannot see. (Q.) Which "is not visible? (A.) It is not a heavy dust. It does not fall in "still air, it does not fall at any appreciable rate and, conse-"quently, if you have any current of air out of the building at "all it will get carried on that current." So it would appear to

C. A.
1955
GREGSON v. HICK HARGREAVES & CO. LD.
Parker L.J.

be the case that if the ventilation in the foundry was proper—and there is a finding here that it was—then this invisible dust would be carried out with the current of air. But the matter does not quite rest there, because Mr. Rogers was further questioned by the learned judge and he was asked: "Therefore, "I suppose, if you reduce the amount which is inhaled you reduce "the risk of silicosis? (A.) Yes. As far as I understand the "conditions, to get a dangerous atmosphere you have to have "something of the order of 2,000 particles of silica or dust per "cubic centimetre. In other words, it has to be a fairly sub-"stantial dust cloud." It seems to me, therefore, that the danger in fact was that a man would be within range of substantial quantities of visible dust given off in one of these processes, and that in inhaling the dust he would be inhaling some of this dangerous silica. The facts in this case show that the plaintiff must have so inhaled.

The learned judge, as I think, was misled in the passage to which my Lord has referred when he said that in the knocking off process, which is the occasion for the breach on which Mr. Atkinson so strongly relies, the moulders (of whom the plaintiff was one) were 60 to 70 yards away. It is quite clear, as the defendants' foreman himself said, that in the case of heavy castings a moulder might well be within 10 to 20 feet. Mr. Nelson rather suggested that that was probably a rare occurrence, but on the evidence of the foreman, as I read it, it was something which regularly occurred every six weeks when one of these very large castings was knocked off, and when it did occur it occupied no less than two days. If the learned judge had had that passage in the evidence in mind, it appears to me that he might well have thought—as, indeed, he envisaged in the case of the labourers—that such a moulder ought to have some protection. The obvious protection that leaps to the mind is a mask, or that the men should be asked to move to a different part of the factory whilst the knocking off process was taking place.

Once that position is reached, and once it is shown that the defendants are in breach, it seems to me that the onus is then upon them to show that no practicable step would have prevented the damage. As regards that, as I have said, the provision of a mask is the obvious measure. There was no suggestion in this case that any mask, other than a Mark IV mask, would have been used if a mask had to be provided for this purpose; and, although no direct evidence was given, it seems to have been assumed, if only by the absence of cross-examination of Mr. Hepburn, that a Mark IV mask would have prevented the inhalation of these very small particles.

Mr. Nelson did advance the argument that, even if his clients were liable, this was merely a case of aggravation of a disease which must have existed before July 1, 1938. It is sufficient to say with regard to that argument that there are no facts found and no evidence upon which that argument can be advanced.

Before leaving the case, I would like to say that in my view there is considerable unreality in these cases, in that nobody can possibly tell whether a mask, if provided, will ever be worn. Those who have had experience of these cases are always having evidence put before them that even when a danger is appreciated by employers and workpeople alike, it is almost impossible to get the men to wear the masks which are provided. Where, as in this case, no danger was appreciated by anybody, it may well be almost impossible to get the workmen to wear them. But, the onus being on the defendants, once a breach is proved, and there being no evidence in this case as to whether a mask would or would not be worn, it is impossible to speculate as to what would happen. By the defendants' breach the plaintiff has never had the opportunity of choosing whether he will or will not wear a mask. For these reasons, as well as for the reasons given by my Lords, I would allow this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

A testator by his will provided: ". . . I give my residuary "estate . . . to the trustees of the benevolent fund of the S. Club "upon trust to be used by them as they shall in their absolute "discretion think fit for the assistance of any of my fellow members "by way of pensions or grants who may fall on evil days. . . . On a summons to determine, inter alia, the validity or otherwise of the gift to the trustees of the club, it was argued that the gift failed because members of the club were not to be regarded as a part of the public, and it was not therefore a valid charitable trust:—

YOUNG, DECD., In re. WESTMINSTER BANK LD. v. STERLING.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

The testator, Ernest Young, who died on February 10, 1952, by his will dated August 19, 1946, after appointing Westminster Bank Ld. to be the executor and trustee thereof, gave all his property of whatsoever nature and kind and wheresoever situate unto his executor upon trust for sale and conversion with the exception of his copyrights and royalties, to invest the proceeds of sale and to collect the periodical payments in respect of his copyrights and royalties and add the payments in respect thereof to the capital of his estate ("the residuary estate"). The testator directed the "income and produce" of the residuary estate to be paid to his brother "William John Young and my "sister Kathleen Hilda Young in equal moieties for their respec- "tive lives and the life of the survivor," and subject to the life interests aforesaid the testator gave his residuary estate "to the "trustees of the benevolent fund of the Savage Club, 1, Carlton "House Terrace, London, S.W.1, upon trust to be used by them "as they shall in their absolute discretion think fit for the "assistance of any of my fellow members by way of pensions or "grants who may fall on evil days."

Clause 8 of the will provided: "In the event of the Savage "Club at the time of my death not being in existence or ceasing "to exist at any time after my death subject to the life interest "of my said brother and sister I give my residuary estate "subject to any pensions which may have been granted by the "Savage Club and secured thereon to the trustees of the pensions "fund of the Incorporated Society of Authors, Playwrights and "Composers. . . ."

The testator was a widower leaving neither father nor mother nor issue surviving him. His brother named in the will predeceased him. His sister died on November 1, 1952. So far as had been ascertained the testator left no brother or sister surviving him except Kathleen Hilda Young, and no descendants of any dead brothers or sisters.

The residuary estate of the testator was of the value of £17,900, or thereabouts.

The Savage Club was an old and well-known club in Carlton House Terrace. The testator was at the date of his death and had been for many years before a member of the Savage Club.

The plaintiff bank took out the present summons for the determination, inter alia, of the question whether the gift of the testator's residuary estate to the trustees for the time being of the benevolent fund of the Savage Club was (a) a good and valid charitable gift, or (b) for reasons of remoteness or otherwise was in whole or part invalid.

Wilfrid Waite for the plaintiff bank.

W. J. Mowbray for the trustees of the Savage Club benevolent fund.

R. J. S. Thompson (F. B. Alcock with him) for those claiming an intestacy.

In re Whorwood,* not referred to in the judgment, was cited in argument.

DANCKWERTS J. stated the facts and continued: It has been argued on behalf of those who claim on intestacy that the gift to the trustees of the benevolent fund of the Savage Club fails on the ground that it is not a valid charitable trust because the members of the Savage Club are not to be regarded as a part of the public so as to make it a public charitable trust.

In In re Compton[1] the Court of Appeal treated what are known as "the poor relations cases" as an exception to the general rule that charitable trusts to be valid must confer benefits upon the public or a portion thereof. In those cases, which are of some antiquity, gifts by testators in favour of poor relations have been held to be good, notwithstanding the general proposition to which I have referred. The Court of Appeal suggested, however, that it was not a decision which should be extended. Notwithstanding what was said in the Court of Appeal in that case, in Gibson v. South American Stores (Gath & Chaves) Ld.,[2] the Court of Appeal held as a valid charitable gift a gift for the relief of poverty in respect of the employees of a limited company.

I am unable to see what distinction there is in principle between a gift of that nature to the employees of a limited company and a similar gift to the members of a club. It is a members' club which seems to constitute a class bound together by as much the same principles in the one case as in the other. The words "for the assistance of any of my fellow members by "way of pensions or grants who may fall on evil days" are plainly for the relief of poverty. Accordingly, it seems to me that this is a valid charitable trust, as was the trust in Gibson's case.[2]

As regards the meaning of the words "of my fellow members," it is perfectly true that if those words were given their narrowest meaning the benefit of the bequest would be confined to the members of the Savage Club who were members of the club either at the date of the testator's will or possibly at the date of his death; but I do not think that the testator was using these words in that limited sense but in the broader sense of the members who are members of the club "to which I belong." It seems to me that that is clearly indicated in clause 8, where the gift over takes effect not on the final demise of the survivors of the members who were members when he died, or anything

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Cruelty—Acts of cruelty after cohabitation has ceased—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 25), s. 1 (1).

A husband who left his wife in 1950 assaulted her on two occasions in 1952, once when he returned temporarily to the matrimonial home and once when he met her in the street:—

Held, that the assaults constituted cruelty for the purposes of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, irrespective of the fact that they took place after cohabitation had ceased.

Passage in Rayden on Divorce, 6th ed., p. 523, that "Acts of "cruelty which have taken place after cohabitation has ceased may "be taken into account provided they are within the ambit of the "marital relationship," based on dicta of Lord Merrivale P. in Simcock v. Simcock [1932] P. 94, 96; 48 T.L.R. 374 explained.

Appeal from Judge Charlesworth, sitting as a special commissioner in divorce at Newcastle-upon-Tyne County Court.

A husband and wife were married in 1938, but in 1950 the husband left the matrimonial home. In August, 1952, he arrived without warning to spend the night in the home, but the wife left when he arrived. When she returned on the following day to fetch her necessaries, he assaulted her and then went away. In September of the same year he assaulted her as she was getting off a bus. He then disappeared and she had no further knowledge of his whereabouts.

In 1954 the wife filed a petition for divorce on the grounds of cruelty, and alleged that there had been acts of cruelty prior to the husband's departure in 1950, as well as the acts complained of in 1952 after he had ceased to live with her. She asked for the exercise of the court's discretion in respect of her own adultery. The petition was not defended.

The county court judge, on April 13, 1955, said that the cruelty alleged could be divided into two sections, cruelty until the middle of 1950 and cruelty thereafter. He found that no cruelty had been proved up to 1950; but while finding that the acts of cruelty in 1952 were proved, and saying that if they had occurred when the parties were living together he would have held that they constituted cruelty, he decided (on the basis of observations by Lord Merrivale P. in Simcock v. Simcock,[1] and a passage in Rayden on Divorce (6th ed., p. 523) that "Acts of "cruelty which have taken place after cohabitation has ceased "may be taken into account provided they are within the ambit "of the marital relationship"), that the acts complained of could not be said to be cruelty for the purposes of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950. He accordingly dismissed the wife's petition, but added that, if he had held otherwise, he would have exercised his discretion in the wife's favour.

The wife appealed.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgments.

DENNING L.J. The parties married in 1938, when they were both very young, and they had two children, born in 1939 and 1941. They finally separated in 1950, when the husband left the home. His wife said that he had been very cruel to her before they separated; but her evidence on that point was not corroborated and the commissioner was not prepared to act on it; but after he had left the house, he came back in August, 1952, and he then struck her such a blow that it gave her a black eye and injured her. He hit her also on meeting her in an omnibus in September, 1952. Her evidence as to the assaults on those occasions was corroborated by an inspector of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, who saw the marks on her; and, further, the inspector saw the husband and wife together about the previous charges of cruelty, which the husband then did not deny.

The commissioner said that he was not satisfied as to the cruelty before they separated in 1950; but he was satisfied that there were these assaults and blows in 1952, after they had separated. Nevertheless, he held that that was not a sufficient ground for divorce. He based himself on a passage in Rayden on Divorce (6th ed., p. 523), which states "Acts of cruelty "which have taken place after cohabitation has ceased may "be taken into account provided they are within the ambit of "the marital relationship." The commissioner, taking that as an accurate statement of the law, held that these two acts of cruelty took place outside the ambit of the marital relationship, and dismissed the petition.

That passage in Rayden is based on some observations made in Simcock v. Simcock [1]—observations which were only obiter dicta and thrown out as a suggestion without much consideration. I do not think that they accurately represent the law. Indeed, there is a decision of Bucknill J. in 1907, Kunski v. Kunski and Josephs,[2] where a judicial separation was granted on the ground of acts of cruelty which had taken place while the parties were separated under a deed. I see no justification in law for introducing the qualification that the acts must take place within the ambit of the marital relationship. The court has simply to inquire, within the words of the statute, whether the husband has treated his wife with cruelty; it does not matter whether it takes place while they are living together or while they are living apart; if he has treated his wife with cruelty, she is entitled to her decree. But that is subject, in the present case, to the fact that she has to admit that after he left she went and lived with another man and had a child by him. That is a matter for the court to consider in the exercise of its discretion, but in this case the commissioner said he would have exercised his discretion. I think that he was quite right in saying so. This husband has disappeared and cannot be traced, and it is only proper that in all the circumstances of the case the discretion should be exercised in the wife's favour.

I think that the appeal should be allowed and the decree nisi granted on the ground of the husband's cruelty, the court exercising its discretion in the wife's favour.

HODSON L.J. I entirely agree. The commissioner was prepared to find cruelty in this case, but thought that he ought not to do so because at the time the assaults in question were committed the parties were living apart; and he was led to take that course through a passage in Rayden which reads: "Acts of cruelty "which have taken place after cohabitation has ceased may be "taken into account provided they are within the ambit of the "marital relationship."

That passage is based on an observation of Lord Merrivale P. in Simcock v. Simcock,[3] in which the Divisional Court had before it an allegation of persistent cruelty, and in that connexion Lord Merrivale said: "It may well be"—it was an obiter dictum—"that, if the husband and wife were living apart and as "to some matter not concerned with the marital relationship "there were acts of violence, it would have to be considered "whether they were acts of violence within the statute, "or whether they would support a charge of persistent cruelty "within the statute; because the statute does undoubtedly deal " with, and is no doubt limited to, the relations of husband and " wife."

As I read that dictum of Lord Merrivale, I think he had in mind the statute with which he was concerned, which had to do with persistent cruelty, and he was wondering whether, if a husband knocked his wife about in the street after he had left her, and had previously assaulted her while they were living together, the husband could then be regarded as persisting in the previous course of conduct. It does not seem to me to support the wide proposition on which the commissioner based his decision, namely, that cruelty as such must be within what is called the ambit of marital relationship.

I agree that the appeal should be allowed. That involves the exercise of the discretion of the court in favour of the petitioner, which the commissioner said he was prepared to do, provided he was justified in finding cruelty in this case.

MORRIS L.J. I entirely agree. I would only add that the passage in Rayden to which reference has been made comes under the heading " Persistent cruelty " only in the part dealing with the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1895 to 1949, and does not come in the part of the volume dealing with questions of dissolution.

Practice and Procedure—Summary procedure under Order 14*—Part of claim—Final judgment signed under Order* 14, r. 1, in respect of part of claim—Plaintiff not entitled to apply for judgment under Order 14, r. 1, in respect of balance of claim—R.S.C., Ord. 3, r. 6, Ord. 14, rr. 1, 4.

The plaintiff had demised to the defendant a manor house and land at a rent of £600 per annum. By special indorsed writ the plaintiff claimed a declaration that the tenancy of the premises had been terminated, possession, £900 rent accrued due to January 21, 1952, damages for use and occupation, and costs. By an order dated August 14, 1952, the plaintiff was granted leave under R.S.C., Ord. 14, r. 1, to sign final judgment for £900 and it was further ordered that execution be stayed, with liberty to restore. In July, 1955, the plaintiff took out a second summons under Order 14 and the master, by an order dated July 26, 1955, granted to the plaintiff leave to sign final judgment for possession of the land, together with mesne profits from June 27, 1952, the date of the issue of the writ, at the rate of £600 per annum until possession and the stay of execution was removed. McNair J. dismissed the defendant's appeal from that order:—

Held, that Order 14, r. 1, did not, on its true construction, contemplate more than one application for summary judgment by a plaintiff (except in cases of mistake or the like or where fresh material was discovered); that a plaintiff could not issue a second summons under Order 14 after there had been final judgment in the action on an earlier summons; and that, except for the purpose of working out the order which had already been obtained on August 15, 1952, the action was then at an end.

Decision of McNair J. reversed.

APPEAL from a decision of McNair J., affirming a decision of Master Burnand.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of Evershed M.R.: This action (1952 S. No. 3081) was started by the plaintiff, Mrs. Joan Emily Stainer, by specially indorsed writ dated June 27, 1952, in accordance with Order 3, r. 6. The statement of claim recited that the plaintiff was the owner of a certain mansion house known as Awbridge Danes, and further recited a series of facts which (so far as relevant) led to this, that the defendant, Mrs. Mildred Tragett, was in possession either under a contract of tenancy or under some similar title, whereby (according to the allegation) she was obliged to pay a rent of £600 per annum, payable in equal half-yearly proportions on July 1 and January 1 in each year. The statement of claim stated (and this was not in issue) that the rateable value of the premises was such as to take it altogether out of the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Acts. The plaintiff then prayed for a declaration, first, that the tenancy had been forfeited or lawfully terminated, the reason being non-payment of the rent alleged; second, for possession of the premises; third, under two of the paragraphs in the claim, for £900, being in effect, 18 months' rent due up to and including January 1, 1952, instalment; and, finally, for damages for use and occupation from the dates therein mentioned. The date of the issue of that writ was June 27, 1952—very shortly before the next rent instalment became due (according to the allegation) on the following July 1.

That writ having having been issued and duly served, the plaintiff then proceeded, on July 28, 1952, to take out a summons under Order 14, r. 1,[1] which summons was as follows: "Upon

[1] R.S.C., Ord. 14, r. 1: "Where "the defendant appears to a writ of "summons specially indorsed with ". . . a statement of claim under "Order 3, r. 6, the plaintiff may on "affidavit made by himself or by any "other person who can swear "positively to the facts, verifying the "cause of action and the amount "claimed (if any liquidated sum is "claimed), and stating that in his "belief there is no defence to the "action except as to the amount of "damages claimed if any, apply to a "judge for liberty to enter judgment "for such remedy or relief as upon "the statement of claim the plaintiff "may be entitled to."

r. 4: "If it appear that the "defence set up by the defendant

"reading the affidavit of George Leopold Lush let all parties "concerned attend the Master in Chambers" on the date mentioned at the time mentioned "on the hearing of an application "on the part of the plaintiff that she be at liberty to sign final "judgment in this action against the defendant for the amount "indorsed on the writ, with interest, if any, and costs." When the matter came on on August 14, 1952, after an adjournment, before Master Lawrence, he (as is the practice in these matters) proceeded to indorse his order as follows: "Judgment for £900. "Execution stayed until leave of this court"; and there followed symbols which clearly meant "Liberty to restore; costs in the "cause; certificate for counsel," and then he initialled it. In accordance with that direction, the plaintiff's solicitors drew up an order which followed the direction, namely, an order for the sum of £900 to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff; but also including directions that execution for the £900 should be stayed till further order, with liberty to the parties to restore, and that the costs of the application be costs in the cause, "save that the "costs of one adjournment be the plaintiff's in any event. "Certificate for counsel."

More than three years had elapsed since November of 1952. So far as litigation between the two parties was concerned, the court was informed that in the intervening time they had not been idle. The defendant had, or suggested that she had, a counterclaim, which, according to the terms of the agreement made between the parties, was a subject-matter for arbitration. Part of the intervening period had been employed on that arbitration. The award has not yet been taken up, because the claimant in the arbitration, the defendant, has been unwilling to pay the necessary fees; and the plaintiff also, perhaps not unnaturally, has been unwilling to pay the fees herself. According to the evidence, no further sums of rent have been paid at all by the defendant; nor has she paid any part of the £900 for which judgment was obtained against her.

The next step was that a notice was served by the plaintiff's solicitors upon the defendant's then solicitors on May 19, 1955: "Take notice that the above-named plaintiff intends to proceed "in this action one month after the date hereof." That was a notice given pursuant to Order 64 and occasioned by the long dormancy of the proceedings. The plaintiff at some stage took to the master the original proceeding, the original summons; she also prepared a fresh summons under Order 14, r. 1, dated July 1, 1955, asking for possession and by way of mesne profits for the equivalent of the rent since June 27, 1952, the date of the issue of the writ. Master Burnand was then of opinion that the plaintiff could not proceed by way of restoration or otherwise, upon the first summons of 1952; and he with his own hand proceeded to amend the second summons by adding to it, after that part of it which related to possession and mesne profits, the words " and that the stay of execution imposed by the order of " August 14, 1952, be removed."

"applies only to a part of the plaintiff's claim, or that any part of his "claim is admitted, the plaintiff shall "have judgment forthwith for such "part of his claim as the defence "does not apply to or as is admitted ". . . . And the defendant may be "allowed to defend as to the residue "of the plaintiff's claim."

In that amended form, that second summons was served upon the defendant; and in due course she, first alone and later by counsel, attended before Master Burnand. It was clear that she was never given any notice of the restoration of the first summons; and the matter with which the master dealt was exclusively the matter raised by the second summons as amended. Upon that summons the order dated July 26, 1955, was made: " It is ordered that the plaintiff be at liberty to sign final judg- " ment in this action for possession of the land . . . Awbridge " Danes " (which was described) " together with mesne profits " at the rate of £600 per annum from June 27, 1952, until " possession " (and that amounted to over £1,800) " and costs to " be taxed." And it was further ordered that the plaintiff should recover against the defendant possession of the land.

The defendant appealed to McNair J. and the point taken on her part was that the original summons and the order made upon it, having regard to their respective terms, exhausted any rights or remedies available to the plaintiff in this action, " 1952, " S. No. 3081," save only so far as it remained available by virtue of the liberty to restore given by Master Lawrence in August, 1952, for the limited purposes for which the liberty had been given. McNair J. rejected that suggestion and on August 2, 1955, dismissed the appeal. He gave the Court of Appeal no reasons for his judgment. The court was informed that a stay of execution having been refused, the plaintiff had regained possession of Awbridge Danes, and that some execution had been levied.

The defendant appealed.

EVERSHED M.R. This appeal has raised a question on the true effect of Order 14, r. 1; and it is perhaps surprising that there is no guidance in the books on the particular matter which has been most discussed before us.

[His Lordship stated the facts, and read R.S.C., Ord. 14, r. 1, and continued:] Mr. Inskip, for the plaintiff, has contended that, according to the language of Order 14, r. 1, the order contemplates (where the writ, strictly speaking, covers more than one cause of action) that a series of applications may be made under Order 14, r. 1, for judgment upon the distinct causes of action, leaving it to the plaintiff to proceed from time to time on all or any of the causes of action at his pleasure. To take an extreme case, if the specially indorsed writ were for six instalments of a debt due on specified past dates of £50 each, totalling £300, the order contemplates (according to the argument) that a plaintiff could take out a summons for final judgment on one instalment and later take out five more applications for judgment on the other five. True it is, in such an extreme case, as Mr. Inskip concedes, that the court might regard the proceeding as being abusive of the court's process; but, so far as the wording of the order is concerned (he says), such a method of attack is inherent in the language.

Mr. Inskip drew attention to the variation in the phrasing, "cause of action," which has to be verified, and "action," and again, "statement of claim"; and, paraphrasing the order, he says that a plaintiff may, in the case I have supposed, where there are, let us say, two separate causes of action strictly so called, verify one of them, state that in his belief there is no defence to either of them, and then apply to the judge for liberty to enter judgment for the remedy or relief to which upon the statement of claim, in so far as it relates to that one of them, the plaintiff may be entitled.

I cannot so read the order. It seems to me, on the face of it, that what is contemplated is that, in the special Order 3, r. 6, cases, for which special provision is made for specially indorsed writs, the rules contemplate that a plaintiff may, if he verifies his cause of action (or, if there is more than one, his causes of action) and that there is no defence to any part of his action, then say to the court: "Give me judgment at once for what "I am entitled to" (that is, "for all I am entitled to") "on "the statement of claim." It may happen that when the matter comes, upon such an application, before the master, the master may think (particularly after any evidence has been filed by the defendant) that there is a defence either to one of the causes of action or to part of the one cause of action. He may then (and so much is clear from rule 4 of Order 14) give judgment for part of the relief claimed and give liberty to the defendant to defend—conditionally or otherwise—upon the other parts of the claim. It is quite clear that what a plaintiff cannot do is, having issued such a writ, then swear an affidavit in effect saying: "Well, " as to part of the claim as a matter of fact the defendant has " got a defence if he chooses to take it; but as to the rest he has " not, and I ask for judgment for that." It has been laid down in Ireland (in the case, for example, of Lord Bellew v. Markey,[1] to which we were directed; and it is stated in the notes in the Annual Practice, 1955, p. 175) that that is a procedure outside the scope and purpose of Order 3, r. 6, and Order 14. You can only invoke these rules, in other words (and Order 14 is confined to cases under Order 3, r. 6) where you can show that at any rate in your belief there is no defence to any of the matters for which you are claiming. Thus it is that, whatever remedy, in the end of all, a plaintiff asks for or may obtain, a condition precedent to an application under Order 14, r. 1, is affidavit evidence verifying " the cause of action," and also stating that in the plaintiff's belief (or the belief of the deponent) there is no defence at all to the action.

The view which I have suggested seems to me strongly borne out by the language of Order 3, r. 6 (1) and (2) itself. Sub-rule (2) provides: " Where a landlord seeks to recover possession " of land, with or without a claim for rent or mesne profits, " against a tenant whose term has expired or has been duly " determined by notice to quit, or has become liable to for- " feiture." Sub-rule (3): " Where the plaintiff seeks to recover " possession of a specific chattel with or without a claim for the " hire thereof or for damages for its detention." Then rule 6 goes on, " the writ of summons may, at the option of the plain- " tiff, be specially indorsed with or accompanied by a statement " of his claim or of the remedy or relief to which he claims to be " entitled."

Those last words, " remedy or relief to which he claims to be " entitled," are echoed in the language in Order 14, r. 1; and though it may be strictly true, for some purposes no doubt, that a claim for arrears of rent is a distinct cause of action from a claim for a declaration of forfeiture, and a claim for damages for detinue may be distinct from a claim to recover possession of a specific chattel, yet for the purposes of these orders I think that, each of the instances I have cited, is treated as a single matter, the subject of one action, which may be brought within the orders.

If I am right, the result is that where, in such a case as this, a plaintiff has sued for possession and arrears of rent, then, if he chooses to apply under Order 14, he must ask for such relief as he is entitled to, or such of that relief as he wants. I do not, of course, for one moment wish to dispute that the master, when he deals with the case, may say, for one reason or another, that it is not appropriate or just to give such a plaintiff all he seeks then and there: he may give him liberty to sign judgment for part of the claim and adjourn the rest of the summons. He may (as I have already mentioned) under rule 4 of Order 14 give leave to defend as to part, with liberty to sign judgment as to the rest.

The forms of the orders he may make are illustrated in the same volume of the Annual Practice, 1955, p. 2680. Romer L.J. drew attention to them. For example, there is an example of an order under Order 14, "where the crown sues in respect "of death duties"—"It is ordered that the plaintiff be at "liberty to sign final judgment in this action for the amount "indorsed on the writ, with interest." On the opposite page there is a different type of case, where the defendant is given liberty to defend. In those cases it is to be noticed that the word "final," where the plaintiff is given liberty to sign judgment for some part of his claim, is omitted. Thus the orders, numbered 9 and 9A, give liberty to defend as to the whole or part of the claim, and then there is liberty to sign judgment as to the balance, but not, as I say, expressed in the form "final "judgment."

Now, it is to be observed that on this application, made in July, 1952, the plaintiff asked in terms, for "liberty to sign "final judgment in this action"; and it would appear quite plain that the draftsman of the summons may have had a form before him to guide him, but certainly did not have in his mind the terms of the writ which the plaintiff had issued. It will be remembered that what was sought was "liberty to sign final "judgment in this action against the defendant for the amount "indorsed on the writ, with interest, if any." There was no interest claimed on the writ. There was a claim in the writ for damages, which appears to have dropped from view altogether. And there was a claim in the writ for possession but no reference at all to it in the summons. On that summons the order made was an order "that the plaintiff be at liberty to sign final judg-"ment in this action." What I have called the condition precedent to any application under the order had in truth been complied with, for the affidavit of George Leopold Lush, to which the summons referred, had not only verified the cause of action (or, Mr. Inskip supposes, the causes of action) but also positively stated that in his view there was no defence to them or any part of them. In those circumstances, and on the facts of this case, I must say that it looks to me perfectly clear, unless the thing can somehow be explained, that the plaintiff was saying: "I want final judgment in this action for £900, and "I am not troubling about anything else—possession or damages "or anything." Whether she meant that is much more doubtful. Indeed, Mr. Inskip says that it was a slip on somebody's part. Not unnaturally, the passage of three years has buried the true facts of what occurred when the two parties were before the master in an obscurity from which they cannot be rescued.

C. A.

Evershed M.R.

I agree with Mr. Inskip that the indorsement by the master, "costs in the cause," seems to suppose that the action was not finished; but, having regard to the terms of the summons and the order, I cannot construe that, conformably with the terms of Order 14, r. 1, as meaning that it was in the contemplation of anybody, and particularly of the court, that the plaintiff would thereafter at her pleasure or leisure issue another summons under Order 14, r. 1, for possession. The words may be related to the circumstance that the defendant was then intimating that she had a counterclaim. More likely, as I think, the master decided that he could give immediate liberty to sign judgment for the £900, but, as he was granting a stay of execution, he thought it better to adjourn, until the matter had been restored, and the question determined whether execution would have to proceed, the award and the taxation of the costs.

In my judgment, the notice under Order 64 having been given, it is now open to the plaintiff to restore that summons; and Mr. Terrell has conceded that, if the plaintiff does restore it, he would have no answer to an order on the summons so restored (a) removing the stay of execution, and (b) directing a taxation of all the costs incurred in relation to the action up to and including that summons and the proceedings on it, and an order that those costs should be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff. But in my judgment the master, with all respect, was wrong to say that that summons was now in effect exhausted and dead; and, indeed, if he were right, I do not follow what he intended to do about the costs of the action which had been incurred up to and including that first summons. I think also that he was wrong to amend the plaintiff's second summons, so as to add to it an application to stay the execution ordered by the first summons; and I think, finally, with respect to him, that he was wrong to have made an order for possession on the second summons. For the reasons which I have intimated, I do not think that in this case it was open, or is now open, to the plaintiff, having proceeded as she did, to apply by a fresh summons or at all in the action "1952 S. No. 3081" for possession as claimed on that writ. I therefore disagree also with the view of McNair J. who dismissed the appeal to him. I think that the master and the judge should have dismissed this second summons and that the order made upon it must be accordingly discharged.

The defendant has moved or been moved out of possession of these premises and some execution (as it is said) has been levied in respect of the £2,700 which, at any rate, according to the unanswered testimony of Mr. Lush, she owes by way of rent. Mr. Terrell says that it is very hard on her, since a school was being conducted on the premises and the pupils have had to go away to some other place. It is unnecessary, of course, and, indeed, it would not be right, for me to embark upon considerations of hardship or of the moral claims which either of these ladies may have in their apparently long protracted and somewhat bitter warfare with each other. Suffice it to say that in the circumstances as known to me, I confess that I am unmoved by the fact that the defendant has left these premises and even that some execution has been levied in respect of the large sum of money which she appears to owe, not forgetting the £900 for which judgment has been signed against her. All we can do, in the somewhat remarkable circumstances of this case, is to say that the order on the second summons ought not to have been made, and to set aside the judgment which was obtained accordingly. The parties will then be left with such rights and remedies against each other as the law may provide. It is fairly certain that the plaintiff may issue a new writ against the defendant. Quite plainly she is in no way estopped or embarrassed by her first judgment from proceeding against the defendant in respect of the rent which has got into arrear since July 27, 1952, or from asking for possession on that ground. Those are matters which no doubt in due course will be dealt with. But the matter before us is limited to the order made by the master and affirmed by the judge upon the second summons, and I think that that judgment and order should be set aside, and that this appeal should be allowed.

BIRKETT L.J. I am entirely of the same opinion, and in view of the full judgment of the Master of the Rolls, it is quite clear that I need add very little to what has already been said. I think that in any event the presentation of this case, through no fault of counsel, has been very unsatisfactory; and I have said once or twice during the argument that one is really left in a state of great uncertainty as to some of the principal facts. In form, the appeal here is against the judgment of McNair J., who affirmed the order of Master Burnand, and that was that the plaintiff be at liberty to sign final judgment in this action for possession of the land specified, together with the mesne profits from June 27, 1952, and removing the stay of execution which had been placed there in the year 1952. There are many reasons why I think it is unsatisfactory. I understand from what has been said here that no rent whatever has been paid since the year 1950, when the plaintiff first went into possession under a tenancy at will, upon the terms which were embodied in a lease subsequently entered into. That lease was for six years, and, as I understand it, will end in July of next year; but during the whole of that time up to June, 1955, £2,700 was the amount of the rent, of which not a penny had been paid. The only matter set against it in 1952 was that the plaintiff said: "Oh, but I have had to pay over "£1,000 for the repair of the premises." When the matter came before the master in 1952, although the statement of claim had set out very fully what the claims of the plaintiff were and the terms, the rent, the power to re-enter, damages, and so on, the

STAINER v. TRAGETT.
Birkett L.J.

summons was confined to the sum of £900, the amount of the rent in arrear.

It is really a very singular thing, because, as my Lord has pointed out, by the summons of July 28, 1952, which was returnable originally for August 7, though the order was in fact made on the 14th (there having been an adjournment), it is " on the hearing of an application on the part of the plaintiff that " she be at liberty to sign final judgment in this action against " the defendant for the amount indorsed on the writ, with " interest, if any, and costs," and no word is said about any other matter. The affidavit that was made by Mr. Lush in support of that summons was made on July 25, presumably for the hearing on August 7, and there Mr. Lush most plainly stated: " The defendant . . . is justly and truly indebted " for the amount of rent, £900: " The said plaintiff is also entitled to " possession of the said premises by reason of the matters herein- " after stated," and then he goes on to restate those matters, clause 4 of the agreement, and the forfeiture, and so on. Then he says that the plaintiff, for those reasons, is entitled to possession, and the particulars of the claim for rent and possession appear by the statement of claim endorsed on the writ.

When the defendant answered that, as she did, on August 12—that is after the first adjournment; presumably the adjournment was sought for that reason—she dealt and dealt only with the question of the rent—not a word about possession or damages or anything else; just the rent. Upon that, when the matter came finally before the master on the 14th, he made the order which has been the subject-matter of so much discussion in this court and which my Lord has read.

Why I think the matter is unsatisfactory primarily is this: August 14, 1952, is now a long time ago, and there is nobody on either side who can really help us about what happened before the master on that day. Attempts have been made to assist the court by trying to get to know what did happen. For example, Mr. Hobson, the counsel who appeared upon that occasion, was asked what did happen, and he said (and one understands it perfectly well), " I was there, but it is so long ago that I have " not the remotest notion of what happened," so quickly do these things fade from the mind. Therefore, we are left with this order: " That the plaintiff be at liberty to sign final judgment in " this action "—" final judgment "—" against the defendant for " £900," the amount claimed on the writ. There is nothing about interest, nothing about damages, nothing about possession. " And it is further ordered that execution upon the said " £900 be stayed until further order, and that the parties may " be at liberty to restore, and that the costs of this application be " costs in the cause, save that the costs of one adjournment be " the plaintiff's in any event. Certificate for counsel."

Of course, one has had to speculate in some degree as to why the order was made in that form. Many matters have emerged at this hearing, some quite lately. For example, it was only within the last hour or so that I understood that the defendant had a school at this mansion house and premises, with 35 pupils, and that she had now been turned out because of the order made by Master Burnand, and that the pupils had been taken to some other premises: furthermore, that, as to a certain portion at any rate of the money, there had been an execution levied in respect of it. In 1955 there came the order of Master Burnand, which was affirmed by McNair J.

In all these circumstances, I think that the situation is still a little unsatisfactory, but so far as the facts are known, I agree with what the Master of the Rolls has said with regard to the matter. I think that on the three matters which were mentioned by him, the master was wrong, and consequently the judge in affirming the master (without giving any reasons) was also wrong, and that the course which my Lord indicated was the course to be followed and ought to be followed in this case. I think that this appeal to that extent ought to be allowed.

ROMER L.J. I agree, and have very few words to add to what my brethren have said. Order 14, as is well known, provides a means whereby a plaintiff, who brings an action under Order 3, r. 6, can get a summary judgment in his favour where there is no defence to the action, if he swears that in his belief there is no defence to the action; and he can then get leave to sign judgment without more ado. But, in my opinion, Order 14, r. 1, which provides for that procedure, does not, on its true construction, contemplate more than one application by a plaintiff who desires to take advantage of the opportunity which the order provides—except, of course, in cases of mistake or the like (such as happened in Sykes Brewery Co. v. Chadwick [2]), or where fresh materials are discovered (as in Wagstaff v. Jacobowitz [3]). I do not propose to read the rule again; my Lord has read it; but it does not appear to me that it envisages more than one application for summary judgment by a plaintiff. But be that as it may, I am well satisfied, at all events, that a plaintiff cannot issue a second summons under Order 14, after there has been final judgment in the action on a summons which he has issued earlier, for the simple reason that, except for the purpose of working out the order which has been already obtained, the action is at an end.

Such was the position in the present case. The plaintiff by her summons specifically asked for liberty to sign final judgment in the action against the defendant for the amount endorsed on the writ, and the amount endorsed on the writ was £900. In pursuance of that application, that is precisely the relief which she got: she was given liberty to sign final judgment in the action for £900 and she did so. It appears to me that the inevitable consequence of, or inference from, that is that she was waiving the other relief which appeared on her specially endorsed writ, namely, a claim for a declaration of forfeiture and an order for possession, and that the action was at an end. I think that that is confirmed by the reference to the forms in the Annual Practice, 1955, p. 2680, which the Master of the Rolls has already made, which seem to draw a clear distinction between a "final" judgment, where no question of defending any part of the action to trial is concerned, and judgment simpliciter, where a defendant is given leave to defend part of the action. Consequently, it seems to me that on those grounds, at all events, the plaintiff was not entitled to issue this second summons.

A possible alternative, or, at all events, what appeared to me at one time to be a possible alternative, having regard to the form which the summons took, and the form of the affidavit in which the plaintiff said there was no defence either to the claim for the arrears of rent or to the claim for possession, and the form of the order, which provides for "Costs in cause," was that the case was, in some loose sense, being regarded as a reflection, as it were, of an application under Order 14, r. 4, which provides for a plaintiff signing judgment in respect of part of his claim and the master giving liberty to the defendant to defend the other parts of the claim. As my brother Birkett has said, we do not know what happened before the master either on the first occasion or on the adjournment when the order was made, and it is largely a matter of speculation; but, even assuming that that was the kind of idea that was present in the minds of the parties, that the plaintiff should sign final judgment for £900, and that the defendant should defend as to the other issues, that still would be of no avail to the plaintiff because, as I have already indicated, I do not think myself that she could apply twice, and her remedy (if any) on that footing would be, when she found that the defendant was not putting in a defence on the other issues, to make an appropriate application founded on default in delivering a defence. It would not entitle her to make the second application which she has made under Order 14.

I agree with the order that my brethren propose.

Revenue—Income tax—Profits of trade—Damages—Proceedings by agent for breach of contract terminating agency agreement—Compromise of proceedings on payment of agreed damages—Compensation received by agent for loss of agency—Whether taxable as profits of trade.

A manufacturers' agent entered into an agreement with a company to act as their agent for a certain period. The company dismissed him without giving him due notice and he brought an action against them, claiming damages for breach of contract, an account of the commission due, and payment thereof. The action was settled on terms agreed between the parties which were embodied in an order under which the agent was to receive £4,000 as damages for breach of the agreement and costs, and it was ordered that he should recover nothing in respect of the claim made by him for commission and expenses.

The General Commissioners decided that the sum of £4,000 was taxable profits for the year in which it was actually received. On appeal:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that the sum received represented compensation for the profit which the taxpayer would, or might have, made out of the agreement between the breach and the due ending date, and, as such, represented income corresponding to the commission which he would have received if the agreement had been allowed to run.

Van den Berghs Ltd. v. Clark [1935] A.C. 431; 51 T.L.R. 393; 19 T.C. 390 and Barr, Crombie & Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue (1945) 26 T.C. 406; 1945 S.C. 271 considered.

APPEAL from the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for Manchester.

The case stated, so far as relevant, provided: The taxpayer appealed against assessments to income tax made on him in the years 1949–1950 and 1951–1952 in respect of his profits as an agent. The question for determination by the commissioners was whether the sum of £4,000 received by him in respect of the ending of an agreement with a principal, Gordon Mills Ld., was wholly or partly taxable.

The following facts were proved or agreed: The taxpayer was appointed sole agent of Gordon Mills Ld. under an agreement made on April 2, 1942, between the company and the appellant. On or about July 1, 1948, there was a breach of the agreement by the company in the circumstances set out in the pleadings. Before the arising of these circumstances the taxpayer reasonably expected the agreement to continue for several years. His appointment as agent could at that date under the terms of the agreement have been lawfully determined by the company by notice expiring on October 20, 1949.

Proceedings were instituted by the taxpayer whereby he claimed: damages for breach of contract; that an account be taken of the commission and expenses due to him under the terms of the agreement; and payment of the amount found due on the taking of the account.

WISEBURGH v. DOMVILLE (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

The company filed a defence to the claim and paid £4,000 into court. One of the assertions in the defence was that the taxpayer was not entitled to any commission or expenses.

The action was ultimately settled (without any account being taken) on terms agreed between the parties, which were embodied in an order of the Manchester District Registrar, dated April 20, 1950, whereby it was ordered that the taxpayer should be at liberty to enter judgment against the company for the sum of £4,000 as damages for breach of agreement and for the costs of the action; that he should recover nothing in respect of the claim for commission and expenses; and that the sum of £4,000 paid into court by the company should be paid out to his solicitors in satisfaction of the sum of £4,000 damages. Before the settlement of the action the taxpayer was advised by leading counsel that the claim to commission would have to be abandoned; and this advice was accepted by him and he gave his counsel a free hand to settle the action on that basis.

Commission on orders obtained before, but delivered after July 1, 1948, would have amounted to £3,128. A sum of £807 was due in respect of commission for June, 1948, for goods delivered during that month.

From a statement produced to the commissioners by a representative of the Crown it appeared that the loss of the agency with the company meant the loss of about half the taxpayer's income. It also inflicted damage to his goodwill and meant that the company dealt directly with the customers introduced by him.

On behalf of the taxpayer it was contended (inter alia): (1) The agreement of April 2, 1942, was the principal source of his earnings, was one of the only two sources which he had at the time of the dispute, and was one of the three permanent agencies which he had possessed. (2) The agreement was wrongfully determined, and the £4,000 was paid for breach of contract. (3) The taxpayer sustained damage to his business structure because of such breach of contract, and the £4,000 was paid and received in respect of that damage. (4) The agreement might have continued indefinitely, and the £4,000 was paid and received with that fact in view. (5) The £4,000 could not be related to any fiscal year or years. (6) The £4,000 was not taxable, as it was a capital receipt of the taxpayer's business. (7) Alternatively, if the £4,000 was paid in respect of commission, as the Inland Revenue contended, it was, to the extent of £3,935, a receipt of the taxpayer's business for the accounting period ended March 31, 1949, and the remaining £65 was not a revenue receipt at all.

On behalf of the Crown it was contended (inter alia): (1) The taxpayer received £4,000 as damages, defined in the particulars of claim as commission that would have been earned by October 20, 1949. The agency for the company was not fundamental to his business organization and the £4,000 was not for the loss of an enduring asset. The loss was to be regarded as a normal incident of the business carried on by the taxpayer and the sum of £4,000 will be a receipt on revenue account for the year ending March 31, 1951, the basis year for 1951–1952.

Alternatively, the taxpayer was entitled under the agreement to commission amounting to £3,935, in respect of £807 commission due for June, 1948, and £3,128 commission on orders obtained before the goods being delivered after July 1. Notwithstanding anything in the order made by the Manchester District Registrar, the £4,000 paid to the taxpayer by the company was in respect of that commission and expenses.

The commissioners gave their decision as follows: "So far "as they are questions of fact we find as facts, and so far as they "are questions of law we hold: (1) The taxpayer, according to "his returns, carried on business as a manufacturers' agent as "at the time he was engaged by Gordon Mills Limited and con-"tinued as such during the whole of the engagement and after "October 20, 1949. (2) According to his statement of claim in "his action against Gordon Mills Limited he claimed that he had "lost the commission which he would otherwise have earned "between July 1, 1948, and October 20, 1949. (3) The terms of "the agreed judgment had no bearing whatsoever on the question "whether the amount awarded was capital or income. (4) The "amount awarded in fact took the place of the commission which "he would have been earning if the engagement had been con-"tinued to October 20, 1949. (5) The sum of £4,000 is taxable "profits for the year in which it was actually received."

The taxpayer appealed.

agreement which he had with Gordon Mills Ld., his principals. He was by calling a manufacturers' agent.

From time to time, between the beginning of the war and the end of 1951, he had been agent for 20 firms altogether, some of them for a short time and some of them for longer, but his two main principals were Messrs. Green, Hearn & Co. over a period of 12 years, and Gordon Mills Ld. his principals for six years. Another considerable agency had gone on for seven years up to 1945, but it ended there.

The taxpayer says that the loss of this particular agency was the loss of one of his capital assets, and that the £4,000 represents that asset and is not taxable as such. The Crown says, and the commissioners agreed, that this was a compensation for the loss of profit-making capacity of the agreement and compensation for loss of profits and therefore, on ordinary principles, it is as much taxable as the profits which it represents would themselves have been if he had made them.

Many cases have been cited on one side and the other, and my task is to find out whether the commissioners came down on the right side. It is said that they have decided the question as a question of fact. I do not think that, baldly so stated, that is right. Their finding must largely have been a matter of inference. The agreement began in 1942 and was for two years certain and thereafter it was continued from year to year. It was not, therefore, a permanent kind of arrangement.

The parties quarrelled in July, 1948, and the taxpayer started an action for damages in the King's Bench Division, claiming that he had been wrongfully dismissed and was entitled to damages accordingly; in addition he claimed that the defendants had not paid him the right amount even up to the date of the breach, which was stated to be July, 1948. The defendants justified, saying that they were entitled to dismiss him without notice, owing to various matters, and they put in issue whether, for the period up to the breach, there was any sum owing. There were long negotiations, and the action was eventually settled on terms which were embodied in an order, made by consent by the district registrar.

In point of form the order leaves much to be desired, but in point of substance it is not very obscure. It was agreed between the parties that the taxpayer should abandon his claim for arrears of commission up to July, 1948. It was also agreed that he should receive £4,000 as damages for breach of agreement. What was the breach of agreement alleged? It was the dismissal in July, 1948, when under the terms of the agreement the principals could not legally dismiss him except by a year's notice ending in October, 1949; in other words, that he had been prematurely dismissed by fourteen months or so, and had, therefore, been deprived of the opportunity of earning the commissions which would, or might, have accrued to him during that time. The parties assessed that at £4,000.

At one time it was said that the £4,000 really represented the pre-breach arrears which had been estimated at nearly that figure, and that in view of that coincidence I ought to look at it as such, but I see no reason why I should, or how I can do that. Parties are at liberty to make their own bargain. It is open to the taxpayer to say: "I abandon my claim for the pre-breach "period and rely entirely on wrongful dismissal." And it may be that the defendants said: "If you do abandon your first claim "we may be more ready to meet you." It did not matter to the defendants for what they paid the agreed sum; it might matter to the taxpayer, from the tax point of view, and he was quite justified in taking it in any way which he thought more beneficial from that aspect.

I accept that the defendants paid purely for the wrongful dismissal—the wrongful, premature ending of the agreement—but what does that represent? It represents the profit which would, or might, have been made out of the agreement between the breach and the due ending date. The commissioners have so found. They stated: "The amount awarded, in fact, took "the place of the commission which he would have been earning "if the engagement had been continued to October 20, 1949." I think that is the proper inference to draw from the order. The commissioners were wrong in saying that the order was irrelevant —it is a highly relevant document—but it seems to me that they arrived at the right conclusion.

If this was merely a compensation for the loss of trading profit by an agent, and if the contract would have resulted in a taxable profit to the taxpayer, if it had been allowed to run its proper course, what he has got is merely a quid pro quo for that. I do not see why he should not pay tax just as much on the compensation he got as he would have done on a profit had he earned it. It seems to me, therefore, that what he got is income, just as much as what he would have got had the agreement been allowed to run. Consequently, it seems to me that the commissioners came to the right conclusion. That is enough to end the case, but because of the elaborate arguments addressed to me I will look at the authorities.

If the taxpayer had carried on no business other than his agency for the defendants, and they provided his sole work, it might well be that its loss would have been the loss of a capital asset. It cannot, I think, depend on the volume of his work—whether one-eighth, or one-quarter, or one-third—but if it is his entire livelihood one might say that that is the man's capital asset. That is much easier to say in the case of a limited company than in the case of a private individual, as two cases illustrate. In Van den Berghs Ld. v. Clark [1] an English company received a large sum of money from a Dutch company and agreed, in return, to give up one side of its business. In Barr, Crombie &

WISEBURGH v. DOMVILLE (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

Harman J.

Co. Ld. v. Inland Revenue,[2] a Scottish case, Lord Normand, the Lord President, points out that in the Van den Berghs case [3]—and indeed in the case before him—the ending of this agreement radically affected the whole structure of the company and the character of its business.

I do not, myself, think that observations about business structure apply here. The taxpayer was a manufacturers' agent. He had other agencies from time to time and carried on business as an agent, and one of the incidents of such business is that one agency may end and another begin. The fact that an agency was a key agency, and therefore was important to him and represented half of his income, seems to me to be irrelevant. He must have expected as part of the normal course of such a business that one agency would end and another start. It is said that he only had two agencies at this time, and found it very difficult to get any more after this one ended. It may be that was his own fault, because he was also representing his wife —nominally his wife, but I think himself—in a similar, competing business, and it would be difficult for him to act as agent for others in competition with his own interest as a principal for himself. However that may be, it was a normal incident in this kind of business that an agency should come to an end, and the compensation paid is, it seems to me quite clearly, income.

That side of the line is best illustrated by Kelsall Parsons & Co. v. Inland Revenue,[4] which is a fairly plain case and, perhaps, simpler than this. That, again, is a Scottish case, and Lord Normand again gives the leading judgment. There, too, the agency could be concluded at twelve months' notice. The Lord President pointed out that one of the factors in the setting up of an agency company was that it had agreements which might end and that that was a normal incident in the course of its business. The present case is, perhaps, not quite so clear as that, but it seems to me that it is a tolerably clear case. There is nothing to be said against the finding of the commissioners that this was a mere compensation for a loss of profits over the next fourteen or fifteen months. As such, it is taxable in the way that the Crown claims, and in my judgment the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Inn—Duty to guest—Loss of guest's goods—No absolute liability for injury to goods—Motor-car destroyed by fire—No liability—Fires Prevention (Metropolis) Act, 1774 (14 Geo. 3, c. 78), s. 86.
Fire—Fires Prevention Act.

One night, in circumstances unknown, a fire broke out in the garage, severely damaging the cars therein. A guest at the inn claimed damages from the innkeeper in respect of the injury to his car, which had been ruined by the fire:—

Held, (1) that, while there was an absolute liability on an innkeeper to preserve the goods of his guests from loss by theft this did not extend to "loss" by injury.

Winkworth v. Raven [1931] 1 K.B. 652; 47 T.L.R. 254 applied.

(2) That, in the absence of negligence, section 86 of the Fires Prevention (Metropolis) Act, 1774,[1] provided a complete defence, notwithstanding the relationship of innkeeper and guest, to a claim in respect of injury caused by an accidental fire.

Accordingly, in the absence of evidence of negligence by him or his servants, the defendant was not liable to the plaintiff in damages.

ACTION.

In June, 1952, the plaintiff, Emrys Williams, and his family were staying at The Gara Rock Hotel, of which the defendant, Commander Alban Lloyd Owen, was managing director. Attached to the hotel was a garage where some five or six cars of guests could be accommodated. Here the plaintiff garaged his Morris car. No petrol was stored in the garage; the only storage tank was outside, some six to eight yards in front of the garage and completely underground. No filling of cars with petrol was done inside the garage, since the petrol pump was outside, nor was there any evidence that any of the cars leaked petrol. In one corner of the garage was a small stove or boiler for heating water which went to the rooms above the garage where some of the staff slept. The stove was surrounded, so far as the garage was concerned, by a concrete wall 7 feet 6 inches high. It was stoked from the far side, where there was a ramp, and on the other side of which there was a fuel store. It may be that some fuel was also stacked round the stove within the concrete wall.

It was the practice to light the stove at noon or thereabouts and to stoke it up until half-past two, when the water would be hot, and then to close it down and let it burn itself out. In the normal course of events it would be out by half-past seven or eight o'clock. On June 13, 1952, it appeared that the normal practice had been followed. At about half-past eight that night another of the guests left her 1927 Baby Austin car in the garage, which then contained some five cars, including the plaintiff's. Fire broke out in the garage between half-past eleven and midnight. The garage was completely destroyed and the plaintiff's car was reduced to a ruin.

The plaintiff claimed £820 damages for the loss of his car and its contents, relying on the absolute liability of the defendant as an innkeeper or, alternatively, on his negligence in permitting a lighted stove in the garage. It was agreed that the defendant came within the category of an innkeeper and was subject to the liabilities which attach to that occupation.

Finnemore J. This case arises out of a fire which happened at the Gara Rock Hotel, near Salcombe, in Devonshire, on June 13, 1952. The plaintiff and his family had been, for the first fortnight in June, guests at the hotel, the managing director of which was the defendant. On that night a fire broke out in the garage which was attached to the hotel; there were about five cars in it at the time. The result of the fire was the complete destruction of the garage and the ruin of the cars which were in the garage; and, in particular, the plaintiff's Morris car which had been put there the previous night. The value of the car is agreed at £800, and the contents at some £20. The present action is brought by the plaintiff against the defendant for the sum of £820, being the loss in the fire.

I think that substantially the issues come down to two. First, it is argued by Mr. Stephenson, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the liability which attaches to innkeepers covers this case, and the defendant is responsible on the basis of absolute liability irrespective of any negligence or actual default on his part. Further, he says that on the facts the defendant, or his servants, was negligent; that the fire broke out owing to the defendant's negligence, or that of those for whom he is responsible, and that, therefore, he is liable for the loss which the plaintiff sustained.

It is agreed that the defendant comes within the category of an innkeeper and that he was subject to the liabilities attached to an innkeeper. It has long been the law in this country that an innkeeper must accept the traveller as long as he has accommodation, and he must also accept the traveller's goods and chattels, within the proper and obvious limits; and those goods and chattels, which used to include the traveller's horse and carriage, now include the traveller's motor-car.

The real matter of dispute between the parties on this part of the case is whether an innkeeper is absolutely liable for injury done to goods while in his keeping, or whether he is absolutely liable only for their loss—and in particular, of course, their loss by theft. Mr. Stephenson did argue—though perhaps not with very much conviction—that as this car was reduced to a state in which it was quite valueless and, what is sometimes called in insurance cases "a total loss," it was, in any event, not merely a car which was injured, but a car which was lost. I do not think that can be right; I am sure that is not what the word means in its application to the liabilities of an innkeeper; nor, indeed, could it in any ordinary sense of the English word be said to be "lost." It was still existing after the fire, I do not say "as large as life," but identifiable, although no longer of any value as a motor-car—or, at all events, in such a state that it could only be made to run again as a motor-car at a prohibitive cost.

What is the duty of the innkeeper? He must receive travellers, and he must receive their goods. Plainly, if those goods are stolen—if they are "lost" in the literal sense; if they vanish—the innkeeper is responsible, without there being any default on his part. Does that apply to the injury which may occur to the goods while in his possession if that injury is caused without any negligence on the part of the innkeeper or his servants? This matter was discussed in cases which have been cited to me today. In 1931 Winkworth v. Raven [1] was decided, on an appeal from the county court, by a Divisional Court consisting of Swift and Macnaghten JJ. This was a case where a motor-car was put into the garage of an hotel, as in the present case, but it was the opposite element to fire—namely, cold—which afflicted the car. There was some exceptionally severe weather; there was some water left in the radiator of the car; it was badly injured; and the plaintiff sued the innkeeper. It is true that in the county court the matter seems to have been placed by the judge on the basis of a contract of bailment, but it is plain that in the Divisional Court it was argued as, and was dealt with as, a plain case of the relationship of innkeeper and guest. It is also plain that in that case it was clearly laid down that while the innkeeper, according to ancient custom, was responsible for the safe custody of the goods—that is, to prevent their being stolen and lost—he was not responsible, without negligence, if while in his custody they became injured or damaged. It has been succinctly stated in Halsbury's Laws of England, 2nd ed., vol. 18, at p. 151: "[an innkeeper] is not "an insurer of his guest's goods generally; that is to say, he is "not responsible in case of injury to, as opposed to loss of, such "goods unless negligence on his part is proved." That is following up the statement of general law, which states: ". . . "he is an insurer of his guests' goods against loss, and it does "not signify, as far as that obligation is concerned, if they are "stolen by burglars, or by the servants of the inn, or by another "guest; he is liable for keeping them safely unless they are lost "by the fault of the traveller himself." Then there follows the qualifying sentence which I have just quoted, the authority for which is Winkworth v. Raven.[2]

WILLIAMS v. OWEN.

In that case Swift J. lays the law down quite plainly. In the course of his judgment he says[3]: "I can find no case in "which an innkeeper has been held liable for injury to goods as "opposed to loss of the goods unless default on the part of the "innkeeper has been proved. If a guest's goods are damaged "while at an inn, he must prove that such damage arose from "an act of the innkeeper concerned, or his servants, which was "negligent, that is, was done in breach of some duty which the "innkeeper owed to the guest."

Day v. Bather[4] was cited to me as indicating the contrary view. In that case a horse had been brought to an inn by a traveller. The horse was left at the inn while, for some days, the traveller went away. While the horse was out from the inn being exercised by an ostler it was injured, and the innkeeper, who was responsible for the ostler, was held to be liable. I think those facts are very different from the present ones. Apart from that possibly contrary authority, there is no other case which has said that the innkeeper is responsible for injury to goods in the absence of negligence. Swift J. referred to Maclenan v. Segar,[5] decided in 1917 by McCardie J., and I think it is useful to refer to that case because it does seem to me not only to explain why this otherwise rather strange anomaly grew up in our law, but also the reasonable limits which I think the courts ought to apply to it. That was a case of personal injury to a guest in an hotel, and it was found on the facts that the hotelkeeper had not taken proper precautions to keep the premises reasonably safe, quite apart from any duty which he might owe

[2] [1931] 1 K.B. 652. Note. In addition to the passage from Halsbury quoted above the following passage from the same volume, para. 214 at p. 156, was also referred to in the argument: "If goods be lost or stolen "from or damaged in an inn, the innkeeper is prima facie liable. (Burgess v. Clements (1815) 4 M. & S. 306)."

simply as an innkeeper. McCardie J., in dealing with this matter, said [6]: "He does not insure the personal safety of the guest. "The reason for the graver liability in the case of goods (which "is prima facie anomalous) is to be found in the social conditions "which existed when the liability first became established. The "prevalence of highway robbery and the risk of possible collusion "between the thief and the innkeeper of those early days "adequately account for the onerous burden on the latter with "respect to goods"—and he referred to Jones on Bailment, p. 95.

I think there may well be a clear distinction between saying to an innkeeper: "You are placed in this special position by the "keeping of an inn. You have got to accept the responsibility "of accepting travellers and their goods; and, moreover, you "must accept the responsibility of seeing that those goods are "not stolen." It may be that in those days there was possibly collusion between innkeepers and highwaymen; it may be, as McCardie J. suggested, that had something to do with the growth of that rule. But, in any event, that seems to me to be a very different thing from saying that if a person keeps an inn, not only must he provide accommodation and meals for the traveller, and receive his goods and see that they are not stolen; but must also see that they are not injured, and if they do become injured, although not by the innkeeper's fault or the fault of anybody under his charge (and for whom he is responsible), he will be held to be liable. I think it is accurate to say that the courts of today would hesitate in extending what is, after all, an anomalous position, in applying to innkeepers anything further than has been established in the books. I do not propose to go further into Winkworth v. Raven,[7] except to say that I think it is good law, and I agree with it. In any event, I think this court is bound by it. There is no doubt that this clear distinction was made in that case, that the innkeeper was held not to be responsible as there had been no negligence on his part, and the article in question had not been lost or stolen—it had been damaged by an unusual frost which occurred whilst it was in the hotel garage.

Another point which Mr. Ackner takes is one based on the Fires Prevention (Metropolis) Act, 1774, section 86 of which provides: ". . . no action, suit or process whatever shall be "had, maintained or prosecuted against any person in whose "house, chamber, stable, barn or other building, or on whose "estate any fire shall, . . . accidentally begin, nor shall any "recompense be made by such person for any damage suffered "thereby, any law, usage or custom to the contrary notwith-"standing . . ." I think that this liability of the innkeeper was a custom of the realm. It is true it is embodied in common law rules, but then common law is the legal expression of custom, and it seems to me that that also would be an answer in this particular case. I suppose that by 1774 the legislature had appreciated what Lord Goddard C.J. laid down in Sochacki v. Sas [8]: "Everybody knows fires occur through accidents which "happen without negligence on anybody's part." Parliament in 1774 apparently thought it right that they should make it plain that whatever customs or usages there were to the contrary, in this country a man should not be held to be responsible for a fire which occurred accidentally—which I take to mean "without "negligence on his part."

WILLIAMS v. OWEN.

Finnemore J.

Those are two points which I think would be enough to decide that there is in this case no absolute liability on the part of the innkeeper, first, because there was injury to the car and not theft or loss; and, secondly, because, in any event, as it was a fire the Act of 1774 would limit the liability of the innkeeper, so far as a fire is concerned.

That takes us to the second part of the case. Was this fire the result of negligence on the part of the defendant or those for whom he was responsible? It is accepted by Mr. Stephenson that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not apply, and that, therefore, he has to prove that there was some default on the part of the defendant. That means two things: first, that there was negligence; and, secondly, that that negligence brought about the loss in this case.

[His Lordship reviewed the evidence and continued:] It seems to me on the evidence in front of me that it is highly probable that the boiler was not hot, and that therefore there was no glowing fire for some considerable time before the happening of the fire about which we have been inquiring in this case. There is no other suggestion which has been put forward. I do not think it is incumbent upon the defendant to prove how the fire happened, though he ought to put all the evidence that he has before the court; and I do not think it is for this court necessarily to come to any decided view, if it can, as to how the fire happened. One may well rest on the dictum: "Everybody knows fires occur through accidents which happen "without negligence on anybody's part." Without anyone being able to say positively how the fire occurred, there was another possible source, and that is the Baby Austin car belonging to another guest. It was a very old car. Evidence has been given—and no one challenges that evidence—about certain features of that car of that date which would explain how it might get on fire; that is to say, by a short-circuit occurring in the wires and, if that happened, you have a full explanation of this fire. Again, as the expert called on behalf of the plaintiff, said: "If "there was a short-circuit in the Austin 7 it could be a self-"contained cause of the fire."

It is not for me to say whether I am satisfied that that was the cause of the fire, but I think, if I had to choose between the stove and the car, I should feel much more attracted by the Austin car theory than by that of the stove; because I do not see any evidence to suggest that the stove caused the fire, and I think the evidence is very strong that the stove was not in fact alight at the time that the accident happened.

WILLIAMS v. OWEN.

Finnemore J.

On the evidence before me I am satisfied that this fire had nothing whatever to do with the stove, or with any fire that was in the stove. If that is right, it means that, in my opinion, there is no evidence here of any negligence on the part of the defendant or his servants which brought about the fire. I am not satisfied that this stove, built-in and surrounded by this wall was a dangerous or negligent thing to instal, and, in any event, I am satisfied that it did not cause this fire, however this fire did, in fact, arise.

There was one other matter which was mentioned, which I do not propose to decide now, but merely record that it was put before me by Mr. Ackner, and that is that it is possible to contract out of the innkeepers' liability. I am not prepared to say it is; I am inclined at the moment to think it is probably not possible. Anyhow, it is not necessary for the decision to which I have come, and I refer to it only in case this matter goes further, so that it can be appreciated that point was taken by Mr. Ackner, and argued by him. For these reasons I think the claim fails.

Charity—Aged, impotent and poor—Homes—Gift for provision of flats for persons over age of 65 years—Flats to be let at economic rents—General charitable intention—Validity.

A testator directed his trustees to transfer a trust fund to a corporation who should apply it for the provision of a flat or flats to be occupied by persons living within the boundaries of the county borough and "being in every case over the age of 65 years." He further directed that the flats should be let at economic rents and that the corporation should formulate such rules and regulations as it should think fit along the lines of rules and regulations in existence relating to certain homes for old people in the neighbourhood:—

Held, that the testator's intention was to benefit aged persons of small means by the provision of homes of a cheap character let at rents which were within their capacity to pay; and that the gift constituted a valid charitable trust.

Adjourned summons.

By clause 7 of his will, dated April 14, 1949, Ernest Peter Cottam directed as follows: "After the death of [his brother] "the said Rodger Cottam my trustees shall transfer the trust "fund unto the council for the time being of the County Borough "of Huddersfield (hereinafter called 'the Corporation') who "shall apply the same (through such committee as the corpora- "tion shall in its absolute discretion think fit) for the provision "of a flat or flats to be occupied by married couples or bachelors "living within the boundaries of the said county borough and "being in every case over the age of sixty-five years And I "declare (1) That the said flat or flats shall be let at economic "rents bearing in mind the cost of providing the said flat or flats "either by building or purchasing and adapting existing buildings "and maintenance and repair of the said flat or flats and (2) That "the corporation shall formulate such rules and regulations as "it shall in its absolute discretion think fit for the letting of the "said flat or flats along the lines of but not necessarily strictly "complying with the rules and regulations now in existence "relating to the Corporation Cottage Homes for Old People and "the Roebuck Memorial Homes Huddersfield aforesaid."

The testator died on February 14, 1951, and Rodger Cottam died on May 23, 1952.

At the date of the issue of this summons the trust fund consisted of investments and cash of the approximate total value of £4,220.

The corporation informed the trustees that it was prepared to apply the trust fund in the manner prescribed by the will, and the trustees, being advised that there was some doubt whether the gift was valid, took out a summons to determine whether the gift for the provision of a flat or flats on the terms specified in the will was a valid gift to the corporation or was void as infringing the rule against perpetuity or otherwise.

DANCKWERTS J. The will in this case was made on April 14, 1949, and the testator died on February 14, 1951. The particular trust which I have to consider was to take effect on the death of the testator's brother, Rodger Cottam, and he died on May 23, 1952.

The trust is set out in paragraph 7 of the will and is in the following terms: [His Lordship read the trust provisions and continued:] It is plain that the class of persons selected for benefit by this trust by the testator is a class which falls within the definition of charity. It is for aged persons, and, therefore, prima facie, it is a charitable trust. Among other cases, In re Robinson [1] may be referred to as an authority for that.

But it is said on behalf of the next-of-kin that that provision in the will that the flats "shall be let at an economic rent" prevents there being any bounty in the gift, and, therefore, it is not really an effective charitable gift; the persons who are to receive the benefit of the trust are to pay a certain sum, but there is nothing in the nature of a gift to them to be found. It is plain that the fact that these persons have to pay something, or repay something, under a trust of a charitable nature does not necessarily render that trust one which is not a charitable trust. An example of that is In re Monk,[2] where there was a provision of a loan fund for poor people, people of the charitable class. The recipients of the loan had to repay the principal sum lent to them, although they were not to be charged interest in that particular case. It was plain that that was regarded by the Court of Appeal as a charitable trust.

In the present case it is said that the economic rent which the testator had in mind is not a full economic rent—not a full commercial rent, if I may paraphrase it in that way; because, though the rent is fixed so as to have regard to the cost of providing the flat or flats, which I suppose means taking into consideration interest on capital and maintenance and repairs, there is no provision for the inclusion of sums for the replacement of the capital value of the properties as they eventually wear out.

There is also the consideration that the corporation are to make rules and regulations on the lines of the Roebuck Memorial Homes, Huddersfield, and the Cottage Homes for Old People. Both those sets of rules relating to those two charities, which are admittedly charities, provide for a minimum income of applicants of 10s. 0d. a week in the case of a single person, married couples and two single persons, and they also provide for maximum incomes of applicants of 41s. 6d. for a single person per week, 62s. 0d. per week for married couples, and 68s. 0d. per week for two single persons. On the other hand, in the case of those two charities the homes are to be provided free of rent and rates, and gas, electricity and coke will be provided free. On the other side the rules contain various restrictions on the liberty of the inhabitants of the homes, which would not necessarily appeal to people with sufficient money to pick and choose their accommodation without regard to financial difficulties.

It seems to me plain that the testator had in mind a class of persons of small means. The minimum income referred to in these regulations shows that the persons to be benefited in the case of the two existing charities are persons who, in present social conditions, where artisans are able to make £20 a week, are persons in the very low scale of income groups or income-receiving groups. Accordingly, it seems to me that the intention of the testator was that homes of a cheap character should be provided so that the economic rent, even though they pay the economic rent as required by the testator, is such as might properly be paid by people falling within the class for which these other homes deal perhaps more adequately, because in the case of the existing charities there are no rents payable at all.

It is a case which is not without difficulty, but on the whole I think the provisions of the will are not such as to prevent the prima facie charitable intention of the testator being sustained. Therefore, I come to the conclusion that this is a valid charitable trust.

Declaration accordingly.

Sale of Goods—C.I.F.—Cancelling clause—Prevention of shipment—Prohibition of export—Extension of shipping time "by two "months"—When operative—London Oil and Tallow Trade Association, Form 5a.

A written contract dated November 27, 1950, for the sale of 100 tons Egyptian washed cottonseed oil to be shipped during the months of December, 1950/January, 1951, from Alexandria, at a price of £146 10s. per ton c.i.f. Rotterdam contained the following clause: "Should the shipment be delayed by . . . prohibition of export ". . . the time of shipment shall be extended by two months. "Should the delay exceed two months, buyers shall have the option "of cancelling the contract forthwith or accepting the goods for "shipment as soon as possible. . . . The option to be declared as "soon as shippers announce their inability to ship. . . ."

The sellers had previously purchased 200 tons of that commodity from sellers in Egypt who held a valid but withdrawable export licence from the Egyptian Government.

On December 12, 1950, the export of all cottonseed oil was prohibited by the Egyptian Government. On January 3, 1951, the licence granted to the original sellers was renewed. On February 17 the export of cottonseed oil was again prohibited and the prohibition continued until the end of April. On February 22 the sellers notified the buyers of this; the buyers contended that the sellers were in default and they claimed damages:—

Held, that the two months' extension granted by the clause in question applied only if the shipment was delayed by the prohibition of export beyond January 31, 1951, the end of the period allowed for shipment under the contract; that the sellers had not shown that shipment could not have been made between January 3 and January 31, and that the sellers were in default.

Decision of McNair J. (ante, p. 642) reversed.

Appeal from McNair J.[1]

The following facts were set out in a special case stated by the appeals committee of the London Oil & Tallow Trade Association: By a contract dated November 27, 1950, made on form 5a of the London Oil & Tallow Trades Association, c.i.f. terms continental, Fairclough Dodd & Jones Ld. sold to J. H. Vantol Ld., "100 tons Egyptian washed cotton seed oil "f.f.a. . . . good merchantable quality. . . . To be shipped during "the months of December, 1950/January, 1951, from "Alexandria" at a price of £146 10s. per ton c.i.f. Rotterdam. The contract contained, inter alia, the following clause: Clause 11: "A. In the event of war, hostilities or blockade preventing "shipment this contract or any unfulfilled part thereof shall "be cancelled. If required sellers must produce proof to "justify cancellation. B. Should the shipment be delayed by "fire, strikes, lockouts, prohibition of exports, riots, or revolu-"tion, or any other cause comprehended in the term force "majeure other than war, hostilities, blockade, the time of "shipment shall be extended by two months. Should the delay "exceed two months, buyers shall have the option of cancelling "the contract forthwith or accepting the goods for shipment as "soon as possible, but should the shipment not be possible "within eight months from the date of shipment originally "stipulated, contract to be void. The option to be declared as "soon as shippers announce their inability to ship within the "extended period of two months, a reasonable time being "allowed for passing on such announcements. Should buyers "fail to exercise their option in due time, contract to be void. "If required sellers must produce proof to justify their claim for "cancellation or extension."

On September 27, 1950, the Egyptian Salt and Soda Co. Ld. obtained a licence from the Egyptian authorities to export at least 200 tons of cottonseed oil. That licence was valid until December 26, 1950, but was subject to a term that it might be withdrawn at any time. On November 10, the sellers first purchased 200 tons of the commodity in question from the Egyptian Salt and Soda Co. Ld., the contract providing for 100 tons to be shipped during December and 100 tons during December/January. The terms were that the shipment was to be f.o.b. Alexandria and that freight was to be provided by the buyer for shipment to Rotterdam. On the same day they entered into an agreement to sell 100 tons to the Irish Oil & Cake Mills Ld. c.i.f. Rotterdam to be ready for shipment the first half of December and to be shipped by the first available steamer. Seventeen days later on November 27, they agreed to sell 100 tons of cottonseed oil to the buyers to be shipped December/January c.i.f. Rotterdam. On December 12 the Egyptian Government imposed a ban on export of cottonseed oil which applied even in the case of parties who had existing licences, and on December 14 the Egyptian Salt and Soda Co. Ld. notified the sellers that they were unable presently to ship. The Egyptian Salt and Soda Co. Ld. had previously made arrangements to ship these 200 tons which they had sold to the sellers and had booked space on board the S.S. Mentor, the booking stating that the Mentor was due to load on December 20. On January 3, as a result of persuasion and pressure brought to bear by the Egyptian Salt and Soda Co. upon the Egyptian authorities, their licence was renewed for a period of three months. Goods of the contract description and quality were available for shipment between January 4 and January 31.

The Egyptian Salt and Soda Co. Ld. were minded to ship the first 100 tons by the end of January and the balance during February, and on January 30 in pursuance of that intention they shipped 100 tons under their contract with the sellers, who appropriated that 100 tons to their first contract with the Irish Oil & Cake Mills. On February 17, however, the ban was reimposed by the Egyptian authorities and that ban remained in force until the end of April, 1951. Thus from January 3 until February 17 the ban was off but was then reimposed. On February 22 the sellers notified the buyers of this reimposition of the ban and the buyers claimed damages, alleging that the sellers were in default.

The dispute between the parties was referred to arbitration and subsequently went on appeal to the appeals committee of the London Oil and Tallow Trades Association who made an award in favour of the sellers subject to the decision of the court on the question of law whether on the facts found and on the true construcion of the contract between the parties the sellers were in default. The buyers, by way of a special case stated by the appeals committee, appealed to the High Court, and on May 5, 1955, McNair J. upheld the finding of the appeals committee. The buyers further appealed.

Nov. 24. The following judgments were read.

Singleton L.J. having stated the facts said: McNair J. gave judgment on May 5, 1955, by which he upheld the award of the board of appeal, and thus decided in favour of the sellers. The buyers appeal to this court. Their main contention is set out in paragraph 42 (6) of the award in these terms: "The "imposition of the ban on the export of cottonseed oil on December 12, 1950, did not of itself bring into operation the "provisions of the 'force majeure' clause entitling the sellers "to an extension of two months. To bring the said clause into "operation, the ban must cause such delay as to prevent ship- "ment at any time during the contract period. The sellers "could have shipped the goods between January 4 and 31. They "did in fact (on their own admission) ship goods of the contract "description and of the required quantity during that period to "Irish Oil & Cake Mills Ld. The decision of the sellers to "allocate the last-mentioned goods to Irish Oil & Cake Mills "Ld. and not to the buyers was an arbitrary one."

The appeal depends upon the true construction of clause 11 of the contract, which reads: "A. In the event of war, hostilities "or blockade preventing shipment this contract or any unful- "filled part thereof shall be cancelled. If required sellers must "produce proof to justify cancellation. B. Should the ship- "ment be delayed by fire, strikes, lock-outs, prohibition of "export, riots, or revolution, or any other cause comprehended "in the term force majeure other than war, hostilities, blockade, "the time of shipment shall be extended by two months. "Should the delay exceed two months, buyers shall have the "option of cancelling the contract forthwith or accepting the "goods for shipment as soon as possible, but should the ship- "ment not be possible within eight months from the date of "shipment originally stipulated, contract to be void. The "option to be declared as soon as shippers announce their "inability to ship within the extended period of two months, "a reasonable time being allowed for passing on such announce- "ments. Should buyers fail to exercise their option in due time, "contract to be void. If required sellers must produce proof "to justify their claim for cancellation or extension." The clause has been in use for a good number of years, but so far as we have been told, there has been no previous decision upon it. The contract is a c.i.f. contract for the sale of goods to be shipped during the months of December, 1950/January, 1951, from Alexandria to Rotterdam.

Clause 11 makes provision for two distinct contingencies: A. provides that in the event of war, hostilities or blockade preventing shipment the contract or any unfulfilled part of it is cancelled. B. is intended to cover a case in which the shipment is delayed through causes less serious than those in A. which arise through no fault of the seller. If "the shipment be "delayed" by any of the causes therein set out, "the time of "shipment shall be extended for two months." The result of this appeal depends on the construction of these words, which are the first two lines of clause 11 (B).

The contention of the sellers is that there was delay in shipping the goods by reason of prohibition of export, and that, but for the delay so caused, the goods would have been shipped on the S.S. Mentor on December 20. They claim that in view of that delay, the time of shipment was extended for two months —that is, until the end of March, 1951—and that before the extended time had run, the contract was repudiated by the buyers. On the facts stated in the special case, this is a formidable argument. But for the prohibition of export between December 12, 1950, and January 4, 1951, it is fair to assume that the goods would have been shipped on December 20, 1950. That they were not so shipped was due to the prohibition of export. The sellers were prevented from shipping goods in accordance with the terms of the contract so long as the prohibition lasted, and in that way delay in shipment was caused, it is said. That is the view which was taken by the arbitrators who were appointed, and which was upheld by the appeal board and by McNair J. It is said that once delay in shipment—however short the period—arises through one of the causes mentioned in 11 (B), the sellers have to make new arrangements either for the provision of the goods, or for shipping space, or for both, and, to avoid any question as to length of time during which the delay operates, the clause recognizes and provides a fresh two months' period as the reasonable and proper extension.

The submission of the buyers is that clause 11 (B) does not apply unless the shipment is delayed through one of the causes mentioned until the end—for all practical purposes—of the agreed time for shipment. They agree that the prohibition of export between December 12, 1950, and January 4, 1951, was a bar to shipment during that time and, perhaps, that it delayed shipment for a little time longer, but they say that there is nothing to show that it delayed the shipment of goods to comply with the terms of the contract during the remainder of the time provided by the contract for the shipment of the contract goods. "The shipment" in the first line of clause 11 (B), they contend, is the shipment contemplated by the parties to the contract and stated as December, 1950/January, 1951.

The commencing words of clause 11 (B) are "Should the " shipment be delayed by " and not " Should shipment be " delayed by." " The shipment " means the shipment already described; that is, shipment during the months of December, 1950/January, 1951. Thus, unless it is shown that the shipment agreed upon was delayed by one of the causes mentioned beyond January, 1951, the provisions of clause 11 (B) do not apply. There is no such finding.

The conclusion at which I have arrived, after considerable hesitation, is that the contention of the buyers is correct. It is the word " the " in front of the word " shipment " in clause 11 (B) which satisfies me that the clause is only intended to apply if delay is caused beyond the end of the period which the parties agreed as the time for the shipment of the contract goods. To put it in another way, " delayed " in the first line of clause 11 (B) means delayed as between buyers and sellers in relation to this contract.

The clause may be of benefit to one or to the other party to the contract, or it may be of help to both. The words at the beginning of it protect the sellers if the shipment is delayed by one of the causes mentioned, and at the same time they keep the contract open, which may be to the buyers' advantage. In a later part of clause 11 (B) the buyers are given the option of keeping the contract open for a further period, an option which may well be valuable. It is important to bear in mind that the sellers do not need protection unless and until the agreed time for shipment has gone. Before they can get it, they can be called on for proof to justify their claim for extension; in other words, they must show that the shipment agreed upon by the parties to the contract was delayed by one of the causes mentioned beyond January 31, 1951.

I do not consider that help is given by the words in the later part of the clause, nor is it necessary to consider the obligations of the sellers to provide goods to comply with the contract in some other way. They had contracted to supply goods for shipment during December, 1950/January, 1951. It does not appear to me to matter whether clause 11 (B) is to be regarded as an exception to the provisions of the contract or as an extension of the time for delivery. If my reading of it is right, it does not come into operation. In my opinion, the appeal should be allowed.

Jenkins L.J. Under a contract dated November 27, 1950, and made on the London Oil and Tallow Trades Association's standard form of " Contract for Oriental Oils. C.I.F. " Alexandria at £146 10s. per ton . . . cost freight and insurance " (including war risk) to Rotterdam."

Clause 11 of the contract having just been read by my Lord, I need not now read it again. Clause 14 provided for the reference of disputes to arbitration in accordance with rules endorsed on the contract, under which the reference was to be to two arbitrators, one appointed by each party to the reference, or their umpire, with a right for any dissatisfied party to appeal to the appeals committee of the Association.

None of the cottonseed oil contracted for was ever in fact shipped, and the buyers claimed that the sellers' failure to ship it on or before January 31, 1951, was a breach of contract rendering the sellers liable to the buyers in damages. The sellers, on the other hand, contended that in the circumstances hereinafter mentioned, the time for shipment had been extended by virtue of clause 11 (B) of the contract, and consequently that they were not in default. The dispute was ultimately referred to arbitration under the provisions in that behalf contained in the contract, and, the arbitrators having differed, the umpire appointed by them awarded that the buyers had no claim against the sellers. The buyers, being dissatisfied with this award, appealed to the appeals committee of the Association, who, at the request of the buyers, stated their award in the form of a special case.

I need not repeat at length the findings of fact of the appeals committee. [His Lordship summarized the facts as set out in the case and continued:] The appeals committee concluded their findings of fact by a finding to the effect that, subject to the decision of the court on the questions of law, the shipment was delayed by the prohibition of export imposed on December 12, 1950. By their award the appeals committee found, so far as it was a question of fact, and so far as it was a question of law held, subject to the decision of the court, that the imposition of the ban on December 12, 1950, operated to give the sellers an extension of two months in which to ship.

Apart from subsidiary points not now material, the question of law for the opinion of the court was (in effect) whether, on the facts found, the sellers became entitled by virtue of clause 11 (B) of the contract to this two months' extension (in which case the sellers would be entitled to succeed) or did not become so entitled (in which case the buyers would be entitled to succeed). McNair J. found in favour of the sellers, thus confirming the views both of the umpire and of the appeals committee; and the buyers now appeal to this court.

The case turns entirely upon the true construction of clause 11 (B) of the contract, and in particular of its opening words " should the shipment be delayed by . . . prohibition of export " . . . the time of shipment shall be extended by two months." The question is simply whether " the shipment " was " delayed " within the meaning of this provision by the prohibition of exports which was in force from December 12, 1950, to January 3, 1951.

If the shipment was so delayed, then the sellers became entitled under clause 11 (B) to a two months' extension of the time of shipment—that is to say, an extension from January 31, 1951, to March 31, 1951—and the judgment in their favour should be upheld on the ground that they were never in default under the contract. If, on the other hand, the shipment was not so delayed, then the sellers are liable to the buyers in damages for breach of the contract in the shape of the sellers' failure to ship on or before the date originally stipulated, that is to say, January 31, 1951.

In support of their view of the matter, which has so far prevailed, the sellers argue (in effect) that if the prohibition had not been imposed, they could have shipped at some time between December 12, 1950, and January 3, 1951, and in particular could have availed themselves of the arrangements for shipment by the S.S. Mentor on or about December 20, 1950, made by their vendors; that the prohibition in fact imposed on December 12, 1950, remaining in force as it did until January 3, 1951, made it impossible for them to ship between December 12, 1950, and January 3, 1951, and in particular made it impossible for them to avail themselves of the arrangements made by their vendors for shipment by the S.S. Mentor on or about December 20, 1950; and therefore that the prohibition, putting off or postponing as it did the possibility of effecting any shipment from December 12, 1950, to January 3, 1951, and in particular preventing shipment by the S.S. Mentor on or about December 20, 1950, was a prohibition of export by which "the shipment" was "delayed" according to the literal and ordinary meaning of those words. Thus, according to the sellers' argument, the language of clause 11 (B), construed simply as it stands and applied in its literal and ordinary meaning to the events which actually happened, did give them the two months' extension of the time of shipment to which the judge held them to have been entitled.

It will be seen that the effect of the sellers' argument is that any delay in shipment occurring at any moment, however early, during the period allowed by the contract for shipment of the goods, and continuing for any space of time, however short, provided, of course, that it was a delay due to one of the causes mentioned in clause 11 (B), would suffice to entitle the sellers to the two months' extension allowed by that clause. In other words, according to the sellers' argument in its widest form, the two months' extension is given by clause 11 (B) unless at every moment of time during the period originally allowed for shipment the sellers were wholly immune from impediments to shipment occasioned by any of the causes mentioned in clause 11 (B). A narrower form of the argument, which in view of the fate of the projected shipment by the S.S. Mentor would, if made good, suffice for the sellers' purpose, is to the effect that the two months' extension operates if the sellers can show that at any time during the period originally fixed some specific arrangement for effecting shipment had to be postponed or abandoned, through one of the causes mentioned in clause 11 (B).

C. A.

J. H. Vantol Ld. v. Fairclough Dodd & Jones Ld.
Jenkins L.J.

The buyers, on the other hand, submit that what has to be delayed in order to bring clause 11 (B) into operation is " the " shipment," that is to say, the shipment which by the contract the sellers agreed to effect during the months of December, 1950, and January, 1951; or, in other words, not later than January 31, 1951. The buyers submit, further, that the shipment in this sense is only " delayed " within the meaning of clause 11 (B) if, through one of the specified causes, the sellers are unable to ship until a date later than January 31, 1951. In this context (so proceeds the argument) " delay " connotes postponement of shipment beyond the date on or before which the buyers are entitled to expect shipment according to the terms of the contract; or, in other words, delay of which, but for clause 11 (B), the buyers would be entitled to complain. The date within the period allowed by the contract on which the sellers may choose to ship concerns no one but the sellers themselves, and the mere fact that through one of the specified causes they have to postpone shipment until some later date within the period, provided that the cause of postponement does actually cease to operate in time to make it possible for them, if so minded, to ship before the end of the period, should not affect the buyers' rights.

In my judgment, the contention of the buyers should succeed. I think that in a clause such as clause 11 (B) of the contract here in question references to delay should be related to the time set by the contract for its performance. I think the proper time at which to decide whether there has been delay due to one of the causes mentioned in clause 11 (B) is the last date for shipment originally allowed by the contract, the question being whether as at that date " the shipment " has been " delayed " by one of those causes. If the sellers could in fact have shipped by that date but chose not to do so, then the only relevant delay was due to their own choice and not to any of the causes mentioned in clause 11 (B), and it is immaterial that at some time during, or for some part of, the period for shipment as originally fixed the sellers were subjected to delay from one or other of those causes.

I think, too, that the buyers' contention accords better with the scheme of clause 11 (B) as a whole. Delay brought about by one of the causes mentioned entitles the sellers to two months' extension of time measured from the expiration of the time for shipment as originally fixed. That suggests delay which has operated to prevent shipment by the date originally stipulated. Then the clause goes on to provide that " should the delay exceed " two months " certain consequences are to ensue. In that part of the clause " the delay " must clearly be the delay which has operated to entitle the sellers to the two months' extension, and the two months referred to must be the two months constituting the extension, and measured from January 31, 1951, as the latest date for shipment originally fixed by the contract.

The consequences of the delay exceeding two months are that the "buyers shall have the option of cancelling the contract "forthwith or accepting the goods for shipment as soon as "possible." Finally, "should the shipment not be possible "within eight months from the date originally stipulated" the "contract" is "to be void." These provisions seem to me to point quite distinctly to a delay from one of the specified causes, by reason of which it proves impossible to effect the shipment by the date originally stipulated, and a two months' extension of the time originally fixed for shipment to protect the sellers from the consequences which would otherwise ensue from failure to ship by the due date, and to give them an opportunity of shipping during the extended period should it become possible for them to do so within that period; and, on the other hand, a protection of the buyers from inordinate delay by giving them the option of cancellation in the event of shipment still being impossible at the expiration of the two months' extension; and, finally, a release of both parties from their obligations under the contract in the event of the impossibility persisting for as long as eight months from the date originally fixed for shipment.

McNair J. appears to have attached considerable importance to the reference in clause 11 (A) to the event of war, hostilities or blockade "preventing shipment" as contrasted with the reference in clause 11 (B) to the event of the shipment being "delayed" by any of the causes therein specified. I do not think this change of language really affects the question one way or the other. I can deduce nothing more from it than that the draftsman appears to have regarded the events of war, hostilities or blockade, specified in clause 11 (A), as impediments of a permanent character to the performance of the contract, while looking upon the various other events dealt with in clause 11 (B) as possibly only transient in their effect. To "delay," after all, means much the same as "to prevent temporarily." Accordingly, I would allow this appeal.

Parker L.J. I agree. The main point at issue is a short, though not an altogether easy, point of construction, namely, as to the meaning of the opening words of clause 11 (B). The rival contentions are these. The sellers maintain that they are entitled to a two months' extension if they can show that the prohibition on export, however short the duration and effect, has in fact delayed the shipment which they would otherwise have made. If this be the correct interpretation, then on the facts of this case the sellers, having shown that they would have shipped on the S.S. Mentor on December 20, 1950, but for the ban on export imposed on December 12, are entitled to a two months' extension to March 31, albeit that as between January 3,

C. A. 1955

Parker L.J.

1951, when the prohibition was lifted, and January 31, they could have shipped the goods. Accordingly, they were not in default in March when the buyers claimed arbitration and thus repudiated the contract.

The buyers, on the other hand, contend that the opening words of clause 11 (B) mean that before the two months' extension comes into being, the prohibition on export must have continued, or its effect must have persisted, up to and beyond January 31, 1951, so that the prohibition must have been the effective cause of non-performance by that date. On this view, the sellers were in default, since goods of the contract description and quantity were available between January 3 and 31, 1951, and in fact such goods were shipped by the sellers on January 30, 1951, to the Irish Oil and Cake Mills Ld. In approaching the construction of these words it is, I think, important to bear in mind that this is a force majeure clause. Whether viewed as a clause which extends the time for shipment or as an exception clause, it is a clause which operates to prevent what otherwise might be a breach from being a breach. Such a clause would normally, at any rate, not be construed as being operative, unless in its absence the party protected would have been in breach.

The first thing one notices on reading the opening words of clause 11 (B) is the definite article before "shipment." Neither side attached any importance to this, and though I think that its presence assists the buyers' rather than the sellers' contention, I myself do not attach any great importance to it. "Shipment," however, must mean "shipment in accordance with the con-"tract," that is, in the present case, by January 31, 1951. When, then, is such shipment delayed? Surely only when the time for shipment has expired. That, as it seems to me, is the natural meaning of the words. No doubt, from the sellers' point of view, it can be said that shipment is not merely delayed when the contract period expired, since the prohibition on export prevented them from shipping the goods on the S.S. Mentor as they had planned. From the buyers' point of view, however, the shipment cannot be said to have been delayed until the contractual period for shipment expired. I think that the delay contemplated must be a delay as between the parties. If it were intended that the clause should operate whenever the domestic arrangements of the sellers were interfered with, express words to that effect would be necessary.

As I have said, I think that the construction put on clause 11 (B) by the buyers is the natural one, but some, albeit slight, assistance can, I think, be obtained from clause 11 read as a whole. In the first place, if the sellers' contention is correct, it follows that whereas a temporary revolution which delayed their shipping plans would result in an automatic extension of two months, temporary hostilities would not, since hostilities are solely dealt with in clause A, under which, it is conceded, the contract remains in being unless the hostilities or their effect last throughout the contract period for shipment. It may be said that it is not likely that hostilities would be of only a short duration, but it is by no means impossible, in which case the sellers' contention produces, to say the least, an odd result.

In the second place, the word "delay," where it occurs in the second sentence of clause 11 (B), is clearly referring to a continuing delay. I appreciate that it is there referring to a later stage, namely, when the two months' extension has already come into operation. Nevertheless, it seems to me a more logical scheme is produced if "delayed" and "delay" are read in the same sense. Otherwise, the result would be that whereas if the effect of any prohibition continued up to, say, one week before the end of the two months' extension, the sellers would be in breach if they did not ship during that week, yet if the prohibition and its effect only lasted two days and ceased, say, a month before the expiration of the contract period of shipment, they would not be in breach unless they failed to ship in three months.

I appreciate fully the arguments of the sellers based on the use of the word "delayed" in clause 11 (B), as compared with the word "preventing" in clause 11 (A). No doubt it is a principle of construction that the use of different words in separate clauses dealing with the same or a similar subject-matter prima facie points to the words being intended to bear different meanings. Here, however, I think that the meaning of clause 11 (B) is sufficiently clear to rebut any presumption afforded by that principle. So far as concerns the buyers' argument based on the absence of a finding that the sellers could not have bought goods of the contract description and quality afloat, I agree with the judge in thinking that that argument fails. In the result, I would allow the appeal.

Singleton L.J. I think the proper order is: Appeal allowed with costs, here and below, and judgment to be entered for the buyers.

Appeal allowed.

* ANGLO-FRENCH EXPLORATION CO. LD. v. CLAYSON (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

Revenue—Income tax—Profits of trade—Company—Resignations from agency and secretaryship to another company—Payment by third party of sum in consideration of resignation—Whether taxable as trading receipt.

The taxpayers, a mining finance company, provided agency, secretarial and other similar services in London and Johannesburg for a number of companies and the receipts and outgoings in respect of such services were included in its assessment to tax under Schedule D, Case I, of the Income Tax Act, 1952.

Together with the trustees of one F., the taxpayers held a substantial shareholding in the K. company, a South African company for which they provided agency and secretarial services for a remuneration. In 1949 the taxpayers and the F. trustees sold their shares in the K. company to certain purchasers who, in accordance with the agreement of sale, paid to the taxpayers £20,000 in consideration of their vacating their office as secretaries and agents; of that sum they retained £16,138 and paid the balance to the F. trustees. The sum retained was credited to reserve account in the balance sheet as "amount received during 1949 as "compensation for loss of office."

ANGLO-FRENCH EXPLORATION CO. LD. v. CLAYSON (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

On being assessed to income tax in respect of this sum, the taxpayers appealed to the general commissioners, who found that it was a trading receipt and dismissed the appeal. On appeal:—

Held, that on these special facts the sum in question was a trading receipt, and chargeable to tax, as it was earned by a transaction in the ordinary course of the taxpayer's business; though it was not part of the purchase price of the shares, it was only earned because of the holding of the shares and by way of inducement to the taxpayers to part with them.

APPEAL from the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the City of London.

The case stated, so far as relevant, provided:

At meetings of the Commissioners on October 18 and 25, 1954, the Anglo-French Exploration Co. Ld. (hereinafter called "Anglo-French") appealed against an estimated assessment to income tax made in respect of the profits of its trade or business for the year ended April 5, 1951, in a sum of £50,000, less capital allowances £100.

The question for the determination of the commissioners was whether or not, in the circumstances, a sum of £16,138 4s. 2d. (part of a total sum of £20,000) received from Philip Hill Securities Corporation Ld., was a trading receipt which should be included in the computation of its profits for income tax purposes.

The circumstances, which had been agreed between the parties, were as follows:

Anglo-French was a public company incorporated in the United Kingdom in 1889 under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886. Its registered office was in, and control of the company was exercised by the board of directors from, London. It had a branch office in Johannesburg. It carried on the business of a mining finance company and its profits were assessed to tax under Schedule D, Case I.

For many years, also, Anglo-French had provided agency, secretarial and other similar services in London and Johannesburg for a number of companies, and the receipts and outgoings in respect of those services were included in Anglo-French's Case I assessment. In 1949 Anglo-French were providing such services both in South Africa and London for three companies and in London, only, for a further five companies.

Anglo-French had either (a) provided such services for companies without holding shares in the companies concerned, or (b) held shares in companies for which it did not provide such services, or (c) provided such services for companies in which it had also held shares. The names of the eight companies included that of "Kleinfontein Estates & Township Ld. [Year "of Commencement 1899]." There had been (with three immaterial exceptions), for upwards of the past fifteen years, no changes in the companies for which Anglo-French had so acted. The annual rates of fees and rents receivable by Anglo-French from the above-mentioned companies for the provision of secretarial services and office accommodation, as at March/April, 1949, was set out in a schedule to the Case.

Kleinfontein Estates & Township, Ld. (hereinafter referred to as "Kleinfontein Estates") for whom Anglo-French provided secretarial services in London and Johannesburg and in which Anglo-French held shares, was at all material times a public company incorporated in South Africa and carrying on business there.

From June 19, 1931, the terms and conditions on which Anglo-French provided such services to Kleinfontein Estates in Johannesburg were regulated by a formal agreement between the two companies, which, by its terms provided that it should continue in force from year to year until determined by either party giving six months' calendar notice. The agreement further provided, inter alia, that Kleinfontein Estates should by way of remuneration pay to Anglo-French £1,200 per annum and a further sum of £60 per annum for rental of office accommodation. This remuneration was subsequently, by mutual agreement, increased to £1,500 per annum.

In addition to acting as secretary of Kleinfontein Estates in Johannesburg and providing all necessary secretarial services, Anglo-French also provided similar services for Kleinfontein Estates in London. The fee paid by Kleinfontein Estates to Anglo-French for these services in London was £60 per annum.

In May, 1949, Anglo-French, together with another friendly shareholder (the estate of the late Sir George Farrar), held a majority of the shares in Kleinfontein Estates. Anglo-French had never had a controlling interest in Kleinfontein Estates.

In 1947 negotiations took place for the sale of Anglo-French's share in Kleinfontein Estates but, in the events which happened, these negotiations were subsequently broken off.

In May, 1948, and March, 1949, further negotiations took place regarding a possible sale by Anglo-French of its shares in Kleinfontein Estates. On this occasion the offer to purchase (which was in no way connected with the 1947 negotiations) was made on behalf of Philip Hill Securities Corporation Ld. (hereinafter referred to as "Philip Hill").

Ultimately, by a letter dated March 29, 1949, Philip Hill made a formal offer to purchase from Anglo-French and certain other shareholders, at the price of 35s. each per share, not less than 70,000 shares of 5s. each fully paid in Kleinfontein Estates. By clause 6 of the terms and conditions set out in the letter Anglo-French was to tender its resignation as agents and secretaries to Kleinfontein Estates, and Philip Hill was to pay to Anglo-French on the tender of that resignation a sum of £20,000. This offer was accepted by Anglo-French.

The participation of the trustees of the estate of the late Sir George Farrar was confirmed by a letter to the Anglo-French manager in Johannesburg in which they stated that they would be willing to sell to Philip Hill, at 35s. per share, the shares in Kleinfontein Estates held by them. A circular was sent to the shareholders, who had not participated in the transaction, informing them that Anglo-French and the George Farrar trustees had accepted an offer from Philip Hill of 35s. per share for their respective shares in Kleinfontein Estates amounting in all to 70,491 shares of 5s. each out of a total of 85,000 shares. They were also informed that, in consideration of its vacating the office of secretary and agent of Kleinfontein Estates, Anglo-French had been paid a sum of £20,000.

The transactions were finally completed and the resignation of Anglo-French from the office of secretary and agent of Kleinfontein Estates and the resignation of the London Committee of Kleinfontein Estates were also tendered and accepted with immediate effect.

Having resigned from their office with Kleinfontein Estates, Anglo-French duly received the sum of £20,000 from Philip Hill. After paying a proportional part to the George Farrar trustees in accordance with its agreement with them, Anglo-French retained £16,138 4s. 2d. That sum was credited to reserve account in the published balance sheet of Anglo-French and described as "Amount received during 1949 as compensation "for loss of office." Reference to this sum was made in the report of directors in the same year as follows: "During the "year the company relinquished its office as secretaries and "agents to Kleinfontein Estates and Township Ld. An amount "of £16,138 received as compensation for loss of office has been "placed to the credit of general reserve."

On behalf of Anglo-French it was contended: (a) that in order to ascertain whether a payment is a capital or a revenue receipt every case must be determined on its own particular facts; (b) that the agreed facts in this case indicate that the sum of £16,138 4s. 2d. was part of the price, viz., £20,000 paid by a third party (Philip Hill) to Anglo-French in consideration of its agreeing to give up an agency contract and that, accordingly, the case was distinguished from the type of case where the payment was received by an agent from his principal; (c) that, having regard to its terms and the surrounding circumstances, the said agency contract together with the right to exercise the duties thereunder was a capital asset of Anglo-French and its surrender at the instance of Philip Hill was a transaction analogous to a sale of a capital asset; (d) that the said sum of £16,138 4s. 2d. was therefore a capital receipt and not a trading receipt of Anglo-French; (e) that the appeal should be allowed.

Anglo-French Exploration Co. Ld. v. Clayson (Inspector of Taxes).

It was contended by the Crown: (a) that the said sum of £16,138 4s. 2d. was received by Anglo-French as compensation for the loss of one of its agencies in the ordinary course of its business and not in consideration of a sale or any such analogous transaction; (b) that in fact the said agency contract and the right to perform the duties thereunder did not constitute an asset, which Anglo-French could or did sell, and further, that the fact that the payment of compensation for its loss was made by a third party was immaterial; (c) alternatively, as Anglo-French was a mining finance company, that if any such sale or analogous transaction did take place, which was not admitted, the proceeds thereof were profits which arose from a financial dealing; (d) that in either event the said payment of £16,138 4s. 2d. was a revenue receipt and therefore a taxable profit; (e) that the appeal should be dismissed.

The Commissioners held that the £16,138 4s. 2d. was a trading receipt of the appellants and must be included in its profits for the purpose of income tax and the appeal failed.

Anglo-French appealed.

November 23. Harman J. The facts of this case are not in dispute and are sufficiently set out in the case stated. The question is whether the inference which the commissioners drew from those facts is a right one. They concluded that the receipt in question was a trading receipt taxable as such. The appellants claim that this was a capital receipt immune from tax. I cannot,

I think, do better by way of prelude than quote the observations of Rowlatt J. at the beginning of his judgment in Chibbett v. Joseph Robinson & Sons [1]: "This case, like all cases of a similar "nature, is very troublesome; because all these cases turn upon "nice questions of fact, and at least I find very great difficulty "in apprehending any permanent and clear line of division "between the cases which are within and the cases which are "without the scope of the Income Tax Acts. I think everybody "is agreed, and has been agreed for a long time, that in cases "of this kind the circumstance that the payment in question is "a voluntary one does not matter. As Sir Richard Henn Collins "said, you must not look at the point of view of the person who "pays and see whether he is compellable to pay or not; you have "to look at the point of view of the person who receives, to see "whether he receives it in respect of his services, if it is a "question of an office, and in respect of his trade, if it is a "question of trade, and so on. You have to look at his point of "view to see whether he receives it in respect of those considera-"tions. That is perfectly true. But when you look at that "question from what is described as the point of view of the "recipient, that sends you back again, looking, for that purpose, "to the point of view of the payer: not from the point of view "of compellability or liability, but from the point of view of a "person inquiring what is this payment for; and you have to see "whether the maker of the payment makes it for the services "and the receiver receives it for the services." To a like effect are the observations of Jenkins L.J. twenty-five years later in Henley v. Murray [2]: "As the many cases on this topic show, it "is often very difficult to determine the character of a payment "made to the holder of an office when his tenure of the office is "determined or the terms on which he holds it are altered, and "the question in each case is whether, on the facts of the case, "the lump sum paid is in the nature of remuneration or profits "in respect of the office or is in the nature of a sum paid in "consideration of the surrender by the recipient of his rights "in respect of the office." A number of cases was cited to me. In some the decision was in favour of the taxpayer and in others in favour of the Crown. It was suggested on both sides that one or other of these cases governed the present one. I do not take this view. Every case of this kind must, in my judgment, turn on the special facts appearing in it. This was evidently the view of the Lord President, Lord Normand, in Barr, Crombie & Co. Ld. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners,[3] a case of this class, when he used these words: "It has been truly said that every "case must be considered on its own facts, and that no legal "criterion for distinguishing between capital payments and "income payments is readily applicable." Mr. Monroe, for the taxpayer, submitted to me that the real distinction was between a payment made under a contract, that is to say a compensation for the loss of advantages which the contract brought, on the one side, and on the other payment made for the contract, that is to say, the purchase price paid on its acquisition by a third party. This seems to be an echo of Rowlatt J.'s judgment in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Northfleet Coal and Ballast Co. Ld.,[4] as to which Lawrence J., in Bush, Beach & Gent Ld. v. Road,[5] says this: "The sum paid, in my view, represented "profits which the appellant company would or might have "made under the contract, not the purchase price of the "contract itself," and then he referred to Rowlatt J.'s judgment in the Northfleet case.[4] I do not think that this distinction, if it be a true one, is relevant to the facts of the present case.

On the one hand there is a line of cases such as Van den Berghs Ld. v. Clark[6] and Barr, Crombie & Co. Ld. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners[7] which seem to show that a sum of money paid to a company, which puts an end to its trading or to a branch of its trading, is a capital payment, whereas a sum paid such as those in Kelsall Parsons & Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners[8] and Bush, Beach & Gent's case,[9] which does not alter the profit-making capacity of the company or its financial structure, is an income payment. I find it very difficult to understand this distinction which seems to go at least very near to saying that the question depends on the importance to the company of the asset in question. I cannot suppose that the answer depends on a mere question of amount. Nor do I see why the duration of the contract should make any difference, though this has been suggested as a test, for instance in the Barr, Crombie case.[10] Rowlatt J., in his judgment in Chibbett's case,[11] already referred to, says this: "If it was a payment in respect of the termination of their "employment I do not think that is taxable. I do not think "that is taxable as a profit. It seems to me that a payment "to make up for the cessation for the future of annual taxable "profits is not itself an annual profit at all. I do not know "whether it has arisen or been discussed, and perhaps the less "I say about it the better, but I should not have thought that "either damages for wrongful dismissal or a payment in lieu of "notice, at any rate if it was for a longish period—I will not say "a payment in lieu of notice, I will say a voluntary payment in "respect of breaking an agreement which had some time to run— "would be taxable profits. But at any rate it does seem to me "that compensation for loss of an employment which need not "continue, but which was likely to continue, is not an annual "profit within the scope of the Income Tax at all", and if this were the law the question would perhaps be easier to answer, but this statement has been criticized in two later cases, namely, Hunter v. Dewhurst [12] and Bush, Beach & Gent. Ld. v. Road,[13] as going too far, so that it is not open to me to decide the case with that guide.

It seems to me that the task of the court is to analyse the real nature of the payment and to judge by the result whether this is a trading receipt or no. It was pressed on me by the Crown that the company itself had described the payment in its accounts as compensation for loss of office and that, as the loss of this office did not cripple the profit-making structure of the company, the cases showed that it must be treated as an income receipt. In my judgment it will not help merely to give the payment a name and decide on that ground: see Lord Moncrieff's observations in the Barr, Crombie case.[14] He says this: "And "again, had it been the law that, whether the agreement contain "a true record or a false record of the situation, anything set "forth by the parties in their agreement could be fastened on by "the Inland Revenue and taken as concluded against them, that "again might conclusively have supported the commissioners' "decision upon the case. But that emphatically is not the law. "Taxpayers when faced with demands for tax may put forward "their view of their case as tabled in their private agreements by "way of defence or by way of concession. Their defence as so "supported will not avail them if the facts do not support it in "substance, while their concession cannot be urged against them "unless the concession is one which is supported by the facts."

For the taxpayer it was argued that this was the purchase price paid by a third party on the sale by the company of a capital asset and was therefore capital. I do not think the true view lies here either. This was a mining finance company and its stock-in-trade consisted of shares in other companies which it bought and sold. It also had another branch to its business which consisted in the performance of duties as secretary or registrar for a fee to a number of companies in some of which it held shares and in others it did not. It was no part of the day-to-day business of the appellants to buy and sell these secretaryships. They are not indeed things which can be bought and sold in the ordinary sense. The reason why the company was able to realize this sum is to be found in its peculiar situation. It held, together with another friendly shareholder (the estate of the late Sir George Farrar) a majority of the shares in this company. It also held a contract to act as secretary to the company. So long as the appellant and its ally held the majority of the shares and nominated the board of the company this was a valuable asset as the directors would not terminate it, but if either shareholder were to dispose of his holding the contract was worth no more than six months' purchase. How, then, was the appellant company enabled to obtain something like twelve years' purchase? Simply by refusing to sell its shares except on the terms that it should receive this sum in addition to the purchase price. In other words, the accession of the appellant to the offer made by the acquiring concern was essential to that concern and it was enabled to get more for its shares because of that fact. The same consideration applied to the other large shareholder, and it is significant that a proportion of the £20,000 paid by the acquiring concern and described as compensation for loss of office went not to the appellant but to the other shareholder. This alone makes it clear that the sum was not compensation for loss of the office of secretary, for the estate of Sir George Farrar had no part in that office. Part of the consideration was the resignation of the four directors' nominees of these two shareholders and an agreed part of the sum was in fact paid to a Mr. Day, another director who resigned. When I look at the document appended to the case, it appears that the offer was conditional on the delivery to the purchasing company of 70,000 shares, but that the directorships of the two main vendors and the secretaryship of the appellants were to be given up on delivery of 43,000 shares. A curious position might thus have arisen if more than 43,000 and less than 70,000 shares had been offered. This did not arise, but it shows that the payment cannot be correctly described as compensation for loss of office.

Thus, in fact, the two main shareholders were able to obtain something more than the 35s. a share which the other shareholders received. The parties, however, agreed that these moneys should not be treated as part of the consideration for the shares, and I think I must proceed on that footing. Even so, this payment was a sum which the appellants were able to exact from the purchasers of the shares by reason of the fact that the appellants' concurrence in the scheme was essential to its success in that 70,000 shares were not available without it. Apart from the holding of the shares, the secretaryship was worth little or nothing. It was only the appellants' special position that enabled them to obtain this money. It was in fact a sum earned in the course of the company's trade, namely, the sale of shares, and, even though not part of the purchase price, was only earned because of the holding of the shares and by way of inducement to part with them. On this analysis, as it seems to me, this was money earned by the company in the course of its trade and therefore a trading receipt and must be charged to tax accordingly. I am therefore of opinion that the commissioners came to a right conclusion and that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Negligence—Onus of proof—Safe system of work—Failure to provide safe plant — Railway wagon in dangerous condition — "Dock use "only" wagon—Whether defendants exercised reasonable care.

In an action at common law by a servant against his master for negligence in failing to provide safe equipment for him, once it is established that the master has provided equipment which is dangerous, the onus shifts to the master to satisfy the court that he has in fact exercised those duties which by law fall upon an employer of labour in regard to the safety of his servants.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, Kenneth McDonald, was a dock foreman who for a long time had been in the employment of the defendants. On September 11, 1953, a wagon was drawn up alongside a platform or "keep" in the defendants' warehouse at the West Hartlepool docks and the plaintiff, in the course of his employment, stepped over a gangway leading from the keep to the wagon and took two or three steps on the floor of the wagon. In putting his left foot down on to what he expected to be the solid floor he found there was a large hole about 2 feet long and 1 foot wide through which his leg went, and he sustained injuries. Pilcher J. found that the wagon was in a dangerous condition.

The wagon was one of about 2,600 "Dock use only" wagons in use at these docks. Such a wagon had finished its useful life on the ordinary railway system of the country and was then appropriated to a dock. The fact that the floor might be out of repair was not an important matter so far as the carriage of freight was concerned, and between June and September when the port was very busy "dock use only" wagons were in perpetual demand and it was customary to defer minor repairs, such as a hole in the floor of the type described, until the congestion brought about by the arrival of timber ships had subsided. It would be economically difficult for the defendants to pick out all wagons which needed minor repairs during the busy period. Such wagons would be much more likely to be allowed to continue in circulation during the busy period than during the slack period of the year. It was not disclosed when this wagon had last been examined, reported upon or sent into the works for inspection. It might have been going round the docks for months with this hole in the floor, and it was equally possible that the hole was made only a few days before it was last loaded.

The defendants and their officials in the docks and the dock workers all knew that it was not uncommon to find a wagon of which the bottom planking was seriously damaged and sometimes holed in the fashion in which the bottom of this wagon was holed.

The plaintiff claimed damages for the negligence of the defendants in failing to provide a safe place of work and safe equipment for him.

Rupert Rawden-Smith for the plaintiff.
A. B. Boyle for the defendants.

In addition to the cases referred to in the judgment Naismith v. *London Film Productions Ld. was cited in argument.

Pilcher J. stated the facts and continued: Once a condition of danger is established, the onus then shifts in a case of this kind on to the employer to satisfy the court that he has in fact exercised those duties which by law fall upon an employer of labour in regard to the safety of his servants. Under certain sections of the Factories Act, 1937, an employer is required to take such steps as are "reasonably practicable" to ensure the safety of his servants. The onus in that matter rests upon him. I am not sure that the matter has ever been directly decided where an employer's common law obligation is in question, but in Callaghan v. Fred Kidd & Son (Engineers) Ld.[1] Scott L.J. said[2]: "If it were necessary to decide the question of onus, the "obvious fact that the difficulty or ease of doing what is neces- "sary to maintain safety is so much more within the knowledge "of the management than of their workpeople makes us disposed "to hold that it is for the defence, whether in a prosecution or an "action, to establish the proposition of fact involved in the words "of limitation of the section," the words there being "reasonably "practicable." I have read this passage from Munkman on Employers' Liability, 2nd ed., pp. 154–155, because I have not been referred to these cases. It is there said that in Taylor v. R. & H. Green and Silley Weir Ld.,[3] and in McCarthy v. Coldair Ld.[4] the Court of Appeal has taken a similar view to that expressed by Scott L.J. in regard to the onus resting upon an employer under the Factories Act. If a situation of danger is shown to exist and the onus rests under the Factories Act upon an employer to show that he has done what was reasonably practicable to obviate it, I do not see why the same onus should not rest upon an employer at common law to show in parallel circumstances that he has exercised due care for the safety of his servants.

The question which is really before me in the present case is whether or not the evidence called on behalf of the defendants is sufficient to discharge that onus. The defendants have a system of inspection and repair. The ordinary working of that system, for economic reasons, results in trucks in a dangerous condition being allowed to circulate during the busy period of the year, and it is said that, without incurring great expense, it is impossible for the defendants to remedy that situation. Asquith L.J., in Edwards v. National Coal Board[5] dealt with this matter under the Coal Mines Act, 1911, and said[6]: "'Reasonably practicable' "is a narrower term than 'physically possible' and seems to me "to imply that a computation must be made by the owner, in "which the quantum of risk is placed on one scale and the "sacrifice involved in the measures necessary for averting the "risk (whether in money, time or trouble) is placed in the "other; and that if it be shown that there is a gross disproportion between them—the risk being insignificant in relation to "the sacrifice—the defendants discharge the onus on them."

I have to make up my mind here whether the difficulties which the defendants would encounter, and the expense they would incur in keeping up the same standard of inspection and repair during the busy months as they do during the slack months, justify them in saying that they have in all the circumstances exercised reasonable care for the safety of their servants. There is one other point. I do not know what the defendants had done in regard to this particular wagon. I understand they are in possession of documents which might throw some light on the history of this wagon with regard to repairs; I was told that they would be difficult and troublesome to get at, and that I can well believe, but it seems to me that the defendants, who are found to have exposed their servant to danger and risk, should satisfy the court that they have taken all reasonable steps with regard to the safety of their servants, and they should produce all the documents and evidence in their possession in order that the court may determine whether they have fulfilled or possibly failed in their duty. Here, I have not all the available information on that point. One can sympathise with the defendants. No doubt it is more economical for them to allow wagons to go about during the busy period with less inspection and repair than to maintain during such period the closer system of inspection and repair which prevails during the slack period.

In my view, the defendants have not discharged the onus which lies upon them of satisfying me that closer inspection and more frequent repair during the busy period was on balance practically or economically unreasonable to expect. They are, therefore, liable.

[His Lordship then found that the plaintiff knew all the dangers which might attend an inadvertent step on the floor of a wagon of this kind, and that he was not looking where he was

Will—Construction—"Colony"—Bequest of postage stamp collection—"British Colonies"—Ambit of gift.

The testator, a philatelist of considerable experience, by clause 3B of his will dated October 10, 1939, gave his "collection of stamps "of Great Britain and of such of the British Colonies except Malta "as may be in my collection to" a named person.

"British Colonials" is a technical philatelic term including all those stamps listed in Stanley Gibbons British Empire Catalogue, viz., those of all counties in the British Commonwealth and the mandated territories and such countries as those which are now the Republic of Ireland, Egypt and Sudan.

On the question of the ambit of the gift:—

Held, that the testator in clause 3B of the will was using the language of philatelists; that extrinsic evidence was therefore admissible as to the meaning of "British Colonies" in the language of philately; that the phrase "British Colonies" was a paraphrase of and equivalent to the phrase "British Colonials" as used by philatelists; and that, accordingly, the gift embraced all the stamps in his collection of all countries in Stanley Gibbons British Empire Catalogue.

In re Maryon-Wilson's Estate [1912] 1 Ch. 55; 28 T.L.R. 49 applied.

Adjourned summons.

The testator, Ryko Rentjo Van Lessen, who died on November 13, 1951, by clause 3 of his will dated October 10, 1939, provided: "B. I give my collection of stamps of Great Britain "and of such of the British colonies except Malta as may be in "my collections to Roland Lee Beamont [the first defendant] ". . . E. I give the residue of my stamp collection to my nephew "Michael Derrick Van Lessen" [the second defendant].

The present summons was issued by the plaintiff for the determination, inter alia, of the question of what postage stamps in the testator's collection were included in the gift contained in clause 3B of the testator's will and, in particular, whether it comprised postage stamps of the following description: British Dominions, Empire of India, Palestine, British Post Office in Morocco and Levant, Ireland and Irish Free State, Egypt and the Sudan.

P. W. E. Taylor for the plaintiff.
John Monckton for the first defendant.
Owen Swingland for the second defendant.

Cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

WYNN-PARRY J. The question with which I have to deal on this summons arises on the language of clause 3B of the will. By clause 3 the testator, who was a philatelist of considerable experience and had what would appear to be a very extensive collection of postage stamps, was designing to dispose of the whole of that collection.

He divides the collection into classes. By paragraph A of clause 3 he deals with what he calls "my collection of stamps "of Holland and of the Dutch Colonies of Curaçao Dutch East "Indies and Suriname." Then he disposed in paragraph B with the stamps with which I am concerned in these words: "I give my collection of stamps of Great Britain and of such "of the British Colonies except Malta as may be in my "collections to Roland Lee Beamont," whose address he gives. Then in paragraph C he disposed of the excepted stamps, the stamps of Malta, by giving them to Sydney Wallace Bradley. In paragraph D he disposed of his collection of stamps of France, Belgium, Luxembourg and such of the French Colonies as might be in his collection. Finally, in paragraph E, he provided: "I give the residue of my stamp collection to my "nephew Michael Derrick Van Lessen."

The difficulty is created by the use of the phrase "stamps of "Great Britain and such of the British Colonies except "Malta. . . ." The word "colonies" is a word which has received no exhaustive definition either in the statutes or by the courts. It is quite clear from the review which Mr. Monckton made of a number of statutes and the definition clauses therein, that the word "colony" can be and is given either a limited or a very extended meaning according to the purposes of the Act. So far as the courts are concerned, their attitude can best be indicated by the observations of the Court of Appeal in In re Maryon-Wilson's Estate.[1] Cozens-Hardy M.R. said: "The "word 'colony' is defined in various Acts of Parliament to "which our attention has been called, but only for the purposes "of those Acts. The definitions are not uniform, and I doubt "whether much assistance can be derived from them. The "Interpretation Act, 1889, contains a definition of the word "'colony' in any subsequent Act of Parliament unless the "contrary appears. That definition is against the appellant, and "would not include the provinces of Canada. But of course

Wynn-Parry J.

" the definition has no direct application to a will." He added that the dictionaries to which attention had been called did not help. Fletcher Moulton L.J. said [2]: " It is impossible to doubt " that the phrase ' British colony or dependency ' is one of very " uncertain meaning." Farwell L.J. said [3]: " ' Colony ' has no " definite technical meaning in a deed or will, and it is unneces- " sary to attempt to find one for the purposes of this case."

In view of those observations, it becomes necessary to consider the background of the testator and of those whom he designed to benefit by this clause. He was, as I have said, a philatelist of considerable experience. The evidence further shows that it was he who had first roused the interest of the legatee under clause 3B of the will, in stamp collecting. Having regard to the circumstance that the word " colony " is a word of doubtful meaning, that at once raises the question whether or not the testator in this clause was using the language of a philatelist. It was pointed out quite rightly by Mr. Swingland that there was later in the will an investment clause, clause 8, in which occur the words " . . . or otherwise in the United Kingdom or " India or any colony or dependency of the United Kingdom " and any foreign country. . . ." It is also true that having regard to the recent decision of Danckwerts J. in In re Brassey's Settlement,[4] that it would not be possible to construe the word " colony " in that clause otherwise than in such a narrow sense as to exclude any part of the British Commonwealth having dominion status. Mr. Swingland submitted that that showed that the testator had made his own dictionary, that I ought to give the same narrow meaning to the word " colony " or, at any rate, to give a narrow meaning to the word " colony " in clause 3B, and that, therefore, no extrinsic evidence as to the use of such a phrase as " British Colonies " by philatelists was admissible. That, of course, would provide a short answer to the whole problem, but in my view it would be wrong to treat clause 3B as governed by the language of clause 8. In my judgment, the correct view is that the testator was using in clause 3B the language of philatelists.

It becomes necessary, therefore, shortly to examine the admissible evidence to see whether that throws any light on this phrase " my collection of the stamps of Great Britain and of such of the " British Colonies except Malta as may be in my collections." A number of experts has been consulted on the matter, but I do not propose to traverse their evidence in detail. I observe that a Mr. Yates who has made an affidavit in this matter, who is a Fellow of the Royal Philatelic Society of London and a Member of the City of London Philatelic Society, who has been a collector and exhibitor of stamps for a period of approximately 40 years, expresses in his affidavit the view that the term " British " Colonies " (in the language of philatelists) " includes all those " stamps which are listed in Stanley Gibbons British Empire " Catalogue." Messrs. Stanley Gibbons were in fact consulted and, in a letter of June 5, 1953, they wrote: " When a stamp " collector refers to a collection of British Colonies he undoubtedly " refers to all those countries which are listed in our British " Empire Catalogue."

The testator made his will in October, 1939, and the whole of the stamps in dispute would have been found in that British Empire Catalogue current at that date. Moreover, by an arrangement between the parties, a number of catalogues and publications relating to stamp collecting were referred to. Among them were a number of periodicals published in the autumn of 1939 and some as recently as 1951. What stands out from a perusal of the relevant entries in those publications is that there is in use among philatelists a convenient phrase, " British Colonials," and that phrase is taken by philatelists to cover the stamps of all countries in the British Commonwealth and mandated territories, and even such countries as those which are now the Republic of Eire and Egypt and the Sudan. The phrase is clearly wide enough to cover the whole of the stamps in dispute in this matter.

Then arises the question whether I can treat the phrase " my " collection of stamps of Great Britain and of such of the British " Colonies except Malta . . . " as, with that exception, being equivalent to what philatelists conveniently refer to as " British " Colonials " ? In my judgment, on consideration, the phrase " the stamps of Great Britain and of . . . the British Colonies " is a paraphrase and equivalent to the phrase " British Colonials " as used by philatelists. Therefore, in this case I propose to give that meaning to the phrase " British Colonies " in clause 3B of the will.

directed to preventing avoidance of income tax by transactions resulting in the transfer of income either alone or in conjunction with associated operations, to persons abroad: "For the purposes "of this section an associated operation means, in relation to any "transfer, an operation of any kind effected by any person in "relation to any of the assets transferred or any assets repre- "senting, whether directly or indirectly, any of the assets trans- "ferred, or to income arising from any such assets. . . ."

In 1933 the taxpayer's parents transferred certain assets to a Canadian company, receiving shares and debentures in the company in return. By two identical settlements made in 1934 both transferred those shares and debentures to trustees on trust to pay the income from each settlement to the settlor during his (or her) life, and on the death of the settlor to pay the whole income to the other spouse during his (or her) life, and on the death of the surviving spouse to pay the whole of the income to the taxpayer during her life. The settlements were revocable. The father died in 1936 without having revoked his settlement. The mother revoked her settlement in 1937. She died in 1939 and by her will made in 1938 the taxpayer became entitled, under a general bequest, to a life interest in her residuary estate, which included the shares and debentures formerly comprised in her mother's settlement. The Crown claimed that the income of the company was deemed to be the taxpayer's income for income tax purposes by virtue of section 18:—

Held, (1) that the taxpayer was liable to tax in respect of the securities received under her father's settlement, since his rights were acquired by means of the transfer in conjunction with the settlement, which was an "associated operation" within the meaning of section 18 (2).

(2) That she was also liable to tax in respect of the securities received under her mother's will, the making of which was an "associated operation" within section 18 (2) and "effected . . . "in relation to . . . the assets transferred" and there was no justification for distinguishing a general from a specific bequest. Further the taxpayer acquired her interest by means of the will and not of the grant of probate.

The deaths of the parents were not "associated operations" but merely incidents leading to the falling into possession of the rights.

Decision of the Court of Appeal [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1460; [1954] 3 All E.R. 682 affirmed.

Appeal from the Court of Appeal (Evershed M.R., Jenkins and Birkett L.JJ.).

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal made on November 18, 1954, allowing an appeal by the respondents, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and dismissing a cross-appeal by the appellant, Elsie Bambridge, from an order of the Chancery Division (Harman J.) dated June 16, 1954. By the order of the Chancery Division an appeal by the appellant on a case stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts was in part allowed and in part dismissed and their determination was partly reversed and partly affirmed. The effect of the order of the Court of Appeal was to affirm their determination in its entirety.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion of Lord Cohen.

Sir Andrew Clark Q.C., R. E. Borneman Q.C. and Roderick Watson for the appellant.

John Pennycuick Q.C., Sir Reginald Hills and E. B. Stamp.

Besides the cases referred to by Lord Cohen, Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Duke of Westminster [1] was cited.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Dec. 8. LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON. My Lords, I am entirely in agreement with the speech which is about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend, Lord Cohen, and I do not desire to add anything to it.

LORD TUCKER. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in print the speech which is about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend, Lord Cohen. I agree with it and have nothing which I wish to add.

LORD COHEN. My Lords, the appellant, who is the daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Rudyard Kipling, appeals against assessments to income tax and surtax made on her in respect of the income tax years 1948–49 and 1949–50, pursuant to section 18 of the Finance Act, 1936, as amended by section 28 of the Finance Act, 1938. That section, the side note of which is "Provisions for preventing avoidance of income tax by transactions resulting in the transfer of income to persons abroad," is, so far as material to the question at issue on this appeal, in the following terms:—"For the purpose of preventing the "avoiding by individuals ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom of liability to income tax by means of transfers of assets "by virtue or in consequence whereof, either alone or in conjunction with associated operations, income becomes payable "to persons resident or domiciled out of the United Kingdom, "it is hereby enacted as follows:—(1) Where such an individual "has by means of any such transfer, either alone or in conjunction with associated operations, acquired any rights by "virtue of which he has, within the meaning of this section, "power to enjoy, whether forthwith or in the future, any income "of a person resident or domiciled out of the United Kingdom "which, if it were income of that individual received by him in "the United Kingdom, would be chargeable to income tax by "deduction or otherwise, that income shall, whether it would "or would not have been chargeable to income tax apart from "the provisions of this section, be deemed to be income of that "individual for all the purposes of the Income Tax Acts: . . . "(2) For the purposes of this section an associated operation "means, in relation to any transfer, an operation of any kind "effected by any person in relation to any of the assets transferred or any assets representing, whether directly or indirectly, any of the assets transferred, or to the income arising from any such assets, or to any assets representing, whether directly or indirectly, the accumulations of income arising from any such assets."

Subsection (3) lays down rules for the determination of the question whether an individual has, for the purposes of the section, power to enjoy income of a person resident or domiciled out of the United Kingdom, but as the appellant admits that she has that power it is unnecessary to set out the terms of that subsection, or of subsection (4) which contains further directions as to how that question is to be determined.

The facts which gave rise to the assessments in the present case can be shortly stated as follows:—On December 14, 1933, Mr. and Mrs. Kipling respectively sold to a Canadian company called Kamouraska Investments Ld. (hereinafter called "Kamouraska") all their Canadian and United States investments, receiving as consideration therefor capital stock and debentures of Kamouraska. On January 12, 1934, Mr. Kipling settled his shares and debentures in Kamouraska upon trusts whereunder, so far as material, Mr. Kipling received a first life interest with remainder to Mrs. Kipling for life with remainder to the appellant for life. The settlement contained a power of revocation reserved to Mr. Kipling which was never exercised. On the same date Mrs. Kipling made a similar settlement of her holding of shares and debentures in Kamouraska, but it is unnecessary to set out the effect of that settlement since it was revoked by Mrs. Kipling on June 16, 1937. Mr. Kipling died on January 18, 1936. On December 6, 1938, Mrs. Kipling made a will containing a residuary gift under which her residuary estate was to be held on trusts which included a first life interest to the appellant. The said will contained no specific reference to Mrs. Kipling's shares and debentures in Kamouraska. She died on December 18, 1939, without having revoked or altered her will, which was duly proved in the Principal Probate Registry on February 19, 1940.

No claim under section 18 was made by the Inland Revenue authorities in respect of any year prior to the financial year 1948–49, but in respect of that year the assessment which I have mentioned was made. This was no doubt the result of the decision of this House in Congreve v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1] which decided that section 18 applied notwithstanding that the taxpayer whom it was sought to charge was not a party to the transfer.

The appellant appealed against the assessments for this and the next following year and on December 30, 1952, the commissioners dismissed her appeal, but at the request of the appellant stated a case for the opinion of the High Court pursuant to the Income Tax Act, 1952. The matter came before Harman J. on June 16, 1954. He dismissed the appeal so far as it related to the securities formerly the property of Mr. Kipling but allowed it so far as Mrs. Kipling's securities were concerned because there was no specific reference to the securities in the will and, in his view, therefore the will could not be said to have been made in relation to any of the assets transferred. From this decision so far as it affected the property derived by the appellant from her mother the respondents appealed, and the appellant lodged a cross-appeal so far as the property derived by her from her father was concerned. The matter came before the Court of Appeal on November 18, 1954. That court allowed the respondents' appeal and dismissed the appellant's appeal. It is from this decision that the appellant now appeals.

It is common ground between the parties that the sales to Kamouraska by Mr. and Mrs. Kipling on December 14, 1933, were transfers, to which section 18 of the Finance Act, 1936, applied. It is also common ground that the settlements of January 12, 1934, by Mr. and Mrs. Kipling were "associated "operations" within the meaning of section 18. But the appellant alleges that to make her liable under section 18 the respondents must establish that her power to enjoy the income of Kamouraska was wholly the result of the transfer either alone or in conjunction with associated operations. She claims that the respondents have failed to establish that this was the position in her case.

So far as Mr. Kipling's holdings in Kamouraska are concerned, she says that her power to enjoy the income of Kamouraska was not wholly derived from the transfer of December 14, 1933, and the settlement of January 12, 1934, but was attributable also to the death of Mr. Kipling in her lifetime without having revoked the settlement. It being admitted that Mr. Kipling's death could not be said to be an "associated operation," she says that it follows that her power to receive the income was not derived wholly from the transfer and associated operation.

As regards Mrs. Kipling's holdings in Kamouraska, she says that her title depends on the will of Mrs. Kipling, and that the making of that will is not an "associated operation" within the meaning of section 18: (a) because her power to enjoy the income was dependent on Mrs. Kipling dying in her lifetime without having revoked her will and (b) because the will contained no specific reference to Mrs. Kipling's holdings in Kamouraska, and, accordingly, the will could not be said to be, in the words of subsection (2), "effected . . . in relation to any of the assets "transferred." The appellant adds that even if your Lordships are against her on this point, still she should succeed in her appeal because the appellant's power to enjoy the income of Kamouraska was derived not only from the will but also from the probate thereof.

BAMBRIDGE v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.
Lord Cohen.

My Lords, the leading judgment in the Court of Appeal was given by Jenkins L.J. On the points with which he deals I find myself in such complete agreement with his reasons for rejecting the appellant's submissions that I am content to adopt his reasoning as my own and to say only that it seems to me as clear as it did to him that: (1)[2] "An interest in remainder, "or, for that matter a contingent interest, given by a settle- "ment is given by means of the settlement and not by means "of the happening of the event which brings the interest into "possession or, as the case may be, fulfils the contingency," and (2)[3] "I fail to see how a will which disposes of property "can reasonably be said not to have been made 'in relation "'to' the property of which it disposes; nor can I see any "justification for distinguishing between property specifically "disposed of and property comprised in a residuary gift, and "holding that the will relates to the former but not to the "latter." The first of these citations is sufficient to dispose of the appellant's argument so far as her interest under her father's settlement is concerned. The combined effect of the two citations would suffice to dispose of her arguments as regards her interest under her mother's will but for two points apparently not taken in the Court of Appeal to which I must refer shortly— (1) that the will was not, and could not be, an "associated "operation" because it could be revoked and even while unrevoked had no operative effect during the lifetime of the testatrix, and (2) that the appellant's power to enjoy the income of Kamouraska was derived, not only from the will but also from the probate thereof.

As regards the first point, I am unable to accept the view that, pending the death of a testator, a will is not an operation of any kind effected by a person in relation to any of the assets comprised therein. No further action by the testator is required to make it effective after his death in relation to the assets comprised in his estate, and the fact that it is impossible in his lifetime to be sure what assets will be affected by its provisions seems to me immaterial. On his death the assets affected are identified and the will is an operation effected by the testator in relation to the assets so ascertained. (See in this connection section 24 of the Wills Act, 1837.) If, as in this case, those assets included "assets transferred or . . . assets representing ". . . assets transferred," it necessarily follows that the will is an "associated operation" within the meaning of section 18 (2).

I turn now to the second point. Sir Andrew Clark said that probate is not an "associated operation" because it is done by the High Court and not by any person and under the section an operation cannot be an "associated operation" unless it is effected by some person. I do not think this argument helps him, since, as Mr. Pennycuick said, the probate was no part of the appellant's title to enjoy the income of Kamouraska. He called our attention to a passage in Williams on Executors, 13th ed., p. 57, and to a decision of the Privy Council in Meyappa Chetty v. Supramanian Chetty,[4] where the judgment was given by Lord Parker of Waddington which clearly established that an executor derives his title and authority from the will of a testator and not from any grant of probate. He also referred us to the decision of this House in Cooper v. Cooper,[5] which shows that the interest of beneficiaries under a will and the interest of next-of-kin in an intestacy both vest at death subject only to the payment of the debts and the administration expenses of the testator or intestate.

We are not concerned here with the title of the executor, but the case last mentioned, in my opinion, establishes that the appellant's power to enjoy the income depends on the will of the testatrix and not on the probate of that will. She might have difficulty without production of probate in proving her right if it was disputed, but, as was said in the passage I have cited from Williams on Executors, though an executor cannot rely on his title in any court without production of the probate, probate is merely operative as the authenticated evidence of the executor's title. So, too, if a beneficiary has to prove her title, it seems to me that probate is merely a question of evidence and not of title.

My Lords, for the reasons given by Jenkins L.J. and for those I have added above on the points which were not taken in the Court of Appeal, I would dismiss this appeal with costs.

I am asked by the noble and learned Lord, Lord MacDermott, to say that he agrees with the conclusion I have reached and the reasons I have given therefor.

Appeal dismissed.
